4 West Suburban Men Are Held In U.S. Drug-trafficking Probe (CHIT)

By Angel Rozas

Chicago Tribune, March 1, 2007

Four west suburban men have been charged in a nationwide investigation into a Mexican drug trafficking and money laundering ring that resulted in the arrests of 400 people in the last 20 months, authorities announced Wednesday.

The investigation, called Operation Imperial Emperor, targeted a Mexico-based drug trafficking organization authorities say is responsible for supplying tons of cocaine and large amounts of methamphetamine and marijuana to distribution cells on a monthly basis throughout the United States, U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales announced in San Diego.

DOJ_NMG_0138821

In Illinois, Melrose Park authorities worked with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to arrest four men alleged to be selling drugs through two Melrose Park businesses. Jose Payan, Saul Leyva and Bogar Santana were each charged with conspiring with others with intent to distribute and distribution of more than 100 grams of heroin. According to the complaint, Payan told a cooperating source that he could go to Santana Automotive Inc. in the 3400 block of West Lake Street in Melrose Park to get a sample of the heroin, said Assistant U.S. Atty. April Perry. In the course of the Payan investigation, authorities seized more than 310 grams of methamphetamine and more than 240 grams of heroin, Perry said.

In a separate complaint, authorities charged Florentino Velazquez of Villa Park with conspiring with others to distribute and distribution of more than 1 kilogram of cocaine. He and an unknown man are alleged to have distributed 2 kilos of cocaine to a cooperating source, Perry said. Velazquez is alleged to have used an unnamed Melrose Park restaurant to sell the drugs and collect money, Perry said.

The men are in federal custody and will be prosecuted in the Northern District of Illinois.

A Wider Front In Doping Battle (WP)

By Amy Shipley

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The battle against the use of illegal performance-enhancing drugs by athletes is increasingly being led by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies as part of an expanding cooperative effort with the U.S. Olympic Committee's primary anti-doping body, according to law enforcement and anti-doping officials.

The latest manifestation of this collaboration came this week in the multi-state crackdown on illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs that led to the arrests Tuesday of eight people in three states, the officials said.

In the run-up to the bust, Drug Enforcement Agency agents in Mobile, Ala., contacted federal investigators involved in the probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, or Balco, in Northern California that has implicated dozens of Olympic and professional athletes, including baseball slugger Barry Bonds. The California investigators put them in touch with officials from the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency, with whom they have been closely cooperating for the past four years.

Within days, the USADA sent a chemist to Mobile to offer his expertise. Several DEA agents flew to Colorado Springs, where the anti-doping agency is based. There were frequent phone conversations. The cooperation illustrated the changing landscape of anti-doping enforcement, investigators say.

USADA officials say the collaboration also reflects the failure of a more than three-decade effort to contain the use of performance-enhancing drugs by competitive athletes through testing. These officials say that with the Beijing Olympics less than 18 months away they fear the use of even more sophisticated drugs and masking agents by athletes will continue to outpace testing methods.

The collaboration has "had an absolutely enormous effect," said Don Catlin, who has been involved in anti-doping efforts since the early 1980s as the director of UCLA's Olympic Analytical Laboratory, which services the USADA. "When I look at the 23 years of work before Balco and what we were able to do -- yeah, we would grind out positives and occasionally have a big hit -- but when the government to decides to go after it and comes in with their tools. . . . They [wiretap], they pull out e-mails; I was amazed.

"It has clearly caused a revolution. Sports authorities have no power to do anything and government has the power to do all. That's what it takes."

The crackdown on the online pharmacies this week suggests how the relationship already is benefiting both sides. While law enforcement agents have said they are targeting the pharmacies and not necessarily their customers, the California investigators urged DEA agents to turn over evidence of any involvement by high-profile athletes to the USADA so it could start disciplinary proceedings against them.

One lead agent in the multifaceted, three-state bust said he would be willing. "Certainly," Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, said in an interview. "It would be reasonable to do that."

DOJ_NMG_0138822

The pharmacies' customers are reported to have included Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield, former baseball star Jose Canseco, a physician for the Pittsburgh Steelers and what one official called other "celebrities."

Federal officials say the cooperation has given them ready access to the scientific expertise of the anti-doping community as well as the benefit of USADA's proximity to athletes and coaches.

Matt Parrella, an assistant U.S. attorney working on the Balco case, said the USADA's ability to sanction drug cheats independent of a criminal conviction by banning them from competition helps "validate" federal investigators' work. Law enforcement authorities rarely go after users of performance-enhancing drugs, choosing instead to focus on distribution networks.

"It was a good relationship from the beginning," Parrella said in an interview in San Francisco. "They could bring something to the table that was unique and we were bringing something to the table they had no ability to do."

The USADA is involved in at least four other drug-related government investigations including the Internet pharmacy case, according to USADA general counsel Travis Tygart and chief executive Terry Madden. They declined to reveal the details of the investigations.

Government officials speculate that increases in federal sentencing guidelines for steroids and other drugs that resulted from the Balco probe have provided agents with more incentive to pursue such cases. "I've seen these things break apart under their own weight many times," Parrella said.

In the Balco case, he said, it did not. "All involved realized this was a relationship that needed to be fostered for the greater good."

To some extent, the collaboration reflects a worldwide trend. International anti-doping agencies have grown increasingly reliant on government intervention to catch drug users since 1998, when Australian customs agents caught Chinese swimmers with banned drugs and French police conducted raids and made arrests at that summer's Tour de France.

At the Salt Lake City Olympics in 2002, local police confiscated blood-transfusion material at a residence of the Austrian cross-country ski team. Four years later at the 2006 Winter Games in Turin, Italian police raided the rooms of Austrian skiers and biathletes. Dozens of cyclists have been linked to a federal drug raid last year in Madrid known as Operation Puerto.

The World Anti-Doping Agency, an independent Montreal-based body established by the International Olympic Committee, has become so convinced of the necessity of investigative work in anti-doping enforcement that it is preparing to hold its second symposium on the matter in London in April. Jeff Novitzky, a special agent for the Internal Revenue Service who is the lead investigator in the Balco case, and Parrella spoke at the first conference last November in Colorado Springs.

"If you look at the really big busts, the really big advances, the majority have been with the assistance of other government agencies," WADA Director General David Howman said. "It's important that we don't get all wound up collecting urine and blood. It's not the be-all and end-all."

Athletes sanctioned in the Balco scandal said they used a steroid specifically designed to avoid detection. Such "designer steroids" aren't the only problem. Testers still don't have reliable tests for human growth hormone and other naturally produced performance enhancers known to be popular with athletes.

In an environment in which the athletes who use illegal performance-enhancing substances seem routinely to be at least one step ahead of drug testers, efforts are under way to strengthen the relationship between sports bodies and law enforcement officials.

The creation of a task force that would bring together various governmental and nongovernmental agencies is being discussed on Capitol Hill as a means of formalizing the relationship and creating a mechanism for information-sharing, according to a source with knowledge of the discussions.

The USADA, in its seventh year of existence, receives about 60 percent of its funding from the federal government. It is a nonprofit corporation whose stated mission is to eliminate drug use in sport and protect athletes' health through research and education. It has no investigative power, no investigators and no budget designated for investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0138823

The USADA has another problem: jurisdiction. All of the U.S. professional sports leagues conduct their own drug testing even though in 2005 several members of Congress, including Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.), publicly urged the leagues to turn their testing over to the USADA.

Of the many examples of the USADA's partnership with government agents, two stand out, officials say.

In 2004, Kevin V. Ryan, the U.S. attorney who oversaw the Balco case until leaving for private practice last month, granted Novitzky, the IRS investigator, permission to testify at two arbitration hearings in which the USADA sought -- and received -- bans for athletes who had never failed drug tests. Ryan also allowed Novitzky to take various pieces of evidence with him rather than providing copies whose authenticity might be questioned.

Parrella said the moves weren't merely "uncommon, it was unique," since the criminal probe was far from complete.

"What drove my decision was the realization that this case was bigger than" the criminal investigation, Ryan said. "Everyone was a little nervous about it. It had never been done before. It turned out to be more a gesture of goodwill. It was our recognition that they had a job to do. . . . They knew we had a lot of evidence, a lot of material, that would help them in their mission."

Throughout the Balco probe, USADA officials communicated almost daily with Novitzky and an assortment of other agents involved in the case, including Parrella and fellow Assistant U.S. Attorneys Jeff Nedrow and Jeff Finigan, IRS agent Erwin Rogers and FBI agent Heather Young.

"If you tried to formalize [the relationship], you'd have lawyers meeting for five or 10 years and nobody would agree on anything," Catlin said. "The beauty of this is it happened. It was all sort of spontaneous from people trying to do the right thing."

Killing Highlights Risk Of Selling Marijuana, Even Legally (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

DENVER, March 1 — Ken Gorman, an aging missionary of marijuana, was found murdered in his home here two weeks ago. The unsolved crime is exposing the tangled threads at the borderland of the legal and illegal drug worlds he inhabited.

Mr. Gorman, who was 60, legally provided marijuana to patients under Colorado's medical marijuana law, but he also openly preached the virtues of illegal use, and even ran for governor in the 1990s on a pro-drug platform.

In recent years, he had grown frightened as the mainstream medicine of cannabis care bumped against the unregulated and violent terrain of the illicit drug market. He had been robbed more than a dozen times in his home on Denver's west side, had recently gotten a gun and also talked of installing a steel door and gates.

"Ken was really fed up with the barrage of robberies and he told me it would never happen again," said Timothy Tipton, a friend and fellow medical marijuana supplier, who said Mr. Gorman showed him the gun about two months ago.

Some legal experts say Mr. Gorman's death could lead to a reconsideration of how medical marijuana is administered here and elsewhere. Providers are often left exposed and vulnerable because of the nation's conflicting drug laws, with marijuana use illegal under federal law but legalized for some medicinal purposes here and in 10 other states.

Since 1997, after the first medical marijuana law was passed in California, as many as 20 legal marijuana providers have been killed around the country, mostly in robberies, said Allen St. Pierre, the executive director of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or Norml, a nonprofit advocacy group in Washington.

Some in law enforcement, including Colorado's attorney general, John W. Suthers, say the Gorman killing illuminates more clearly than ever that crime and marijuana cannot be disentangled.

"Mr. Gorman showed that the law is abused and can be abused," said Nate Strauch, a spokesman for Mr. Suthers.

Many people in the medical marijuana supply system say the central risk comes down to the fact that they work in the shadows, where law enforcement officials are often either conflicted or hostile and crime is rampant.

At the Colorado Compassion Club, for instance, which opened last year as a storefront support center in Denver, the 200 marijuana patients served there go through as much as a pound of marijuana a day. The club grows as much as it can, said its founder, Thomas E. Lawrence, but must rely on buys on the illicit market for the rest, usually made by one or two caregivers who have volunteered.

DOJ_NMG_0138824

Mr. Gorman's killing, legal experts say, has exposed the paradoxes and ambiguities about medical marijuana that most states have failed to grapple with.

The Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment, which administers the marijuana program, is not authorized, for example, to provide information about where the 1,100 patients who are certified under the program can obtain their drugs, according to the department's Web site.

The state also does not license marijuana providers, or inspect the quality of the drug that patients obtain.

Colorado's law allows patients with certain illnesses, as well their doctors and others who provide care, the right to possess, grow and transport marijuana.

But all those things remain illegal under federal law. And a chief deputy district attorney for Denver, Greg Long, said that anyone selling drugs illegally, even if the final recipient was legally entitled to possess them, could still technically be violating state laws too — though as a practical matter, Mr. Long said, prosecutors do not generally pursue cases in which the drug being sold is marijuana for certified medical use.

The portrait of Mr. Gorman is just as unclear. His friends say he was quixotic and selfless, a man uninterested in financial gain who tilted against the confining rules of society, especially the drug laws.

A merry prankster at a time when marijuana advocacy groups were becoming more adept at politics than protest, he had become an anachronism, acquaintances say, whose counterculture antics embarrassed and angered many people in the medical-advocacy and legal reform movements.

"I have gray hair on my head and I attribute some of it to Ken Gorman," Mr. St. Pierre of Norml said.

Some critics said Mr. Gorman was caught up in his own image as a rebel, thwarting even the rules about medical marijuana that could further the causes he espoused.

Just one week before his death, for example, the local CBS television news affiliate in Denver broadcast an investigative story in which a young station employee with a hidden camera captured Mr. Gorman happily explaining how to fake the medical card that would make a drug transaction appear legitimate.

The story prompted an uproar in medical marijuana circles, forcing Mr. Gorman to defend himself on a pro-marijuana Internet forum from attacks by people who said he had betrayed them by making medical marijuana look like a cover for old-fashioned drug-dealing.

And he had become an angry, fearful man, his friends and acquaintances said. Though he had served time in prison — five years for a felony drug conviction in the mid-1990s — and often seemed to scoff at the law, he had grown increasingly frustrated about being a crime victim himself.

The Denver police have revealed little about the murder investigation.

A spokesman, Sonny Jackson, said the police responded to reports of shots fired at Mr. Gorman's home around 7 p.m. on Feb. 17 and found Mr. Gorman with a gunshot wound to the chest. He died shortly thereafter.

Mr. Jackson said that there had been an incident the previous night in Mr. Gorman's home; someone had been arrested and neighbors reported shots fired. But investigators said they did not believe that incident and the slaying were connected.

Colorado's medical marijuana law, enshrined in the state's Constitution by a statewide vote in 2000, protects people from prosecution under state law. Acquiring the drug illegally, however, puts those people in very dangerous company.

Mr. Gorman, his friends say, had no intermediary. The face that was famous on television as Colorado's most ebullient marijuana advocate was the same one making the buys out on the market.

"It's dangerous to help people," said Mr. Tipton, who lives in a suburb of Denver and said he had about 45 marijuana patients. "We're out there, exposed to abuse from patients, law enforcement, robberies — it's a long list."

Lawyers and medical marijuana advocates in California — which has the oldest and by far largest medical marijuana system in the nation, with about 100,000 licensed drug recipients and 200 dispensaries — say that robberies and violence against medical distributors, a problem in the earlier days of the system, have become much less frequent because of improved security.

But many robberies also often go unreported, said Dale Gieringer, the state coordinator for the California chapter of Norml.

"It usually gets hushed up," Mr. Gieringer said.

DOJ_NMG_0138825

Mr. Gorman's home, still taped off by a police ribbon, has become a kind of shrine to the subculture he celebrated.

On one night a few days after the killing, a group of more than 20 people — young men and teenagers, mostly — sat around a bonfire in Mr. Gorman's front yard, passing marijuana joints and beer bottles as a Tupac Shakur song blared on a car stereo.

"He was the most compassionate, kind man I knew," said a young man who identified himself as Vuddah, as thick curls of smoke shrouded the group. "We want to keep this place open so that the patients can keep coming," he added. "That's what we're going to do.

"That's what Ken would have wanted," he continued. "To us, he was a medical marijuana freedom fighter."

US Cites Failure Of Countries In Drug Fight (AP)

By Matthew Lee, Associated Press

AP, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The United States said yesterday that top antiterror allies Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Colombia had fallen short in the war on drugs despite enhanced counter-narcotics efforts and it criticized perennial foes Iran, North Korea, and Venezuela for not cooperating.

The State Department also noted backsliding in some key Latin American nations such as Bolivia while it praised improved performances by Mexico and traditional Asian transshipment points China and Thailand, but slammed neighboring Burma for illicit drug production.

In its annual global survey of the drug war, the department said massive opium poppy production in Afghanistan, long the world's top producer of the main ingredient for heroin, continued to pose a major threat due to its links with groups such as the Taliban.

"Afghanistan's huge drug trade undercuts efforts to rebuild the economy and develop a strong democratic government based on the rule of law," the department said in the 2007 International Narcotic Control Strategy Report.

"There is strong evidence that narcotics trafficking is linked to the Taliban insurgency. These links between drug traffickers and antigovernment forces threaten regional stability," the department said.

It added that endemic "corruption" and prevailing "dangerous security conditions" were seriously hindering efforts to combat Afghan poppy production that shot up 59 percent to a record 5,644 tons from 2005 to 2006.

"More must be done," Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs Anne Patterson told reporters.

The report stressed that Afghan President Hamid Karzai remains committed to reducing the harvest but Patterson said that results remained "insufficient."

Across the border in Pakistan exists a major transit point for opiates and hashish, where Taliban and Al Qaeda operatives are also believed to operate, the State Department said. It said it believed the government there had launched several promising new antinarcotics initiatives.

Mexico Prevails As Drug War Ally (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Several countries, including Mexico and Colombia, showed a willingness last year to confront global drug dealers, but Venezuela, Bolivia, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Iran and North Korea have fallen short in the war on drugs, a report said yesterday.

In its annual study of the international drug war, the State Department also said drug smugglers were hiding in the "shadows of an open society" to link themselves with sophisticated criminal and terrorist organizations to launder millions of dollars in illicit profits.

"As long as criminality remains in the underground of aliases, coded messages, false documents, bearer instruments and clandestine operations, it is often undetectable to even seasoned investigators," said Anne Patterson, assistant secretary for international narcotics and law enforcement affairs. "When criminal activity breaches this underground, it often provides leads and evidence authorities can use to unravel these cases."

According to the report:

DOJ_NMG_0138826

•In Mexico, the Fox and Calderon administrations cracked down on traffickers and drug-related violence more than any previous Mexican governments -- seizing drugs, eradicating illegal crops, preventing chemical diversion and extraditing some of Mexico's most notorious traffickers. Although work is still to be done and Mexico remains the primary corridor for drugs entering the United States, the Bush administration said it was pleased with the country's "strong actions to address these problems."

•Colombia continued to attack the drug trade and terrorist organizations that profit from it, eradicating a record amount of coca last year. Though cultivation persists, aggressive eradication resulted in the destruction of what could have become billions of dollars of cocaine.

•Venezuela and Bolivia faltered last year, both failing to adhere to their obligations under international narcotics agreements or to cooperate with the United States. Venezuela is now a principal transit country for Andean cocaine, and Bolivia "experienced an erosion" of previous successes.

•Afghanistan's opium poppy cultivation increased by 59 percent, making last year's crop the largest on record. The country produced more than 90 percent of the world's opium and had the distinction of being the world's largest producer and trafficker of heroin. Pakistan, beset by rampant corruption, is a major transit point for opiates and hashish, where Taliban and al Qaeda operatives are also thought to operate.

The report also noted that Iran had sought to deal with a domestic drug consumption surge but has not enacted or enforced laws to decrease demand. The result, according to the report, has been "an epidemic of opiate abuse."

In Burma, opium production continued to fall, but its military rulers failed to meet international standards, and the nation remained the world's second-largest producer. Burmese rebel groups continued to be a major source of methamphetamine.

The report praised China and Thailand, which border Burma, for their efforts in stemming the illicit drug trade.

"We must continue to target the financial networks that allow criminals to reap their ill-gotten gains and terrorists to finance their activities," Miss Patterson said.

Report on Poppy (HT)

Hindustan Times, March 2, 2007

The US has praised India's good record on counter-narcotics, but is worried that an alarming increase in poppy cultivation in Afghanistan is helping Taliban terrorists fund attacks on US and NATO forces.

"The Indian government has a good record on this, but it's also a huge country with a very large industry, so to prevent diversion from the legitimate pharmaceutical industry is a challenge," a senior US official said on Thursday.

"India, of course, is the only legal producer of opium and we've worked closely with the Indian government. India has a good record, frankly, on counter-narcotics," said assistant secretary of state for international narcotics and law enforcement affairs Anne W Patterson.

India, she noted, has a very large, legitimate pharmaceutical industry. "We work very closely with them to prevent diversion from that. The Indian government is very committed to that," she said while the US government's 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategy Report.

Of particular worry in Afghanistan is the Taliban's involvement in the drug trade, Patterson said noting that cultivation of the opium poppy there increased by an "alarming" 59 percent, making the 2006 crop the largest on record.

Taliban leaders have publicly linked themselves to poppy cultivation, and drug profits now support elements of the Taliban and fund attacks on US and international troops in Afghanistan. The opium poppy is used to manufacture heroin, she said.

Patterson attributed much of the poppy problem in Afghanistan to the fact that the Afghan government "doesn't have control of [its] territory". Cultivation of opium poppies soared in 2006 in two Afghan provinces, Helmand and Kandahar, "because there is basically a lack of law enforcement and control", she said.

The resurgence of Afghan opium cultivation has increased the flow of heroin to Europe, Russia and the Near East, which "undermines those societies and the consolidation of democracy and security in Afghanistan", the report stated.

Patterson praised neighbouring Iran's role in combating drug trafficking, despite a State Department report characterising the country as a "major transit route for opiates smuggled from Afghanistan", which eventually reach Western markets.

DOJ_NMG_0138827

"They are playing a very positive role" in fighting the Afghan opium trade, Patterson said of Iran. "They have been very active along the border" with Afghanistan.

The Iranians view the opium trade as a "major social and law enforcement problem" and have been the "most aggressive" by far of Afghanistan's neighbours in interdicting the Afghan opium crop, said Patterson.

Apart from Afghanistan, the report cited Bolivia and Venezuela as being particular problems in the drug trade.

Turning to terrorist financing, the US official said money laundering had long been "intertwined" with the drug trade. But the global community had become more aware since the September 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States of "terrorists using underground systems to move money and transfer assets".

Focusing on money laundering "is one of the most valuable tools law enforcement has to combat international crime", the report said.

A focus on money laundering "can accomplish what many other law enforcement tools cannot" in attacking such threats as narcotics trafficking, alien smuggling, intellectual property theft, corruption and terrorism, it said.

Afghan Opium Output Reaches Record; Drug Trade Aids Taliban (BLOOM)

By Paul Tighe

Bloomberg, March 2, 2007

March 2 (Bloomberg) -- Afghanistan's opium production reached a record in 2006 and the drug trade is supporting the Taliban insurgency to overthrow the government of President Hamid Karzai, the U.S. State Department said.

The country produced 5,644 metric tons of opium compared with 4,475 metric tons in 2005, the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs said in a report. Opium is the base ingredient for heroin.

``There is direct evidence linking the insurgency in Afghanistan and narcotics," the bureau said. ``Traffickers provide weapons, funding and personnel to the Taliban in exchange for the protection of drug trade routes, poppy fields and members of their organizations."

The Taliban, ousted in the U.S.-led war on terrorism in 2001, increased their attacks last year mainly in southern and eastern provinces, prompting the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to expand its 35,000-strong force. Afghanistan produces more than 90 percent of the world's opium poppies and is the largest heroin producing and trafficking country, according to the bureau.

Areas under poppy cultivation increased 61 percent in 2006 to 172,000 hectares (424,840 acres) from 107,400 the previous year, according to the report. It estimates the country's illicit opium was worth $3.1 billion last year and represents about one- third of Afghanistan's licit and illicit gross domestic product.

Southern Provinces

Helmand province in southern Afghanistan, the center of the Taliban insurgency, is the country's most significant opium producer, responsible for 46 percent of the national poppy crop. Kandahar, Oruzgan and Farah provinces, also in the south, together produced 24 percent, while 12 of Afghanistan's 34 provinces were poppy-free in 2006, according to the report.

Links between the Taliban and drug traffickers are highlighted by the case of Haji Bashir Noorzai, the alleged leader of the largest trafficking organization in central and southwest Asia, who was arrested in the U.S. in 2005 and is awaiting trial, the bureau said.

His indictment alleges that he provided explosives, weapons and personnel to the Taliban in return for protection of poppy crops and trafficking routes. Noorzai was a former leader of a Taliban council, according to the report.

Drug-related corruption is also a problem within the Afghan government and is ``particularly pervasive at provincial and district government levels," it said.

National Conference

The Afghan Ministry of Counter Narcotics last year organized a national conference on combating the drug trade, the government's first effort to start a nationwide campaign. The plan didn't take effect until after the planting season for the 2006 crop.

DOJ_NMG_0138828

``In order to make sustained progress in combating narcotics trafficking, the government of Afghanistan will need to continue to extend credible governance throughout Afghanistan's provinces and districts and demonstrate its ability to enforce the rules of law across the country," the bureau said. ``This will require international and political support over many years."

The unstable security, political and economic environments limit the ability of Karzai's administration to combat narcotics production and trade, it said.

Fighting last year killed at least 4,000 Afghan civilians and dozens of NATO personnel. U.K. Defense Secretary Des Browne on Feb. 26 said Britain will add 1,400 soldiers to its contingent bringing its force to 7,700 service personnel.

US: Venezuelan Situation Favors Illicit Drug Traffic (EU)

El Universal, March 1, 2007

Venezuela, with "a rampant high level of corruption, weak judicial system and lack of international counternarcotics cooperation" is increasingly enabling a growing illicit drug transshipment industry, US authorities said Thursday.

This forms part of the conclusion of the 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategy Report, a document made public each year about international cooperation in the fight against drug traffic, news agency Efe reported.

The report states that according to officials from the US embassy in Caracas, Venezuelan security forces are involved in the drug traffic.

Also, the authors of the report claim that "because of the permissive and corrupt Venezuelan environment, and the success of Plan Colombia in neighboring Colombia, traffickers have set up operations to transship illicit drugs through Venezuela to the eastern Caribbean, Europe, Africa and the United States. Venezuelan traffickers have been arrested in the Netherlands, Spain, Ghana, the Dominican Republic, Mexico and other countries."

According to the report, Venezuela is one of the major drug transshipment countries in the Western hemisphere.

During the presentation of the report, Abelardo Arias, a director for Latin America of the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs, US Department of State, said that cooperation between Washington and Caracas is at the minimum level, adding that Venezuela refuses to sign any agreement of information exchange on drug traffic.

"Venezuela failed demonstrably to adhere to its obligations under international counternarcotics agreements and take the measures set forth in US law."

Report Looks At Cocaine Trade (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Venezuela has become a significant player in the flow of cocaine from Colombia to the USA by allowing drug smugglers to operate freely and making little effort to cooperate with U.S. anti-drug efforts, a State Department report said Thursday.

The number of flights from Venezuela suspected of ferrying Colombian cocaine to the Dominican Republic and Haiti — key transfer points for U.S.-bound shipments of the drug — increased 167% last year, State Department Assistant Secretary Anne Patterson said. She added that the leftist government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, a frequent critic of the United States, has allowed drug trafficking to flourish.

"Venezuela's permissive and corrupt environment led to more trafficking, fewer seizures and an increase in suspected drug flights (from Venezuela) over the past 12 months," Patterson said.

In 2006, the Department of Defense's Joint Interagency Task Force South documented 75 flights from Venezuela to the Dominican Republic and 46 flights into Haiti, says U.S. Coast Guard Rear Adm. Jeff Hathaway, who directs the task force.

"What we have seen emerging over the last 12 months is a virtual explosion of drug trafficking emanating from Venezuela," Hathaway said.

The task force gives information about suspected drug flights to the Venezuelan government, but it rarely acts on it, he said. "Venezuela is not making any attempt to stop the aircraft when they are being tipped off by the United States."

The Venezuelan Embassy did not respond to phone calls and e-mails requesting comment.

Patterson praised governments in Mexico and Colombia for aggressive counterdrug programs, but she said both countries continue to be major drug suppliers to the USA. In Bolivia, she said, the political will to counter drug trafficking has declined.

DOJ_NMG_0138829

Recently elected Bolivian President Evo Morales has said the government would allow farmers to increase cultivation of coca to be used legally for flavorings and pharmaceuticals from 29,653 acres to 49,421 acres. The U.S. government contends that just 618 acres of coca cultivation would meet worldwide industrial demand.

The report also said Afghanistan's opium-poppy cultivation rose 59% last year, making the 2006 crop the largest ever. Patterson said profits from the opium trade help finance Taliban forces. The Afghan government does not control the Helmand and Kandahar provinces, where much of the opium is grown, she said.

Officials at the Afghan Embassy did not respond to a request for comment.

Report Slams Venezuela For Drug Trafficking (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - In its harshest assessment yet of drug trafficking in Venezuela, the State Department on Thursday said the country is turning into a haven for smugglers because of corruption and the government's refusal to cooperate with other nations.

The department's 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategies Report also expressed uneasiness over Bolivia's efforts to expand the cultivation of coca, the raw material used to make cocaine, and the State Department offered rare praise for Cuba for deporting a Colombian trafficker to Bogota.

It also praised three countries - Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico - that Bush will visit this month during a swing through Latin America, saying the three were trying to halt drug smuggling, if not succeeding.

The report also said that opium production hit a record high in Afghanistan last year and that the drug trade was undermining democracy there.

The report says Afghanistan produced a record 5,644 metric tons of opium in 2006, a 26 percent jump from the previous year. The State Department said there was "strong evidence" that drug trafficking was funding the Taliban insurgency.

"These links between drug traffickers and anti-government forces threaten regional stability," the report said.

Venezuela's leftwing President Hugo Chavez has long been at loggerheads with the Bush administration, which has accused him of everything from undermining democracies in the hemisphere to provoking an arms race - allegations denied by the Chavez government.

The report calls Venezuela "one of the principal drug-transit countries in the Western Hemisphere," with Colombian traffickers setting up shop there because the Chavez government is "permissive and corrupt."

Anne Patterson, the State Department's top anti-drug trafficking official, told reporters that suspected drug trafficking flights from Venezuela to Haiti and the Dominican Republic had soared by 167 percent last year.

More than 200 metric tons of cocaine transit through Venezuela every year, according to the report, which covers the entire world. Arrests are limited to small-time traffickers, and seizures within Venezuela dropped while Venezuelan shipments interdicted in other countries tripled.

The Venezuelan embassy in Washington declined to comment on the report, but in the past Chavez and several of his government's officials have denied any relaxation of its fight against illicit drugs.

The report praises Colombia, the world's top cocaine producer, as "completely committed" to the drug war. It calls Mexican efforts to combat traffickers last year as "unmatched" by any previous government there. About 90 percent of the cocaine in U.S. streets is believed to have come through the border with Mexico.

Guatemala is described in the report as "major drug-transit country" that made "substantial progress" in reforming the police's ability to combat drugs. The report, prepared weeks ago, made no mention, however, of the Feb. 19 murders of three Central American legislators in what Guatemala's President Oscar Berger said may have been a drug-related crime.

Four police officers arrested in the deaths, including the head of Guatemala's organized crime unit, were murdered days later in their cells at a prison outside Guatemala City. The assailants, who are still at large, passed through eight prison checkpoints unchallenged, officials said.

Patterson denied that the report picked on Venezuela because of Chavez's strident criticism of Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0138830

"In contrast to the strong stands taken by the governments of Mexico and Colombia," Patterson said, "political will in Venezuela and Bolivia faltered last year."

She said Venezuela long had one of the strongest records in the hemisphere against trafficking. "And frankly, that's all stopped, for reasons that aren't entirely clear to me."

The Bush administration stepped up its criticism of Venezuela after Chavez ousted Drug Enforcement Administration agents from Venezuelan government facilities in late 2004, allegedly because they were spying. The two countries later negotiated an agreement to allow DEA agents to return, but Venezuela has so far refused to sign it, the report says.

In September of last year, the administration "de-certified" Venezuela as a helpful ally in the drug war and cut off aid and weapons shipments, among other sanctions.

Patterson praised Cuba for deporting alleged trafficker Luis Hernando Gomez-Bustamante to Colombia after holding him in prison for several months. He is expected to be extradited soon from Colombia to the United States.

"There is not a major trafficking issue through Cuba," she added. The Cuban government has long maintained that it is carrying on a strong fight against illicit drugs, despite past U.S. allegations that government officials there were involved in protecting foreign traffickers.

Bolivia's leftist President Evo Morales wants to increase the acreage of legally grown coca while fighting the illegal trade in cocaine. The Bush administration believes more coca will lead to more cocaine and is to decide by March 15 if Bolivia is doing enough to stop drug trafficking.

Bolivia's ambassador to the United States, Gustavo Guzman, described the report as "serene and balanced."

Mail Bomb Suspect Eludes, Baffles Cops (FREEP/AP)

By Heather Hollingsworth, Associated Press

Detroit Free Press, March 2, 2007

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- He calls himself the Bishop. Exactly why is just one of the many mysteries surrounding the increasingly menacing figure.

The man -- and investigators believe they are dealing with a man -- is suspected of sending at least a half-dozen threatening letters to financial institutions over the past 18 months and mailing two dud pipe bombs that arrived a day apart in Kansas City and Chicago in January.

In his letters, the Bishop has demanded that financial companies move the prices of certain stocks to certain levels, often $6.66 -- an apparent reference to the Antichrist, said corporate counterterrorism expert Fred Burton.

Burton, whose security firm in Austin, Texas, has been hired by financial companies to find the Bishop, said the pipe bombs were assembled with crucial components deliberately left out, in what was probably a warning. Next time, Burton said, the bombs could be real.

But catching the Bishop and figuring out exactly what his grudge is could require help from the public, Burton said.

The Bishop, like the Unabomber, is probably mentally ill, highly intelligent and a loner, Burton said.

Postal inspectors are offering a reward of up to $100,000 for information. The investigation also includes the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and local police.

Spokesmen for the FBI and the Postal Inspection Service would not comment in any detail on the investigation.

A sketch released Tuesday by postal authorities depicts him in his 30s or early 40s.

The pipe bombs, sent in white cardboard boxes, carried the same return address in Streamwood, Ill., and were postmarked Jan. 26 from Rolling Meadows, Ill. The sketch is based on the description of a witness who saw a suspicious-looking man in the post office there that day.

One package arrived Jan. 31 at American Century Investments' Kansas City mail center, a few blocks from company headquarters. A day later, a similar one was found at a business in a Chicago skyscraper.

Man Takes Plea Bargain In Bomb Case (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138831

A Flomaton man originally accused of making bombs has accepted a plea bargain, admitting to a misdemeanor.

Gregory Wendell Nichols pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Mobile on Wednesday to improper storage of explosives. He faces a maximum of one year's incarceration, but prosecutors have agreed to recommend probation. U.S. Magistrate Judge Bert Milling Jr. set sentencing for March 23.

A jury in January failed to reach a verdict in Nichols' case, and both sides were preparing to retry it this month. Jury selection had been scheduled for Monday.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis and Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden struck a deal prior to Wednesday's hastily called hearing. Neither could be reached for comment Thursday.

As recently as Tuesday, both lawyers expressed confidence about winning the second round.

Agents for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5 after getting a tip. Nichols permitted the agents to search his white Ford Ranger pickup truck, and they reported finding five homemade explosive devices.

Nichols admitted that he made the devices using spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He told jurors last month that he packed the cylindrical canisters -- which were about 2 inches long -- with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape and attached a firecracker fuse.

But Nichols insisted the devices were firecrackers, not bombs. He told jurors that he made them so that he and his fiancée could drop them into a river. He said he never intended to hurt anyone.

Prosecutors argued that Nichols' intent was irrelevant. The devices were themselves dangerous and illegal. They offered testimony from a ballistics expert who conducted tests he said proved the devices were dangerous.

A defense expert witness countered that the devices were weak explosives.

IMMIGRATION:

Bipartisan Opinions Sought On Immigration (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Far from being secretive, the top senator drafting the major Senate immigration bill this year says he has invited a host of senators to help out and has kept the Bush administration in the loop the entire time, despite accusations to the contrary.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and chairman of the immigration subcommittee, has held several meetings with lawmakers, including a recent one with top Republican and Democratic senators on the issue. He also talked with President Bush in January and last week spoke with White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten about the bill, Mr. Kennedy's office says.

"I look forward to introducing a comprehensive immigration reform bill with Sen. John McCain and our House colleagues in the coming weeks and continuing to work with the bipartisan coalition behind the legislation that passed the Senate last year," Mr. Kennedy said yesterday.

On Wednesday, Sen. Arlen Specter, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee, used the committee's first immigration hearing of the year to publicly accuse Mr. Kennedy of leaving him and his staff out of the process.

"I have been concerned about reading what is happening behind the scenes in the newspapers," Mr. Specter said. He called his comment a "word of caution" to Mr. Kennedy and said he needs to cooperate if he hopes to earn Republican support.

Democrats will need that Republican support to pass a bill in the Senate.

Mr. Kennedy is drafting a new measure with Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, and two House members: Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, and Rep. Luis V. Gutierrez, Illinois Democrat.

Mr. Kennedy's office says they are reaching out to the bipartisan coalition that helped pass a broad bill, 62-36, in the Senate last year. That bill offered a path to citizenship to most illegal aliens and created a new program for immigrant workers to come in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0138832

House Republican leaders called it an amnesty and refused to consider it, instead forcing through a measure to build hundreds of miles of two-tier fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

In drafting the new bill, Mr. Kennedy's office said staffers are in regular contact with other offices, and have had three meetings with White House staff to go over bill details. In addition, Mr. Kennedy and Mr. McCain had a meeting Feb. 15 that included Mr. Specter and the Senate's Hispanic members: Sens. Mel Martinez, Florida Republican, Ken Salazar, Colorado Democrat and Robert Menendez, New Jersey Democrat.

Six other senators, all of whom supported last year's bill, were invited but did not attend: Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican; Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent; Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat and Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and the chairman of the full Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Kennedy's spokeswoman, Laura Capps, said the senators did discuss specific provisions at the recent meeting. She also said the sponsors plan to circulate a draft before they officially introduce a bill, but said the final version will be the work of the four chief sponsors.

Yesterday, though, Mr. Specter repeated his accusation.

"We have not been a party to the drafting of the bill. It's surprising and disquieting," he said. He also said he tried to work in a bipartisan way when he was chairman of the Judiciary Committee last year to try to get a bill done.

But one staffer involved in the negotiations said Mr. Specter had "zero consultation" last year before he, as chairman of the committee, drafted his own bill and dropped it on the committee.

"It's completely hypocritical," the staffer said.

The Path To Citizenship (NYT)

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

On Wednesday, Congress took its first crack at immigration reform since the great nothing of 2006. The Senate Judiciary Committee invited Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez to testify on the issue. With a new Congress and a new comprehensive immigration bill expected to be introduced in the Senate within days, the hearing could have been the first spark of a rejuvenated campaign by an alliance of Congressional Democrats, moderate Republicans and the Bush administration to finally solve a problem that has festered for too long.

It wasn't. That's because both Mr. Chertoff and Mr. Gutierrez slunk away from a central pillar of comprehensive reform: a path to citizenship that would give illegal immigrants — the ones who wait and prove they deserve it — the chance to participate fully and proudly in the life of this country.

Polls show that most Americans would let illegal immigrants get right with the law and become Americans, too, if they have clean records, learn English and pay back taxes and fines. Weighed against keeping the shadowy status quo or deporting 12 million people, a citizenship path strikes them as a proper blend of justice and common sense. Last year's stalled Senate bill took this approach, and it will surely be central to any new legislation.

But the idea sticks in the craws of the members of a vocal, mostly Republican faction that wants every door to opportunity for illegal immigrants shut and locked, except the one marked "guest workers." Those they would keep because they don't mind having an underclass of docile, ill-paid foreigners who do America's dirtiest jobs and then go home.

There is a place for some temporary workers in the American economy. But such programs are highly prone to abuse and are not a solution for the vast numbers of illegal immigrants already here.

Mr. Gutierrez and Mr. Chertoff enthusiastically talked up guest-worker programs on Wednesday, but pointedly left citizenship off the table. They could have been talking tactically, working at President Bush's behest to soothe the passions of skeptical Republicans. But there must be a limit to the accommodations given to anti-amnesty ideologues. If Mr. Bush has the stomach to fight for the real reform he says he wants, he is hiding it well.

Mr. Bush said nothing about a path to citizenship in his State of the Union address in January. If he is too weakened to stand up for comprehensive reform, then Democrats and Republicans in Congress need to unite and do it for him.

Colorado's Immigration Policy Backfires (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0138833

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

IN THE 2004 SATIRICAL film "A Day Without a Mexican," California wakes up to discover that its Latinos have mysteriously vanished, and a society deeply reliant on migrant labor starts to crumble. Life is imitating art in Colorado. After passing what might be the nation's toughest anti-immigrant laws, the state is having its beleaguered day with fewer immigrants.

With no one left to pick them, crops are rotting in the fields, and the construction industry and other businesses that rely on low-skilled labor are experiencing a worker shortage. The situation is so bad for the state's growers that officials plan to send prison inmates out to harvest crops. How very 19th century.

Immigrants are fleeing Colorado because of harsh laws passed during a special session of the Legislature last summer that require state identification for government services and allow police to check suspects' immigration status. The ID laws have raised the ire even of many native-born people, who complain about hassles for those trying to get a driver's license.

If chasing away immigrants has caused problems in Colorado, imagine the economic chaos it would bring to California, where immigrants make up about a third of the workforce and the agriculture industry dwarfs Colorado's. The Rocky Mountain blues are also demonstrating that, contrary to nativist rhetoric, there really are jobs that Americans won't do. In Pueblo, Colo., desperate farmers are offering up to $9.60 an hour for pickers — well in excess of the federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour and more than they have paid migrants in the past — but there are few takers.

Turning prisoners into farmers is no solution. People aren't sentenced to hard labor anymore, so only volunteers are available for prison work programs. And not too many inmates will do backbreaking field work for 60 cents a day — the going rate for prisoners under Colorado's pilot program.

Colorado is learning a painful lesson about the foolishness of a piecemeal, state-by-state response to illegal immigration and about the economic effect of a strictly punitive approach. The only solution with a chance of working is comprehensive federal legislation that would document immigrants already in this country as guest workers and provide them with a path to citizenship, as well as tightening border security. Election-year politics torpedoed President Bush's efforts to pass such reforms last year. To see the result of the opposite approach, look no further than Pueblo.

TAX:

SEC Scrutinises Google's Tax Methods (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Google's method of accounting for income taxes has come under the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission, the first time since its 2004 initial public offering that it has attracted the attention of securities regulators.

The internet search company disclosed the informal inquiry in its latest 10K annual report, which was filed on Thursday. The SEC had first approached it for information about its tax accounting in March last year, the company said, leading to an exchange of letters that is still ongoing.

The SEC's initial approach came just weeks after Google had surprised Wall Street with the news that its tax rate had climbed unexpectedly in the final quarter of 2005. That, in turn, dented its profits, contributing to a slide in its share price that persisted for much of last year. It took nine months for Google's shares finally to climb decisively back above their level of early January.

Google blamed the high tax charge on a shift in its business mix, which had seen more of its investment spending move to faster-growing international markets and away from the US. As a result, a higher proportion of its profits were attributed to its operations in its domestic market, where it generally faces a higher tax rate than elsewhere.

The extent of the swing in the company's tax liabilities took investors by surprise, particularly since it was considerably sharper than Google's own forecasts had indicated just weeks before.

The SEC's inquiry into Google's tax accounting, contained in a series of four comment letters to the company, marks the first public sign of the agency's interest in the company since its market debut. An extensive interview with the company's founders in Playboy magazine, published during the “quiet period” ahead of its IPO, was one of a number of events that delayed the share sale for some months.

DOJ_NMG_0138834

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Army Fires Commander Of Walter Reed (WP)

By Steve Vogel And William Branigin

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The commander of Walter Reed Army Medical Center was fired yesterday after the Army said it had lost trust and confidence in his leadership in the wake of a scandal over outpatient treatment of wounded troops at the Northwest Washington hospital complex.

Army Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who assumed command of Walter Reed in August, will be temporarily replaced by Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley. But the appointment of Kiley, who had earlier been the facility's commander, surprised some Defense Department officials because soldiers, their families and veterans' advocates have complained that he had long been aware of problems at Walter Reed and did nothing to improve its outpatient care.

The action came 10 days after a Washington Post series exposed the squalid living conditions for some outpatient soldiers at Walter Reed and bureaucratic problems that prevented many from getting the care they need.

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said in a statement. "When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

A senior Defense Department official said Gates had demanded quick action to show that the Pentagon was serious about improvements at Walter Reed. But the official said that Gates was not involved in the appointment of Kiley.

Now surgeon general of the Army and commander of the U.S. Army Medical Command, Kiley will take over temporarily as commander of Walter Reed "until a general officer is selected for this important leadership position," the Army said in a statement.

Kiley was commander at Walter Reed until 2004. He has called the Post stories a "one-sided representation" of conditions at the facility. "While we have some issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure at Walter Reed," he said.

Weightman, an easygoing, open Army leader, is well respected in the military medical community and well liked among the staff at Walter Reed. He took command in August and instituted some changes to improve outpatient care. The defense official said his firing and replacement by Kiley are likely to be demoralizing to the staff at the medical center.

The Army is already cracking down on some staff members after the reports of poor care. A number of soldiers have been reassigned from their duties at Walter Reed, including a captain and several sergeants, according to an Army official. More than 100 soldiers will arrive at Walter Reed later this month to permanently reinforce the medical brigade responsible for overseeing outpatient care.

Yesterday, an independent review panel appointed by Gates to investigate outpatient care at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda held its first meeting at the Pentagon.

The group will "identify any critical shortcomings and opportunities to improve the rehabilitative care, administrative processes, and quality of life for injured and sick members of the armed forces" at Walter Reed and -- though there have been no complaints of poor care there -- at the Navy hospital, said William Winkenwerder Jr., assistant secretary of defense for health affairs.

The Army said the decision to relieve Weightman was made Wednesday after several days of consideration. Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey consulted with Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, and Gen. Richard A. Cody, the vice chief of staff, according to Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman.

"Maj. Gen. Weightman was informed . . . that the senior Army leadership had lost trust and confidence in the commander's leadership abilities to address needed solutions for soldier-outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center," the Army statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0138835

Weightman, a West Point graduate, served with the 82nd Airborne Division during the invasion of Panama and the Persian Gulf War. During the early stages of the Iraq war, he served as command surgeon for coalition land forces. As commander of Walter Reed, Weightman also headed the North Atlantic Regional Medical Command.

Last Friday, Weightman published an open letter in the hospital newspaper responding to the Post series, "The Other Walter Reed," disputing its criticisms.

"First and foremost, I want to assure all the staff that I do not believe that there is the 'other' Walter Reed," Weightman wrote. "I firmly believe that we deliver the same level of world-class healthcare to all our patients and their families, regardless of whether they are inpatients or outpatients."

Shortly after noon yesterday, Weightman sent out an e-mail to the entire Walter Reed garrison announcing his relief. "I am confident that you will continue to do a great job . . .," he wrote. "You're a great team and I have been honored to work with you."

Chief Of Walter Reed Hospital Fired Over Troop Treatment (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

Poor outpatient care for soldiers injured in Iraq and Afghanistan is cited.

The general in charge of the Walter Reed Army Medical Center was stripped of his command Thursday after revelations that wounded soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan were receiving slipshod outpatient treatment at the prestigious facility.

Senior Army officials said they had "lost trust and confidence" in Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who led the medical center for six months, after a series of articles in the Washington Post.

The stories detailed the substandard facilities and confusing bureaucracy that wounded troops faced once they were released from their initial treatment.

Weightman acknowledged the problems in interviews after the shortcomings were disclosed, saying the center's outpatient system was overwhelmed by the unexpectedly high number of wounded soldiers returning from war.

But he said that most of the problems predated his tenure, and that he had spent most of his time overseeing an increase in case workers and military officers who handled outpatient services.

Veterans groups welcomed Weightman's dismissal, but noted that the officer chosen to replace him on an interim basis — Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the head of all Army medical programs — was Weightman's predecessor at Walter Reed and that he might be responsible for some of the hospital's problems.

"It's good to see someone held accountable," said Paul Rieckhoff, executive director of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America. "But you can't just drop one person and make him the scapegoat."

One military official said the Army was continuing to examine Kiley's oversight of Walter Reed to determine whether he knew of the problems in the outpatient facilities.

"Those questions are being looked at," said the official, who spoke on condition on anonymity. "Is this it? We don't know. Potentially, there could be other heads that roll."

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey, meeting with Pentagon reporters before announcing Weightman's dismissal, declined to answer questions about the Walter Reed investigation. His spokesman told reporters that any discussion about the medical center's problems was "off the table."

In a statement, the Army said Harvey had set up an "action plan" to find any additional shortcomings.

"We'll fix as we go; we'll fix as we find things wrong," Harvey said in the statement.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates endorsed Harvey's move.

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," Gates said in a statement.

"When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

White House spokesman Scott M. Stanzel, traveling with President Bush in the Gulf Coast, praised the decision.

DOJ_NMG_0138836

"We agree with the Army's decision to make a change at Walter Reed," he said. "Our returning servicemen and women deserve to receive the best treatment possible."

The Army secretary's action was designed to send a message about how seriously the Pentagon took the problems at Walter Reed. Although the Navy has routinely dismissed senior commanders because of accidents, it is rare for an Army general to be relieved of command.

"The decision to do this is not taken nonchalantly; the results are final," the military official said. "It is career-ending."

In addition to Weightman, a captain and four noncommissioned officers were relieved of duty, military officials said.

Lawmakers in Washington applauded the move, saying it marked a change from previous Pentagon practice, including its response to prisoner abuse scandals.

"This step was decisive," said Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.). "We can look back over the last several years for incidents, including Abu Ghraib, where senior commanders were not held accountable properly."

Last week, Gates announced the formation of an independent commission to investigate problems at Walter Reed and to find out if similar issues existed at other medical facilities. Commission members, who met for the first time Thursday at the Pentagon, will report to Gates by mid-April.

The problems at Walter Reed, first reported in the Post articles last month, are found mainly in the outpatient treatment of soldiers who have left Walter Reed's hospital, which has received almost universal praise for saving the lives of troops who would have died from similar injuries in previous conflicts.

In one outpatient housing facility at Walter Reed, the Post detailed a building full of mold and insects.

The newspaper also alleged that poor outpatient oversight resulted in wounded soldiers who slipped through medical and bureaucratic cracks.

When the reports first surfaced, Weightman acknowledged that the system had been overwhelmed for two years, when the number of outpatients peaked at 872 from a prewar level of about 100. But he insisted that, since taking command, he had ramped up the number of case workers and military officers responsible for overseeing outpatients.

Weightman, a family physician by training, is a graduate of the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. He served in the Army as an infantry officer for five years before going to medical school.

He was the chief medical officer for the Pentagon during the buildup to the war in Iraq and was in charge of all medical planning until the end of large-scale operations in May 2003.

peter.spiegel@latimes.com

Times staff writer Julian E. Barnes contributed to this report.

Army Removes Chief Of Walter Reed Hospital (USAT/AP)

By Robert Burns

USA Today, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Army on Thursday fired the general in charge of Walter Reed Army Medical Center, saying he was the wrong person to fix embarrassing failures in the treatment of wounded soldiers that have soiled the institution's reputation as a first-class hospital.

Less than a week after Defense Secretary Robert Gates visited Walter Reed and said those responsible would be "held accountable," the Army announced it had relieved Maj. Gen. George Weightman of command. He is a physician who had headed the hospital for only six months.

In a brief announcement, the Army said service leaders had "lost trust and confidence" in Weightman's leadership abilities "to address needed solutions for soldier outpatient care." It said the decision to fire him was made by Army Secretary Francis Harvey.

The Army and the Defense Department began investigations after The Washington Post published stories last week that documented problems in soldiers' housing and in the medical bureaucracy at Walter Reed, which has been called the Army's premier caregiver for soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0138837

The problems at Walter Reed pertain not to the quality of medical care for wounded soldiers but rather to the treatment of those who are well enough to be outpatients, living in Army housing at Walter Reed. One building was singled out in the Post reports as being in bad repair, including having mold on interior walls.

Gates issued a brief statement Thursday endorsing Harvey's action against Weightman.

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," Gates said. "When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

In an interview with several reporters two days before the first Post story was published, Weightman acknowledged shortcomings at Walter Reed but also said the problems were magnified because of the facility's location in the nation's capital. "We're a fishbowl," he said, adding that it's easier for complaining patients and families to attract Congress' attention.

General Is Fired Over Conditions At Walter Reed (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — The two-star general in charge of Walter Reed Army Medical Center was relieved of command on Thursday, following disclosures that wounded soldiers being treated as outpatients there were living in dilapidated quarters and enduring long waits for treatment.

The officer, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, a physician and a graduate of West Point, was fired because Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey "had lost trust and confidence" in his ability to make improvements in outpatient care at Walter Reed, the Army said in a brief statement.

The revelations about conditions at the hospital, one of the Army's best-known and busiest centers for treating soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan, have embarrassed the Army and prompted two investigations, several Congressional inquiries and a rush to clean up the accommodations for outpatients, where residents lived with mold on the walls, stained carpets and other problems.

A series of disclosures published prominently in The Washington Post about the living conditions, the red tape that ensnarled treatment, and other serious problems have challenged the notion promoted for years by the Army — especially since the war in Iraq — that wounded soldiers receive unparalleled care at Walter Reed.

Army officials have defended the treatment provided to most patients at Walter Reed, especially the most serious cases, those admitted to inpatient wards on the hospital's campus a few miles from the center of Washington.

But they have acknowledged that the large number of wounded from Iraq and Afghanistan, currently around 650 patients, has taxed doctors, nurses and other care providers and forced them to rely more heavily on overflow facilities to house outpatients who must remain near the hospital for treatment.

Officials refused to provide the specific reasons for General Weightman's firing.

The Army has admitted in recent weeks that the system it uses to decide whether wounded soldiers who have been moved to outpatient status will be able to return to active duty often takes too long and has promised to change the system. At Walter Reed the process has taken an average of over 200 days, a source of frustration to soldiers and families who are awaiting decisions about what benefits they will receive if they retire.

Treatment of wounded soldiers has also been spotlighted recently in a documentary recounting the treatment received by the ABC News anchorman Bob Woodruff, who was wounded in Iraq last year. Mr. Woodruff contrasted his care with that of soldiers, finding that Veterans Administration regional medical centers provide retired soldiers with good care but that local V.A. hospitals are less skilled at dealing with complex problems like traumatic brain injuries.

Mr. Harvey told reporters Thursday that the Army was also examining conditions at other medical facilities, both in the United States and abroad. "We'll fix as we find things wrong," he said.

Paralleling the Army effort, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates appointed a panel last week to examine conditions at Walter Reed and other Defense Department hospitals it chooses, including the Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md.

Mr. Gates endorsed the decision to relieve General Weightman in a statement Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0138838

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," he said. "When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

Mr. Gates had signaled earlier, after a visit to Walter Reed, that senior officials would probably be relieved of command.

A Pentagon official said that, in addition to General Weightman, a captain, two noncommissioned officers, and an enlisted soldier involved in outpatient treatment were being reassigned. He said he could not provide further information because of Defense Department confidentiality rules.

General Weightman assumed command of the North Atlantic Regional Medical Command and Walter Reed Army Medical Center on August 25, 2006. He oversees medical facilities in seven other states in addition to Walter Reed and is one of the most senior officers to be relieved in connection with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. He could not be reached for comment.

The Army said that command of Walter Reed would be taken over temporarily by Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the Army's top medical officer.

A 1973 graduate of the United States Military Academy, General Kiley received a medical degree in 1982 from the University of Vermont and has held a series of medical commands in the past two decades, including "land component command surgeon" during the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

In comments to reporters on Feb. 16, just before the first of a series of articles was published by The Post, General Weightman conceded that there were problems with outpatient care at Walter Reed, but said that improvements were being made.

"The family members get a little frustrated because, I mean, we are really disrupting their lives," The Associated Press quoted him as saying.

In the last year, General Weightman said, Walter Reed had increased to 17 from 4 the number of caseworkers charged with helping outpatients with the paperwork and other requirements of the patient disability evaluation system, which determines whether soldiers can remain in the military or retire with full benefits.

He said that the process often took months or years at Walter Reed because the hospital handled some of the most complex medical cases, involving head trauma and other conditions that made gauging recovery difficult.

Outpatients at Walter Reed have received initial treatment but require further care or rehabilitation before retiring from the armed forces or returning to active duty.

Addressing reports that recovering soldiers were asked to attend daily inspection, even when under medication, Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman, said that there would be periodic inspections in the outpatient facilities. Mr. Boyce added that soldiers who are able were asked to attend a daily morning meeting where treatment options and other information were discussed but that the sessions were not inspections.

Mr. Boyce said the worst conditions in the outpatient residences had been corrected but added the Army was planning to make more repairs, like replacing a faulty heating and air-conditioning system that was the cause of the mold on the walls.

Head Of US Military Hospital Dismissed (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The Pentagon on Thursday dismissed the head of Walter Reed military hospital for providing abysmal living conditions for wounded soldiers returning home from Iraq and Afghanistan.

Robert Gates, US defence secretary, relieved Major General George Weightman as commander of the military facility following a recent Washington Post investigation, which revealed that many soldiers were housed in sub-standard, rodent-infested housing, some were being refused disability benefits, while others with drug and alcohol problems were not receiving adequate care.

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," Mr Gates said yesterday. "When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

DOJ_NMG_0138839

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have claimed the lives of 3,525 US troops. But the number of non-fatal casualties is far higher, almost 25,000. More than 11,000 of the wounded soldiers have not returned to the battlefield.

Military analysts say the ratio of soldiers wounded to killed in Iraq and Afghanistan – at about 7:1 – is much higher than for previous conflicts. They attribute the increase to several factors, including improvements in body and vehicle armour, and the fact that the military has better medical facilities in conflict zones. The military has also increased the speed with which it can transfer injured soldiers back to hospitals in the US.

The Pentagon has been quick to condemn the conditions at Walter Reed, which were revealed as President George W. Bush attempts to shore up moribund support for his military "surge" in Iraq. A recent ABC News/Washington Post poll showed that public support for the conflict in Iraq continues to slide. A total of 67 per cent of respondents disapprove of Mr Bush's hand-ling of Iraq, while another 67 per cent oppose the surge of 21,500 troops.

The Walter Reed scandal has generated bi-partisan criticism from lawmakers who have in recent weeks been more busy debating the merits of the surge.

"Our nation has a duty to honour and support those who have served and sacrificed so much in the defence of our nation," said Hillary Clinton, the New York Democratic senator who is running for president in 2008. "Yet these recent news reports indicate that for nearly four years since the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq began, not enough has been done to assist these courageous men and women in recovering from the wounds of battle." The Pentagon has appointed Lieutenant General Kevin Kiley, the army surgeon-general, as temporary commander of Walter Reed.

The Washington Post on Thursday reported that Lt Gen Kiley was warned as early as 2003 of problems in the hospital. Senator Barack Obama, another Democratic presidential hopeful, on Thursday accused the administration of underestimating the resources needed to support veterans of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

The response from the Pentagon stands in contrast to the aftermath of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Donald Rumsfeld, the former secretary of defence, came under criticism for not firing any senior officers over the scandal which tainted the US image worldwide.

Freshman Senator Takes Lead On Hot Controversy (MCT)

By David Goldstein

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sens. Claire McCaskill and Barack Obama led the charge this week on one of the hottest war-related controversies since Abu Ghraib.

They introduced legislation that would ensure that wounded soldiers are housed in clean conditions, have quick access to care and face an easier time claiming their disability benefits.

Their bill resulted from recent stories in The Washington Post about outpatients at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, one of the nation's premier military hospitals, who lived in squalor even as they battled the military bureaucracy for their benefits.

"This is about a system that is not trying to make it easy for the wounded to get what they deserve," McCaskill said during a news conference Thursday with Obama, an Illinois Democrat.

How did McCaskill, a freshman Democratic senator from Missouri who's been on Capitol Hill barely long enough for a cup of coffee, seize the spotlight on such a highly charged issue? And with Obama no less, a megawatt celebrity candidate for president who draws attention like wool draws lint.

This is the latest in an occasional series examining how novice McCaskill tries to translate the hopes of voters who sent her to Washington into becoming an effective operator in Congress. She's climbing a learning curve.

McCaskill didn't get a single question at their news conference

"He uses most of the oxygen," she said, laughing. "But one of the reasons I'm here is that he agreed to do it. I'm the last to complain about all the clicks being for him. The guy moves his hand and 1,000 shutters go off."

Their partnership started Presidents Day weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0138840

Early word that an issue was brewing led Obama's staff initially to assume that it involved the Department of Veterans Affairs. Obama serves on the Senate Committee on Veterans Affairs, so the issue seemed squarely in his wheelhouse.

It was actually more in McCaskill's. She serves on the Senate Armed Services Committee, and the Army runs Walter Reed, which treats active-duty soldiers.

On reading the newspaper reports, "I felt sick," McCaskill said.

"Somewhere along the line, someone saw this and said to themselves, `We're not supposed to complain.' Any fresh set of eyes looking at rotting ceilings and peeling mold, and realizing our battle-weary men and women are being forced into those circumstances would say, `Whoa. This is wrong.' Somebody ought to have pounded the table somewhere."

She decided that she would. She directed her staff to collect information about the problems, which the online magazine Salon first reported more than a year ago, and how she could help fix them.

In the Senate hierarchy, McCaskill knows her place: fourth from the bottom in seniority. She figured that more senior colleagues would wade quickly into the controversy. The outrage level was blinking red, after all. Still, there was no harm in being prepared.

When McCaskill and Obama aides spoke that Sunday and realized that their bosses had the same idea, a flurry of e-mails and phone calls ensued over the next 24 hours.

"Next thing I know," McCaskill said, "I got a call ... (reporting that) `Obama's office will drop a bill the first of the week. Do you want to work with him?' I'm beginning to learn this culture of the staff and how active and how on top of it they are."

About 8 o'clock Presidents Day evening, the two staffs posted a heads-up to their colleagues in other Senate Democratic offices that McCaskill and Obama planned to sponsor a bill to fix the problems at Walter Reed.

McCaskill was at a disadvantage. Obama had three aides who work on veterans' issues and knew the problems that wounded soldiers face. McCaskill was still gearing up. Until recently she'd had only one legislative assistant to handle her entire portfolio of issues involving the military, homeland security, commerce and Indian affairs.

She'd since hired more, and by chance it was the first week on the job for her new military expert, a former infantry captain who'd helped invade Iraq. He toured Walter Reed with other Senate aides.

This week, McCaskill and her top aides gathered in her small, temporary office to prep her to tour Walter Reed on Wednesday. A key question to the hospital brass would be: In light of the problems, where's the accountability going to be in the senior chain of command?

McCaskill was cynical: "It's going to be like the prison," she told them, referring to the scandal over Abu Ghraib, a U.S. military prison in Baghdad where Iraqi prisoners were tortured. "The guys at the bottom will be held accountable and the guys at the top will not."

After her tour, she said most of the top officials she'd met recognized how steep a climb they face to restore trust. But some "seemed very closed-minded and defensive," she said. "One bragged this process has to be dispassionate, which seems to me to be oxymoronic."

Her bill with Obama has begun to draw bipartisan support. Hearings on Walter Reed will start next week.

It's pretty heady stuff for a senator who's just a few months removed from the state capital where she'd been the state auditor. She just might make a difference.

"Introducing legislation is not anything exceptional," said Ross K. Baker, an expert on the Senate at Rutgers University. "What is exceptional is if it eventually improves the conditions at Walter Reed. She would be in a charmed circle. Very few freshmen are able to author a major piece of legislation."

Not 'A Good-News Story' (WP)

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

YESTERDAY THE Post reported that Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley heard years ago from a veterans advocate and even a member of Congress that outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center was distressingly squalid and disorganized. That commander proceeded to do little, even though he lives across the street from the outpatient facilities in a spacious Georgian house. Also yesterday, the Army announced that Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, the head of Walter Reed since August, had been relieved of his command. His temporary replacement? None other than Gen. Kiley.

DOJ_NMG_0138841

Here's where the story stops making sense. Much of The Post's article detailed the abuse by omission that Gen. Kiley, not Gen. Weightman, committed, first as head of Walter Reed, then in his current post as Army surgeon general. Gen. Weightman, who very well might deserve his disgrace, has commanded Walter Reed for only half a year, while Gen. Kiley, now back in charge of Walter Reed, headed the hospital and its outpatient facilities for two years and has led the Army's medical command since. Rep. C.W. Bill Young (R-Fla.) and his wife say they repeatedly told Gen. Kiley about unhealthful conditions in outpatient facilities.

While Gen. Kiley was ignoring Walter Reed's outpatients, he was assuring Congress that he was doing just the opposite. A staffer for Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) told us yesterday that Gen. Kiley told the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform in 2005 that the performance of the medical holdover program, which covers 69 of the 76 residents of Building 18, "is a good-news story." In response to questions Mr. Davis submitted, Gen. Kiley stated, "the Army Surgeon General has made their care the medical treatment facilities' top priority." At best, Gen. Kiley was ignorant of the conditions at Walter Reed.

We are glad that the Army is finally taking the issue of outpatient care seriously enough to effectively end the career of a major general for presiding over the disgraceful condition of Building 18. But the evidence compiled so far suggests that Gen. Kiley has been more complicit in the scandalous neglect of Walter Reed's outpatient facilities for longer than Gen. Weightman has been. It also indicates that the Army's reshuffle is really about projecting the appearance of accountability, not punishing those most responsible. As Mr. Young said yesterday of Gen. Weightman, "I don't know him. But I know he's the fall guy."

Rice Names Critic Of Iraq Policy To Counselor's Post (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has tapped Eliot A. Cohen, a prominent writer on national security strategy and an outspoken critic of the administration's postwar occupation of Iraq, as her counselor, State Department officials said yesterday.

Cohen would replace Philip D. Zelikow, a longtime Rice associate who left the administration earlier this year to return to teaching history at the University of Virginia. Despite Cohen's sometimes caustic views on administration policies, officials said he has impressed both Rice and President Bush with his writings, especially "Supreme Command," a study of the relationship between civilian commanders in chief and their military leaders.

In hiring Cohen, a professor at the John Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies whose son served a tour of duty as an Army officer in Iraq, Rice has lured a leading figure of the neoconservative movement as her policies toward North Korea and Iran draw fierce attack from the Republican Party's right wing. Cohen has connections in that circle and deep roots in the military establishment, and he is likely to concentrate initially on Iraq and Afghanistan and on reshaping the State Department to better handle post-conflict environments.

The counselor position is unique to the State Department. It was once one of the top jobs at Foggy Bottom -- formerly held by such luminaries as George F. Kennan, Robert Lansing and Helmut Sonnenfeldt -- but it laid dormant during Bush's first term until it was resurrected by Rice. Zelikow played a critical role for Rice as an intellectual sounding board, operating as a one-person think tank who churned out policy papers on a variety of issues and took on special tasks while unencumbered with managerial responsibilities.

Cohen, in an interview, said Rice's job offer surprised him. "I have known her for a long time, but we did not have a close relationship," he said. He received a call from her office that Rice wanted to discuss policy, but once he arrived at her office, she got straight to the point and said she was interested in hiring him.

Cohen said he made sure to discuss his views on a range of issues but Rice appeared to value his different perspective and was unbothered by the prospect of internal disagreements. He declined to discuss his opinions yesterday, saying he planned to provide "unvarnished and discreet advice" to Rice. "I already have teeth marks on my tongue," he said, though he acknowledged his long paper trail will provide fodder for journalists.

DOJ_NMG_0138842

"I'm sure you guys will have fun with that," Cohen said.

In a 2005 article for The Washington Post titled "A Hawk Questions Himself as His Son Goes to War," Cohen wrote that while the decision to invade was sound, "what I did not know then that I do know now is just how incompetent we would be at carrying out that task." He derided what he called "cockamamie schemes" in creating the Iraq army and the "under-planned, under-prepared and in some respects mis-manned Coalition Provisional Authority."

"The scholar in me is not surprised when our leaders blunder, although the pundit in me is dismayed when they do," Cohen wrote. " What the father in me expects from our leaders is, simply, the truth -- an end to happy talk and denials of error, and a seriousness equal to that of the men and women our country sends into the fight."

When Rice was named secretary of state after four years as national security adviser, Cohen wrote in the Wall Street Journal that the administration's foreign policy had "backbone and clarity of vision" but also "sheer stubbornness, culpable tactlessness and more dangerously, a lack of realism." He described the decision-making circle overseen by Rice as a "small, intimate coterie," saying such "policy-making groups become contemptuous of disagreement, indifferent to contrary arguments and at the end, impervious to reality itself."

But Cohen was also fiercely critical of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report, writing in the Wall Street Journal that "a fatuous process yields, necessarily, fatuous results." Cohen, who has described himself as sympathetic to Israel, also denounced a paper last year by two prominent professors on the influence of the "Israel Lobby" as "inept, even kooky academic work" that was undeniably anti-Semitic.

Cohen is a member of Defense Policy Advisory Board and has on several occasions met with Bush to provide advice on Iraq, but he said he generally has been "perched on the margins [of government] for some time." He said he felt an obligation to serve when the country is at war, "when family is serving, students are serving and friends are serving."

The job does not require Senate confirmation. Cohen is expected to formally take the post in April, after finishing classes at SAIS, though he will begin working as a consultant to Rice before then.

House Eases Rules On Union Organizing (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, March 2, 2007

Democrats rewarded organized labor Thursday for helping them retake control of Congress, passing a House bill that would make it easier for workers to start unions against companies' wishes.

The legislation, passed 241-185 on a nearly party-line vote, would take away the right of employers to demand secret-ballot elections by workers before unions could be recognized.

"It's simply about establishing fairness in the workplace," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md. Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio said the real issue was "taking care of union bosses."

The House action was the second triumph for labor following the Democratic takeover of Congress. The House and Senate also have voted on separate bills to raise the minimum wage.

Labor groups saw the Employee Free Choice Act as one way of halting the downward trend of union membership, now about 12 percent of the work force.

The celebrations may be short-lived. Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., has pledged to block the bill and the White House says President Bush will veto the measure if it reaches his desk.

The House vote was short of the two-thirds majority that would be needed to overturn a veto. Thirteen Republicans voted for the measure; two Democrats voted against it.

Labor groups contend that secret-ballot elections have become a means for employers to intimidate workers into rejecting unions.

"In the past few decades, labor law has been so twisted by corporations and their union-busting hired guns that it is now virtually impossible to form a union against an employer's wishes," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said.

Business groups campaigned against the bill, saying it is an affront to democratic principles and would give high-pressure organizers unimpeded access to workers.

DOJ_NMG_0138843

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said the bill was "the most important labor law reform legislation of this generation."

"It is about basic labor rights, about the rule of the majority free from intimidation and about protecting jobs," she said.

Boehner said the bill really was about "taking care of union bosses. ... This is an effort to help them get more members, to make it easier for them to sign them up and to intimidate them to sign cards."

The legislation, also called the card check bill, would certify a union as soon as a majority of workers at a plant signed cards authorizing it. Currently, employers can require elections, overseen by the National Labor Relations Board, on whether a union should be recognized.

The labor rights group American Rights at Work said that, in the run-up to such elections, 80 percent of employers hire union-busting consultants and 90 percent force employees to attend one-on-one anti-union meetings with their supervisors.

The legislation would toughen penalties against employers who violate worker rights during organizing drives and set up a binding arbitration process to prevent companies from thwarting a new union by bargaining in bad faith on an initial contract.

"In many places, when you exercise your right to organize, you get fired, you get intimidated, you get harassed, you get followed home," said Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee.

But Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon of California, top Republican on the committee, said the bill would take away basic rights to a secret ballot. "That right is squarely in the cross hairs and this chamber is about to pull the trigger," he said before the vote.

McKeon offered a substitute guaranteeing rights to a secret ballot, but it was defeated 256-173.

Labor Secretary Elaine Chao, in a statement issued after the final vote, said it was a sad day when the House "votes to deprive workers of their basic right to a private ballot election."

Labor organizations cite employer coercion as a major factor in the steadily falling percentage of workers who are organized. Union membership has dropped from 20 percent of wage and salary workers in 1983 to 12 percent in 2006. Discounting civil servants, that percentage is 7.4 percent, the Labor Department says.

Unions lost 300,000 dues-paying members last year alone, said one opponent of the bill, Rep. Mark Kirk, R-Ill. "But just because only 12 percent of Americans now choose to pay into a union is no reason to attack our rights as Americans to a secret ballot."

The White House made a similar argument Wednesday in issuing a veto threat. "It is a fundamental tenet of democracy that individuals are able to vote their conscience, privately, free from the threat of reprisal," the White House said.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., sponsor of similar legislation in the Senate, said he would introduce it soon.

McConnell, in a statement, indicated Senate Republicans would make every effort to stop its progress. "We will not allow the progress already made on behalf of U.S. workers to be undone," he said in a statement.

House Vote On Organizing Workers First Of Many Labor Battles (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Amid fierce pressure from business groups and organized labor, the House of Representatives passed legislation making it easier for unions to organize workers, setting the stage for coming battles over labor's legislative agenda.

The Employee Free Choice Act passed 241-185, with 13 Republicans supporting the measure and two Democrats voting against it, and most lawmakers falling into predictable union and business camps. The bill faces a likely Republican filibuster in the Senate, avoiding the need for a presidential veto, which the White House has promised. Both labor and business have said they will use the votes to help them decide whom to back in 2008.

The vote and continuing furor over the legislation, which is organized labor's top priority, highlight how attitudes about unions have become even more polarized in Washington. A massive voter outreach led by the AFL-CIO last fall helped Democrats win control of Congress, a favor labor wants returned. At the same time, a decline in overall union membership has given labor less clout with a more conservative Republican party that is being prodded by business leaders who fear unions will make them less competitive globally.

Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon, a senior Republican, criticized the vote as little more than "big labor's big payoff" for its support of Democrats in the fall election, and said "it's the American workers who are truly paying the price."

DOJ_NMG_0138844

Yet Democratic support was nearly universal, and included many lawmakers who in the past have parted ways with labor on issues such as trade. "People did not see this as a labor-management issue. They saw this as a middle-class issue," said Rep. Robert Andrews (D., N.J.).

The Employee Free Choice Act would let workers choose to join a union once a majority sign cards, a process that would be quicker and less open to employer opposition than a traditional secret-ballot election. Union officials believe it would help reverse labor's decline. Union membership currently stands at 7.4% of the private-sector work force, down from roughly 20% in the early 1980s.

The legislation also toughens penalties against employers who violate labor law during organizing drives and has a provision that makes arbitration mandatory if a first contract isn't reached between a union and an employer. Opponents say the "card-check" method would lead to union coercion.

Labor leaders celebrated the vote. "Because of today's vote, the future looks a little brighter to all Americans who have watched corporations celebrate record profits, but have themselves been shut out of the party," said John Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO.

House Passes Bill That Helps Unions Organize (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Defying a veto threat from the White House, the House of Representatives yesterday approved legislation that would make it far easier for unions to organize workers.

The bill, whose prospects for enactment are troubled at best, would enable employees at a given workplace to unionize as soon as a majority signed cards saying they favored a union. Under current law, companies have a right to insist on a secret-ballot election determining their workers' choice. Labor leaders and many Democrats say such elections are often poisoned by employer coercion and intimidation.

Yesterday's vote, which followed a fierce debate, was 241 to 185, largely along party lines. Thirteen Republicans voted for the bill, and two Democrats against.

The measure is organized labor's No. 1 legislative priority, and Democrats call it vital to rebuilding unions and bolstering the nation's middle class.

But several Republicans described it as little more than a Democratic reward for labor's help in last November's elections. The Republicans argued that the bill, the Employee Free Choice Act, was a betrayal of workers' access to a secret-ballot election. Some called it the "employee intimidation act," maintaining that the process of majority sign-up could well entail union organizers' bullying workers into signing pro-union cards.

Republican leaders are already prepared to block the measure in the Senate, and the White House said Wednesday that President Bush would veto it should it emerge from Congress. Yesterday's vote fell short of the two-thirds majority that would be needed to override.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi called the bill "the most important labor law reform legislation of this generation," adding: "But this legislation is about more than labor law. It's about basic workers' rights. It's about majority rule."

The measure has other provisions as well. Under one, federal officials would appoint an arbitrator to set wages and benefits for workers who did not obtain a contract within 120 days of unionizing. The bill also calls for significantly increasing penalties when employers, contrary to law, fire workers who support a union.

House Bill Would Aid Union Organization (USAT)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Democrats rewarded organized labor Thursday for helping them retake control of Congress, approving 241-185 a House bill that would make it easier for unions to organize workplaces. The legislation would certify a union as soon as a majority of workers at a plant signed cards authorizing it. Current law allows employers to demand that a union win a secret-ballot election by workers before unions are recognized.

DOJ_NMG_0138845

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called the bill "the most important labor law reform legislation of this generation." Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said Democrats were "taking care of union bosses." Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., has pledged to block the bill in the Senate.

Four fired U.S. attorneys subpoenaed

The House Judiciary Committee issued subpoenas for four federal prosecutors who were fired last year by the Justice Department. The committee wants to know if the prosecutors were ousted improperly.

The subpoenas seek testimony from former U.S. attorneys David Iglesias of New Mexico, Carol Lam of California, Bud Cummins of Little Rock and John McKay of Seattle. Eight prosecutors were dismissed. Last month, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that all the prosecutors except Cummins had been dismissed for performance-related reasons. — Kevin Johnson

Report: Obama's ancestors owned slaves

The ancestors of the mother of presidential candidate Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., owned slaves, according to a researcher quoted in The (Baltimore) Sun. William Addams Reitwiesner, who works at the Library of Congress and practices genealogy in his spare time, said a "first draft" of genealogical and Census records shows Obama's great-great-great-great grandfather, George Washington Overall, owned two slaves in Nelson County, Ky. The records also show one of Obama's great-great-great-great-great-grandmothers, Mary Duvall, owned two slaves, he said. The report could not be independently verified. Bill Burton, an Obama spokesman, did not dispute the claim. He said Obama's ancestors "are representative of America."

Bill Easing Organization Of Unions Passes House (WP)

By Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

In the most contentious clash between business and labor groups of the new Congress, the House yesterday passed legislation that would make it easier for workers to organize unions -- a measure that President Bush has promised to veto and that Senate Republican leaders have vowed to filibuster.

Continuing in the populist tone of its first 100 hours, the House's Democratic majority pushed through legislation to remove the right of employers to demand secret-ballot elections and to require employers to recognize unions once a majority of workers sign cards saying they want to organize.

Democratic and labor leaders argued that the existing system has become so tilted in favor of employers that it no longer protects workers' rights. Republicans accused Democrats of trying to eliminate a cornerstone of democracy -- the secret ballot -- as a payback to "union bosses" for the labor movement's support in the 2006 election.

"The Employee Free Choice Act puts democracy back in the workplace so the decision to join a union can be made by the workers the union would represent," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told colleagues. "This is the standard right that we routinely demand for workers around the world. We should accept no less a standard here in America."

The measure would represent one of the most significant revisions of federal labor law in 60 years. It is the top legislative priority of the labor movement, which represents a record low 12 percent of the workforce, compared with 35 percent in the 1950s. Major business lobbies have mobilized against it to a level not seen since the fight over Bush's 2001 tax cuts, according to a Chamber of Commerce official. Yesterday's 241 to 184 vote was largely along party lines, with 13 Republicans voting for the measure and two Democrats opposing it.

Republicans took issue with every aspect of the bill, including its name, the Employee Free Choice Act, which they called "mischievous," "misleading" and "Orwellian." Republican Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) suggested it be called, "The American Worker Compulsion Act," arguing that union organizers could bully workers into signing cards.

The White House took the same tack in promising a presidential veto, should the bill pass the Senate. "It is a fundamental tenet of democracy that individuals are able to vote their conscience, privately, free from the threat of reprisal," its statement read.

The vote fell short of the two-thirds majority required to override a veto.

The lobbying campaign leading up to the vote featured AFL-CIO ads highlighting workers who were fired during union-organizing campaigns, and who waited years to get jobs back or to receive back pay.

DOJ_NMG_0138846

In yesterday's debate, Democrats cited National Labor Relations Board statistics showing that more than 31,000 workers were awarded back pay in 2005 for unfair labor practices. The numbers have risen steadily in the past three decades, from 7,393 in 1975 to 18,434 in 1985 and 26,197 in 1995, according to NLRB annual reports. The House measure would also impose stiff penalties on employers for unfair labor practices and would require federal arbitration to reach labor contracts if newly certified unions and employers do not reach agreement within 90 days.

The business community's campaign was led by a coalition of 300 business organizations in all 50 states, calling itself the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace. The group aired radio ads calling the legislation anti-worker and antidemocratic, and said its efforts generated 27,000 contacts of House members from within the targeted districts.

Democrats and labor leaders hailed the vote yesterday as an answer to the declining fortunes of middle-class workers and the growing income divide. "Because of today's vote, the future looks a little brighter to all Americans who have watched corporations celebrate record profits but have themselves been shut out of the party, left with stagnant wages and facing soaring costs," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said.

Business leaders and Republicans argued otherwise. "Organized labor is not winning [union-organizing] elections because they're not able to articulate a fundamental value proposition to the vast majority of American workers," said Michael J. Lotito, a lawyer who represents employers in labor relations cases. "They're trying to change the process to increase their market share."

House Backs Bill To Ease Unionizing (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Organized labor scored a major victory yesterday as House members voted in favor of a measure to make it easier for workers to join unions.

The House voted 241-185 for the Employee Free Choice Act, which would allow workers to unionize by simply signing a card or petition stating their interest in joining a union, as opposed to the long-standing practice of secret-ballot elections.

Two Democrats voted against the bill, with 13 Republicans supporting it.

"This is the most important labor-law reform legislation of this generation," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

But the bill faces a tough challenge in the Senate, where Democrats have only a slight majority.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, vowed to fight the bill.

"We will not allow the progress already made on behalf of U.S. workers to be undone, nor will we allow coercion by employers or unions," Mr. McConnell said.

The Bush administration also has vowed to veto the bill.

The pending legislation has pitted labor activists and union foes in a fierce lobbying and public-relations campaign the past few months.

Organized labor says the bill is crucial for helping defend itself from anti-union employers and lawmakers.

Opponents say the pending law is nothing more than political payback by Democrats to the unions, which significantly supported the party during the 2006 congressional elections.

Supporters of the bill say the card-signing -- or "card-check" -- method is more fair than holding a secret-ballot election because it's a simpler, more-direct approach for workers to decide if they want to unionize.

And because card-check organizing is considerably quicker than conducting secret-ballot elections, which typically take weeks or longer, proponents say it reduces the potential for employers to harass and intimidate workers against joining a union.

"Today, when workers want to form a union, their employers can force them to undergo a National Labor Relations Board election process, and that process is broken because it allows irresponsible employers to harass, coerce, intimidate, reassign and even fire workers who support a union," said Rep. George Miller, California Democrat and the bill's main sponsor.

Unions have helped make the United States "the most prosperous, most productive nation in the world, with a vibrant middle class," Mr. Miller added.

DOJ_NMG_0138847

Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said the bill is "simply about establishing fairness in the workplace."

But opponents say the bill is a desperate attempt by organized labor to stay relevant.

Union membership peaked in the late 1950s and early 1960s, with more than 35 percent of U.S. workers belonging to a union.

Last year, overall union membership was 12 percent nationally -- down from 12.5 percent in 2005.

The bill would strip workers of their right to vote anonymously when deciding whether to be involved in a union, opponents say.

"We are standing on this floor, considering this bill, and ultimately, casting our votes at the end of this debate because of the power of the secret ballot," said Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon, California Republican. "The privacy and sanctity of the secret ballot is the beauty and the backbone of this democratic process."

Republican opponents accused Democrats of being hypocrites for supporting the bill.

"It's ironic that Democrats who campaigned last November on promises to protect America's privacy rights are now supporting a bill that will strip workers of the right of secret-ballot voting," said Rep. Eric Cantor, Virginia Republican. "This is clearly a Democrat payoff to unions instead of good policy for America."

Rep. Jeb Hensarling, Texas Republican, called the bill the "worker-intimidation act" and said it was a payback by Democrats.

"This bill is a full frontal assault on American workers," Mr. Hensarling said. "What is more fundamental to American democracy than the secret-ballot election?"

But even if the bill is defeated, Democrats almost certainly would raise the issue again if the party captures the White House in 2008, said Peter Morici, a University of Maryland business professor and a former chief economist at the U.S. International Trade Commission.

"This issue isn't going away because the Democrats are starting to believe in it," he said. "It's gaining momentum."

House OKs Bill Making It Easier To Form A Union (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — For the last dozen years, Capitol Hill hasn't been the friendliest place for organized labor. But that's changed with the new Democratic-controlled Congress, and labor is pressing its agenda.

That was apparent Thursday as the House approved a bill to make it easier to form a union — a longtime priority of labor, an important Democratic constituency. The vote was followed by a victory celebration in the House speaker's office attended by the president of the AFL-CIO.

The Senate, meanwhile, is considering a bill to give airport screeners collective bargaining rights. Another labor priority, the first increase in the federal minimum wage in a decade, is expected to clear Congress within weeks.

"This is just the beginning," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said in an interview Thursday. He listed planned labor offenses on healthcare, trade policy and an immigration overhaul.

After years of being shut out, union lobbyists say, they are being invited to meetings on Capitol Hill and asked their views on legislation.

"We were in a major defensive mode," said Charles M. Loveless, legislative director of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

It will still be extremely difficult for labor to get its agenda through a narrowly divided Congress — and past President Bush's veto pen.

What's more, the ranks of labor are dwindling nationally. About 12% of workers belong to a union. That's down from 20% in 1983 and 40% in 1955, said Nelson Lichtenstein, a history professor at UC Santa Barbara.

Unions, faced with globalization, outsourcing and illegal immigration, have become ideologically divided in ways they never were in the 1950s.

DOJ_NMG_0138848

Older, industrial unions like the United Auto Workers have for the most part been fighting for labor protections from international trade, whereas the Service Employees International Union and their labor coalition, Change to Win, have focused on organizing growing segments of the workforce, such as immigrants and temporary workers.

To the extent that there is a unified labor agenda in Washington, it includes legislation to expand paid sick leave, child care, healthcare and pension protections.

Democrats have proposed new bankruptcy legislation that would protect workers' health and pension benefits. They also want to expand the 1993 Family and Medical Leave Act to provide at least six weeks of paid leave for workers to care for themselves, their children or other immediate family.

Democrats also are drafting legislation to reinforce workplace safety and prevent corporations from avoiding pension obligations.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, has talked about reviving a workplace safety bill that would strengthen protections for whistle-blowers and increase penalties for those who repeatedly violated workplace regulations. Kennedy also has proposed legislation that would require employers of 15 or more workers to provide seven paid sick days annually.

Democratic leaders are hoping to wring concessions from Republicans before they consider renewing Bush's trade promotion, or "fast track," authority, which expires July 1. The free-trade wing of the Democratic Party appears to be shrinking, with more legislators like Sen. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) demanding that the administration incorporate labor protections into trade agreements.

All but three of the 42 House Democratic freshmen recently sent a letter to their leadership calling for a new direction on trade, including an end to what they describe as "job-killing agreements."

GOP leaders have indicated a willingness to compromise on trade, but they will probably oppose legislation on union organizing and workplace rights along the lines of the bill that passed the House on Thursday, 241 to 185. Unlike the federal minimum wage increase or changes to trade agreements, the proposed Employee Free Choice Act doesn't come with sweeteners for business interests.

"Senate Republicans are committed to defeating this proposal," said Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), chairman of the Senate Republican Conference. Sen. Michael B. Enzi of Wyoming, the top Republican on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, promised to "work aggressively" to defeat the bill.

The legislation would certify a union as soon as a majority of workers signed cards authorizing it. Under current law, after cards are signed an employer can call for a separate secret ballot — overseen by the National Labor Relations Board — on whether a union should be recognized.

Republicans say the bill would let employers and union officials intimidate workers during organizing campaigns because it would change the process for union elections from a secret ballot to a card check where votes were recorded.

"We respect a worker's right to organize and to join a union, but clearly they ought to have the right to have a secret ballot election," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). "We're fighting to protect workers from intimidation of any kind, whether it be from employers or from those who seek to organize them."

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) has called the proposed Employee Free Choice Act "nothing more than an attempt to pay back big labor, which helped finance Democrat campaigns across America."

But it's not necessary for unions to get legislation past Republicans, the Senate or the president's desk to score a victory with workers and middle-class voters, said Lichtenstein of UC Santa Barbara.

"Whether you pass this stuff is secondary to whether you change the conversation, and I do think that is happening," Lichtenstein said. "The Democrats understand now that labor is indeed their backbone."

Checkmate (WSJ)

By Kimberley Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138849

For Big Labor, this week's "card check" victory marked the ultimate payoff for past Democratic election support. For House Democrats, it marked the end of the honeymoon.

Democrats won in November in part by playing down their special interest patrons -- unions, environmentalists, trial lawyers -- and by playing up a new commitment to the moderate middle class. The big question was whether the party had the nerve to govern the way it campaigned, and card check was the first test. The answer? AFL-CIO chief John Sweeney isn't smiling for nothing.

Up to now, Speaker Nancy Pelosi had kept her troops in line and her party's liberal wing in check. The vaunted first "100 hours" was run like a military operation, and revolved around a carefully chosen legislative agenda that would unify every faction in her party. It was small potatoes, but it worked, and it was a lesson in how Democrats can practice smart politics.

The card check, in contrast, is a lesson in how the party's liberal base forces Democrats to back political losers. The legislation's only purpose is to give unions an unfair advantage in organizing, namely by eliminating the secret ballot in union elections and instead allowing thugs to openly bully workers into joining up. Americans understand and despise this, with polls showing 90% of the public thinks card check is a racket.

Democrats therefore left themselves wide open for their first public drubbing. The card check gave Republicans a rare opening to beat the daylights out of the new majority, successfully accusing it of trashing democratic elections and shutting down free speech. It unified the business community, which put aside its disagreements on health care and immigration to instead team up to make the vote as painful as possible for Ms. Pelosi's moderate wing. Even the liberal press jumped ship.

And all this, meanwhile, for a vote that was largely symbolic. President Bush has vowed that a card check law is dead on arrival. And that assumes the legislation could even make it through a Senate filibuster -- which it can't. As low points go, this was the lowest the new majority has had so far.

The issue for Ms. Pelosi is that this will undoubtedly not be the only low point. The card check is instead the first illustration of the biggest dilemma Democratic leaders will face over the next few years. Savvier party members understand the threat special interests pose to Democrats' ability to commune with more of America. Yet the party is completely dependent on those left-wing interest groups to finance and man their electoral victories. They want a return on their investment.

For years now, unions have provided thousands of volunteers for get-out-the-vote efforts. More important, they've provided a huge purse to get Democrats elected. This time they handed over the money on condition that Democrats support what has become their biggest priority. This week they called in their chits.

Many Democrats also see the card check as vital to their political survival. Union membership has been nosediving for years. In 2006 it dropped to just 12% of workers. The reigning belief is that if Democrats don't do their part to reverse this decline, they'll see a huge source of manpower and cash for future elections disappear. The card check might be terrible politics, but it is the best shot they have to force more Americans into unions that will spend the dues to re-elect Democrats.

Whatever the motivation, enough Democrats were willing to take a hit if it meant getting card check through. Not that they didn't attempt to lessen the sting. One reason this was the first major domestic legislation up for a vote was that Democrats were anxious to get it out of the way quickly, and put space between it and next year's election. House insiders were this week referring to that strategy as the "Rip Off the Band-Aid" approach: This is gonna hurt, so do it fast.

It also explains the pains House Labor and Education Committee Chairman George Miller took to put the bill through as quietly as possible. The card check will be the biggest change in labor law in decades, yet Mr. Miller allowed but a single hearing and markup on the issue. That hearing was held in the middle of the House's very public Iraq debate, the better to avoid any notice.

The issue exploded nonetheless, and it was the party's moderate wing that got caught in the crossfire. Big Labor, to its credit, had approached the card check with a lot more political savvy than is usually the case. In particular, it started approaching Democratic moderates several years ago, demanding they co-sponsor a card check bill. While many in the Blue Dog wing wouldn't normally agree to such an anti-business measure, they saw this as a useful opportunity to score some union points. After all, Republicans weren't about to bring up the legislation. The problem came when Democrats won, and they had to stand behind their previous support.

DOJ_NMG_0138850

The unions' other big coup was to get to this year's Democratic freshmen early in the electoral game. Labor explained that any union support they received in their tight races in GOP-leaning districts would be entirely conditioned on their later vote for card check. Most of them signed up for this devil's bargain, since, as one Democratic aide admitted: "We didn't have a choice."

The business community this week made sure that those Democratic moderates felt the burn. The Coalition for a Democratic Workplace -- a group of more than 300 business outfits against the card check -- earlier this week laid out a six-figure radio buy for just three House districts, targeting North Carolina's Heath Shuler, Florida's Tim Mahoney and Kansas's Nancy Boyda. All three ran as conservative Democrats, and have only tenuous grips on their seats. The Chamber of Commerce spent another $400,000 on radio ads targeting 51 Republicans and Democrats who are also vulnerable next year. The ads had an effect. Card-check supporters had been hoping to get as many as 290 votes; instead they mustered just 241.

Ms. Pelosi might remember that she only won last year's election because of the success of these moderate candidates. They were the ones who benefited most from Democrats' new promises to focus on "middle class" America. And it is the Democratic Party as a whole that will suffer if those promises aren't kept.

Bush Picks Executive As Consumer Watchdog (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday that he would nominate a senior executive of the largest organization representing the nation's manufacturers to head the government agency assigned to protect consumers from dangerous products.

Bush's choice of Michael E. Baroody, executive vice president of the National Assn. of Manufacturers, to be chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission drew an angry response from consumer advocates and predictions of a tough battle for Senate confirmation from the Democratic majority.

Critics, noting Baroody's work for an organization that aims to ease restrictions on a long list of companies making consumer goods, said the nomination would reflect an administration effort to restrict government regulations by executive order and action, rather than by congressional approval.

"I think it's shocking," said Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, a watchdog group founded by Ralph Nader. "It's the fox in the chicken coop."

Claybrook, who led the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration under President Carter, said, "They wanted a hard-liner in the agency to push it into the deregulation mode."

The Consumer Product Safety Commission, established in 1974, issues safety standards for a wide range of products, including lawn mowers, toasters, toys, clothing and furniture — nearly all consumer products except motor vehicles and guns.

It investigates reports of dangerous products, issues recalls and shapes regulations. It also has the option of taking no action on complaints or investigations.

The panel has not had a chairman since July; only two of its five seats are filled. Under its regulations, the commission is unable to take formal action after more than six months without a quorum. It hit the mark in January.

Baroody, 60, was an assistant secretary of Labor and director of public affairs under President Reagan. He also was a speechwriter for Bob Dole when the Kansas senator was chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Both in government and out, Baroody has tangled with advocates of greater government regulation to protect public health and safety:

• In 1988, as assistant secretary of Labor, he defended the Reagan administration's record in protecting workers despite delays in issuing safety rules and efforts to weaken regulations.

• In 2000, he fought an ergonomics rule — put into place by the Clinton administration — that the Occupational Safety and Health Administration said was intended to prevent 300,000 workplace accidents and injuries.

• In 2001, speaking for the National Assn. of Manufacturers, he criticized a Supreme Court ruling rejecting arguments that the Environmental Protection Agency had acted unconstitutionally when it issued standards for limiting smog and soot.

Baroody's nomination must be considered by the Senate Commerce Committee before being voted on by the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0138851

"I intend to give his nomination thorough scrutiny," Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), a Commerce Committee member, said in a statement.

"Here was a golden opportunity to put a true champion of consumers onto a very important commission, and instead President Bush selected someone who represents the special interests," she said. "This administration seems incapable of doing anything in the public interest."

Republican lawmakers did not return calls seeking comment.

The Consumer Product Safety Commission has received no increases in funding, according to Democratic staff members on the Senate Commerce Committee, forcing it to reduce staff and workload because its budget mandates cost-of-living increases for employees.

One staff member, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Democratic senators were concerned that the commission's staff had been deprived of its expertise by what amounted to budget cuts imposed by the Bush administration.

Baroody also was president of the now-defunct National Policy Forum, a Republican-oriented policy research group. He is a graduate of the University of Notre Dame.

Kerry Getting Some Payback For Swift Boat Campaign Of '04 (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — Senator John Kerry may get his parting shot after all.

After his having name sullied during the 2004 presidential campaign by the opposition group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, Mr. Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat, got the chance on Tuesday to sharply question Sam Fox, a major Republican donor who was recently nominated to be ambassador to Belgium, about his $50,000 contribution to the group.

In addition, some of Mr. Kerry's Democratic colleagues on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee now say they will consider voting against Mr. Fox's nomination.

Senator Bill Nelson, Democrat of Florida, said about the donations: "I suspect that other than Senator Kerry, there will be some senators that will not look too kindly for his support of that vicious kind of personal attack."

Mr. Kerry declined on Thursday to say how he would vote. On Tuesday, however, he bore in on Mr. Fox with the zeal of the former prosecutor that he is.

Mr. Kerry asked him to explain why he had donated $50,000 to the Swift boat group and pressed him to identify who had asked him to give. Mr. Fox said he could not remember, explaining that he gave large sums to a variety of groups.

Mr. Kerry continued to hammer him, as Mr. Fox squirmed. Finally the senator asked, "Do you think this should matter to me?"

"I'm sorry?" Mr. Fox asked.

"Do you think this should matter to me?" Mr. Kerry repeated.

"Yes, I do. I do," Mr. Fox said.

A Tug Of War On Presidential Papers' Release (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A bipartisan proposal targeting White House rules on the release of presidential papers would claw back power over public records from the executive branch, advocates of the bill say.

The House measure, introduced yesterday, would overturn President Bush's 2001 executive order adding layers of review before presidential papers are made public. Historians and archivists say the order has kept thousands of documents from public view.

Bush's order "gave current and former presidents and vice presidents broad authority to withhold presidential records or delay their release indefinitely," Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee and a bill sponsor, said in a statement yesterday. Waxman's co-sponsors include Reps. Todd R. Platts (R-Pa.), William Lacy Clay (D-Mo.) and Dan Burton (R-Ind.).

DOJ_NMG_0138852

Bush issued the order after the White House held up the release of 68,000 pages of Ronald Reagan Presidential Library documents in 2001. Under the previous system, the president, former presidents or designees had 30 days to review documents and lodge objections. Bush added reviews by the families of former presidents to the process, and removed the 30-day deadline. He also broadened the rules to encompass vice presidential papers.

Thomas S. Blanton, chief of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, said that waiting time for documents from the Reagan Library has soared from 18 months to more than six years since the Bush order, because of the review process and factors such as understaffing at the National Archives.

Bush's order "has added to the endemic problem of delay," Allen Weinstein, the national archivist, said in his testimony. Since the order, White House review time has grown to approximately 210 days, he said.

Cheney Rallies His Base With A Fiery Speech (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney yesterday fired up hundreds of conservatives at their annual conference in Washington, drawing cheers when he upbraided Democrats for not realizing an "inconvenient truth" -- that Iraq is the central front in the global war on terrorism.

In a pointed potshot at his Democratic predecessor, Mr. Cheney took direct aim at former Vice President Al Gore, who starred in the film "An Inconvenient Truth" that won an Academy Award last week for best documentary.

"In these circumstances it's worth reminding ourselves that, like it or not, the enemy we face in the war on terror has made Iraq the primary front in that war. To use a popular phrase, this is an inconvenient truth," the vice president said to laughter and applause.

Addressing the Conservative Political Action Conference on its opening night at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Northwest, Mr. Cheney entered to a standing ovation, complete with yells of approval. His boss, however, did not fare as well.

"I always do appreciate the warm reception I receive at CPAC, and I bring personal greetings to all of you from our president, George W. Bush," he said, but the applause was tepid, far short of that offered when John R. Bolton, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, took his seat at the head table before Mr. Cheney entered.

But the vice president, a favorite among staunch conservatives, kept hold of his audience, ripping Democrats for their anti-war stance and obstinance during the first two months in control of Congress.

"With a divided government and strong feelings on both sides of the aisle, getting things done is a bit more of a challenge than it was before. But the American people expect results, and the president and I are committed to working with Congress for the good of the country. What we will not do is abandon the conservative principles we ran on in 2000 and 2004," he said to cheers.

Mr. Cheney served up red meat to the roomful of conservatives, pushing the president's tax cuts and health care proposal. The vice president also chastised Democratic senators for moving to trim funding for the war and deliver a vote of no-confidence against Mr. Bush, as when the House passed a nonbinding resolution criticizing Mr. Bush's troop "surge" proposal.

"The fact is that every statement we make has multiple audiences," he said. "The enemy listens, and so do the Iraqi people. A watching world needs to know that the United States is determined to prevail because we're a nation that keeps its word, and because we understand the consequences of failure," he said to applause.

Mr. Cheney hit a score of hot-button conservative issues; drilling for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve -- "had they passed legislation when we asked, this nation would be well on its way to receiving up to 1 million barrels per day of new supplies" -- and the foot-dragging by Democrats on the president's judicial nominees.

"During President Clinton's last two years in office, the Republican Senate confirmed dozens of district judges and 15 appellate judges. The current Democratic majority should proceed in that same spirit," he said, citing Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., which brought robust applause.

But he closed with Iraq, making a case for continued support of the war, which a majority of Americans now oppose.

DOJ_NMG_0138853

"Very soon both houses of Congress will have to vote on a piece of legislation that is binding -- a bill to provide emergency funding for the troops. And I sincerely hope the discussion this time will be about winning in Iraq, not about posturing on Capitol Hill," Mr. Cheney said.

Conservatives Irate At Current Crop Of Presidential Candidates (BOS)

By Susan Milligan

The Boston Globe, March 2, 2007

Leading conservatives Thursday attacked the Republican Party as big-government, free-spending coddlers of illegal immigrants, and said the country's conservatives should withhold support from the GOP's current slate of presidential nominees to force them to the right.

"I feel very angry and betrayed" by the GOP, some of whose elected officials have backed a "guest worker" immigration plan, abortion rights and tax increases, said Richard Viguerie, chairman of Conservative-HQ.com. "We should withhold support from all major Republican [presidential] candidates today. Not one of them deserves our support today," he told a ballroom full of activists at the Conservative Political Action Conference annual meeting Thursday.

Further, he said, conservatives should withhold "all support" from GOP national committees, which Viguerie said have not produced federal candidates who adhere to conservative principles.

Ken Blackwell, a failed GOP candidate for Ohio governor last year, agreed that conservatives should at least wait to endorse a presidential candidate. "The Republican party -- our natural home in a two-party system -- is in disarray," Blackwell lamented.

At least one conference attendant sported a sticker that featured a circle with a line drawn through the words "Rudy McRomney" -- broadcasting the wearer's opposition to the early leaders in polls for the GOP nomination, former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, Arizona Senator John McCain and former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney.

Conservatives said they are frustrated and angry, blaming the GOP's massive losses in the 2006 elections on Republicans who deviated from a hard-line conservative agenda. The mood also puts added pressure on a slew of GOP presidential candidates set to speak to the CPAC meeting Friday.

Social conservatives are leery of Giuliani, who supports abortion rights, and of McCain, who authored a campaign finance law that limits interest groups' financial influence in political campaigns. Romney's evolution to a socially conservative agenda pleases some religious conservatives, but some are still unhappy with his earlier, softer positions on gay rights and abortion rights.

Former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee has disappointed fiscal conservatives for signing tax hikes on gas and cigarettes when he was governor, while Kansas Senator Sam Brownback has been criticized for his support of an immigration reform bill conservatives claim would give "amnesty" to illegal immigrants. Phyllis Schlafly, a longtime opponent of gay rights and the Equal Rights Amendment, won loud cheers when she derided programs to provide bilingual drivers' tests and to provide low-wage jobs to immigrants instead of "our own high school dropouts."

All of the GOP candidates except McCain are scheduled to appear Friday before the conference. Representative Duncan Hunter, a lesser-known California Republican running for president, will also speak before the conservative activists.

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Romney, acknowledged that conservatives are frustrated because of the election losses of 2006. But he said the party -- including its conservative wing -- needed to come together around an agenda and a candidate who can win.

"The conservative movement is going through a certain degree of reflection and renewal," Madden said. "We need to come together and find some unifying themes."

Bush Brings Fundraising Gold For GOP (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138854

WASHINGTON -- President Bush insists that he will stay out of the race over who will succeed him, at least until a Republican nominee is chosen. But that isn't keeping him from becoming the chief fundraiser for Republicans, his low poll ratings notwithstanding.

Bush helped raise $10.4 million for the Republican Governors Association earlier this week, and he will be the star attraction at a fundraising dinner Friday in Louisville for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, a Kentucky Republican, and the National Republican Senatorial Committee. It is expected to bring in more than $2 million.

Republican activists and advisers say the president is likely to speak at several fundraising events a month in each of the coming months, showing that Bush still has considerable power to help his party even though his approval ratings have averaged well below 50 percent throughout his second term.

Bush's fundraising skills underscore a key fact of modern political life, according to several Republican consultants and a major fundraiser: Political division is not necessarily a bad thing when it comes to breeding political loyalty, and loyalty translates into contributions.

During the first two years of his presidency, Bush's approval rating reached 90 percent in the Gallup Poll, shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, and they remained above 60 percent as the 2002 election approached.

In that time period -- 2001 and 2002 -- Bush raised $192 million for Republican candidates, according to the Republican National Committee.

By contrast, only 38 percent of people surveyed by Gallup approved of Bush's job performance when voters went to the polls last November. But Bush's fundraising numbers were unchanged: During the two years leading to the 2006 election, he raised $194 million, the party reported.

In short, his popularity sank; his fundraising touch remained golden.

That, said Frank Donatelli, a White House political director under President Reagan, illustrates a central factor at the intersection of politics and cash: "Intensity raises money."

"The dirty little secret of all this is that being a polarizing figure -- whether you are George Bush or Bill Clinton -- your popularity with the base is a tremendous financial asset and resource" for your party, said Wayne Berman, a Republican fundraiser.

Senate, House and gubernatorial races are drawing Bush's focus, too, and candidates are ready to take advantage of his 76 percent approval rating among Republicans, as measured by Gallup during the second week of February.

Even as his overall approval rating shows no sign of rebound, Republicans expect Bush to head to friendly territory to help pad the bank accounts of Republican campaigns, or to conduct low-visibility events in Washington for the party's candidates running in contested states where Bush's popularity lags.

"Helping safe incumbents have good, solid treasuries so they won't have problems next year is smart," said Ron Kaufman, a Bush family political adviser for nearly three decades. "The best thing a president can do for any candidate, whether he is at 40 percent or 90 percent, is fundraising."

Poll Shows Bush Is Losing Support Of Republicans (NYT)

By Marjorie Connelly

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

In the months since the Congressional elections, President Bush has lost substantial support among members of his own party, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News Poll.

Mr. Bush's approval rating dropped 13 percentage points since last fall among Republicans, 65 percent of whom now say they approve of the way he is handling his job as president, compared with 78 percent last October.

Over all, Mr. Bush's job approval remains at one of its lowest points, with 29 percent of all Americans saying they approve of the way he is doing his job, compared with 34 percent at the end of October. Sixty-one percent disapproved, compared with 58 percent in October, within the margin of sampling error.

Twenty-three percent of those polled approved of the way Mr. Bush is dealing with the situation in Iraq. Twenty-five percent approved of his handling of foreign policy.

DOJ_NMG_0138855

Even the president's campaign against terrorism, long his signature issue, is seen positively by only 40 percent of those polled, while 53 percent disapprove.

Three-quarters of those polled say things are going badly for the United States in Iraq, and only 23 percent say the efforts to bring stability and order to Iraq are going well.

Seventy percent, including 52 percent of Republicans, say there is not much the United States military can do to reduce the sectarian fighting in Iraq.

Over all, 23 percent of the public say the country is going in the right direction and 68 percent see it as "on the wrong track."

The nationwide telephone poll was conducted Friday through Tuesday with 1,281 adults and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points. The margin of sampling error for Republicans is plus or minus five percentage points.

Music Of The Spheres (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

You might not have noticed, but we broke another U.S. space record last month when astronaut Michael Lopez-Alegria logged his 67th hour of spacewalking. If you consider that the equivalent of the Guinness record for pogo-stick bouncing (23.11 miles in 12 hours and 27 minutes) -- amazing but pointless -- I agree with you. There's nothing quite as beautiful as the space station and the shuttle that services it, and nothing quite as useless.

Now, that can be said of many things: a balance-beam dismount, a Shakespeare sonnet, a chess problem by Nabokov. But none of these is financed by taxpayers, and none makes a claim to utility. They are there for reasons of aesthetics, and perhaps amusement.

You cannot justify a $17 billion NASA budget or $6 billion for manned exploration on such grounds. There has to be more than that, and the space shuttle never was. It will be remembered as one of the most elegant, most misbegotten detours in the history of technology. It was our Spruce Goose, Howard Hughes's gigantic, eight-engine plane that flew only once.

But the Spruce Goose didn't cost $4 billion in tax money to operate. Which is why the coming retirement of the shuttle is so welcome. Even more welcome was the Bush administration's decision to redirect the entire manned space effort toward establishing a moon base.

Not until about 2020, mind you, half a century since we first reached the moon. Future generations will have a hard time understanding the hiatus. But for two sets of critics -- the Luddite left and the science purists -- 50 years is not nearly long enough. They would not build a moon base at all.

The Luddites have long opposed manned exploration as a waste of resources when, as the mantra goes, we have so many problems here on Earth.

I find this objection incomprehensible. When will we stop having problems here on Earth? In a fallen world of endless troubles, that does not stop us from allocating resources to endeavors we find beautiful, exciting and elevating -- opera, alpine skiing, feature films -- yet solve no social problems.

Moreover, the moon base is not pointless. The shuttles were on an endless trip to the nowhere of low Earth orbit. The moon is a destination. The idea this time is not to go to plant a flag, take a golf shot and leave, but to stay and form a real self-sustaining, extraterrestrial human colony.

Sure, Mars would be better. It holds open the possibility of life and might even have water on its surface today. But the best should not be the enemy of the good. Mars is simply too far, too dangerous, too difficult, too expensive. We won't go there for a hundred years.

Nor is it true that there is nothing of use or even of interest on the moon. There are all kinds of materials to be exploited, observations of the cosmos to be made and knowledge to be gained on how best to live off the land away from Earth.

A century ago there seemed to be nothing in Antarctica, either. We went there first for adventure, then for discovery. The concrete scientific advances Antarctica has yielded (regarding climate change and the ozone layer, for example) have been as important as they were unexpected.

DOJ_NMG_0138856

A more serious critique of returning to the moon comes not from the Luddites but the purists. They want science, and they are right that robotic exploration is a more cost-effective way to get it. The science yielded by unmanned vehicles, such as past and future probes of the ice surface of Europa and the hydrocarbon lakes of Titan, is indeed thrilling. And pound for pound, dollar for dollar, manned exploration does bring back less science than robots.

But it still brings back science. Humans can discover things through intuition and pattern recognition that machines thinking in algorithms cannot. Imagine the scientific possibilities if today we had humans patrolling Mars rather than the brilliantly programmed but still limited golf carts now roaming the surface.

And then there's the glory. If you find any value, any lift of the spirit in a beautiful mathematical proof, in an elegant balletic turn, in any of the myriad human endeavors that have no utility but only breathtaking beauty, then you should feel something when our little species succeeds in establishing new life in a void that for all eternity had been the province of the gods. If you don't feel that, you are -- don't take this personally -- deaf to the music of our time.

OTHER NEWS:

A Steadier Day For Stock Markets, But A Sense Of Unease Lingers (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

What is bothering investors? No one thing in particular and yet everything.

From a slowing American economy to a faltering mortgage market and the tightening of historically easy credit, a caldron of concerns has been bubbling up over the last year and appears to have set off the wave of selling that rocked world financial markets this week.

Though each of the fears has a distinct origin and quality, a common strain runs through them: that after four years of strong growth, low interest rates and relative prosperity, investors appear to have become too complacent about risks.

After some wide swings yesterday, stock markets appeared to have steadied from Tuesday's rout. Asian and European markets slumped yesterday, and the Dow Jones industrial average opened down 208 points. But the Dow recovered and traded in positive territory for brief periods before ending the day down 34.29 points, or 0.3 percent. The volatility was a reminder that concerns persist.

"Risk needs to be reassessed," said Marc D. Stern, chief investment officer at Bessemer Trust, an investment firm in New York. "And that doesn't happen in three days, no matter how interesting those three days are."

Like many other market specialists who share his view, Mr. Stern believes that the outlook for the economy is generally positive, but he worries that investors are paying too much for assets like stocks and bonds in developing countries; securities backed by American mortgages; and junk-rated bonds. He acknowledges that his concerns are neither new nor unique.

These fears have been simmering on the back burner for much of the last two years. Alan Greenspan, the former Federal Reserve chairman whose comments this week about the possibility of a recession have put him back in the spotlight, highlighted them in several speeches before he stepped down last year.

In May, markets around the world sold off broadly on these same concerns as well as worries that the Fed would raise interest rates to levels that would restrict economic growth significantly. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 7.7 percent in a little over a month beginning in early May, before rallying in the second half of the year to gain 13.6 percent for the full year.

Many market specialists note that the market historically goes through such periods of stress, and that the recent period of relative calm is extremely unusual. Liz Ann Sonders, the chief investment strategist for Charles Schwab, calculates that typically the market moves more than 2 percent — up or down — eight days each year. Before the fall on Tuesday, the market had not had a 2 percent move in more than three years.

Tuesday was a "a healthy reminder, especially to individual investors, that markets don't go straight up," Ms. Sonders said.

The VIX index, which measures expectations of future volatility of stock prices based on the prices of options, jumped to 18.31 on Tuesday from 11.35; it has since fallen back to 15.82. By comparison, the index averaged 19.13 during the last six years.

DOJ_NMG_0138857

It remains too early to draw any broad conclusions about the current market jitters, whether they will be of a similar short-lived variety as the swoon from last spring or whether they will take a broader and more sustained toll on the markets.

"This is a case of a lot of investors looking for a correction," said Todd Salamone, vice president for research at Schaffer's Investment Research. "There was enough news out there to have that prophecy fulfilled."

Economic reports this week showed that orders for goods that last more than three years fell almost 8 percent in January and that the economy grew far more slowly in the fourth quarter than had been believed.

Yesterday, some of those concerns were alleviated when a monthly survey by the Institute for Supply Management suggested that manufacturing activity picked up speed in February. The report's release at 10 a.m. bolstered stocks. The S.& P. 500 closed down 0.3 percent, or 3.65 points, at 1,403.17, and the Nasdaq composite index lost 11.94 points, or 0.5 percent, to close at 2,404.21.

Unlike the slump last year, the recent drop in stock prices has not been accompanied by any notable movements in the prices of commodities like crude oil or gold, both of which also tumbled in May. Oil futures were up about 1 percent for the week yesterday and the price of gold, which is typically seen as a safe haven during times of uncertainty, was down 2.9 percent.

"A bunch of pieces to the puzzle fit," said Ryan Larson, senior equity trader at Voyageur Asset Management who is based in Chicago. "But other pieces — the gold, the oil — don't really fit together. It causes us to question what's really going on."

Other measures of sentiment also suggest that the talk of reassessing risk has not resulted in meaningful changes in investor behavior.

The difference, or spread, between the yields of United States Treasury securities and high-yield corporate bonds, for instance, has not increased significantly in the last few days, said Kingman Penniman, chairman and chief executive of KDP, a bond research firm. Wider spreads suggest that bond buyers are demanding more return for lending money to companies that may not be able to pay back the debt.

Similarly, the spreads on developing country bonds have not widened from historic lows.

"If I'd gone away for the week and looked at prices, I wouldn't have noticed anything," said Andrew Feltus, a vice president and bond portfolio manager at Pioneer Investments in Boston.

Certainly, spreads on bonds backed by mortgages to people with weak, or subprime, credit have widened significantly in the last two months, and the cost of insuring the lowest-rated portions of those bonds has jumped this week.

In an indication that the market may be in for a tough road, Countrywide Financial, the nation's largest stand-alone mortgage company, disclosed in a securities filing that 22.6 percent of the subprime mortgages it services for other lenders were in default or foreclosure at the end of last year, up from 17.2 percent in 2005.

Another strong signal has come through in the value of the Japanese yen, which has risen 2.9 percent, to 117.61 yen to the dollar, this week.

Some market specialists say the increase is a result of investors unwinding the "carry trade," a trading strategy in which managers borrow money at low rates in Japan and invest it in other markets where returns are greater.

It is unclear how much money has been invested this way, but some suggest it could be in the billions of dollars, given that the difference between short-term interest rates in Japan and the rest of the world is so great.

The rise in the yen would support the idea that investors are indeed becoming more risk-averse, by buying up yen to pay off their debts in Japan. But skeptics say it is just too early to declare the end of the carry trade, because the Bank of Japan's benchmark rate, even with a recent increase, is 0.5 percent while the Fed's short-term rate is 5.25 percent.

"I don't think two days is enough to tell us" that the carry trade is being unwound in a big way, said Douglas M. Peta, a market strategist at J.& W. Seligman & Company. But "that's absolutely something that should flash a yellow light."

Following are the results of yesterday's Treasury auction of 13-day cash management bills:

Stocks Take 34-Point Dip After Early Plunge (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138858

An early selloff briefly echoed Tuesday's stock-market tumble, but strong economic data and soothing words from former central bank chief Alan Greenspan spurred buying that kept the market's losses in check.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average briefly broke into positive territory late in the day but finished down 34.29 points, off 0.3%, at 12234.34. It is down 1.8% on the year.

As happened earlier in the week, an overnight selloff in Asian shares spilled into U.S. markets when they opened. At its intraday low just a few minutes into the trading session, the Dow was off 209.09 points.

The mood improved as investors digested fresh data from the Institute of Supply Management, which said its index of manufacturing activity throughout the U.S. economy rose to a monthly reading of 52.3 in February, up from 49.3. A reading above 50 indicates expansion of the manufacturing sector.

In a speech via satellite to Tokyo, Mr. Greenspan clarified comments earlier in the week that had raised investors' fears of a recession in the U.S. this year. In the latest remarks, the former Federal Reserve chairman said he believes a recession is "possible" but not "probable."

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index ended the day off 0.3%, or 3.65 points, to 1403.17, down 1.1% on the year.

The technology-focused Nasdaq Composite Index dropped into the red for the year, off 11.94 points to close at 2404.21. It was off 0.5% both for the day and for 2007.

Binky Chadha, chief U.S.-equity strategist at Deutsche Bank, said he remains confident that stocks will show solid gains for the year. But he thinks investors should hold off buying for now, since the market has entered a particularly risk-averse phase in which it will tend to overreact to any unexpected bad economic news.

In particular, he said that any nasty surprises in next Friday's employment report by the U.S. Labor Department could produce another sharp selloff.

"We think the fundamentals haven't changed for the market," said Mr. Chadha, who noted that Deutsche Bank is sticking to its prediction that the S&P 500 will rise nearly 9% this year.

"That obviously implies you should buy on dips," Mr. Chadha said. "It's just a question of timing."

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 0.89%, or 2.18 points, to 244.12.

In major U.S. market action:

Stock and bond prices fell: The 10-year note shed 1/32 point, or 31.25 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.556%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 117.59 yen, compared with 118.41 yen. The euro fell to $1.3186, compared with $1.3234.

Investors May Need To Keep Dow Tumble In Perspective (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, March 2, 2007

That sums up this week's violent price swings on Wall Street — and poses the biggest unanswered question haunting jittery investors: Are stocks still vulnerable and susceptible to yet another free fall?

"Investors should always be prepared mentally for market volatility," says Alan Skrainka, chief market strategist at Edward Jones.

That's sage advice. The Dow Jones industrial average's 416-point plunge Tuesday, its tepid 52-point rebound Wednesday, and comeback from a 209-point nose dive early Thursday to close down just 34 points was enough to result in a nervous breakdown for even the most unemotional investors.

Skrainka insists that the Dow's downdraft does not change the bright outlook for the USA's greatest companies or the fact that the economy remains sound. "The only thing that changed," he says, "was the psychology of the market."

The mood turned dark Tuesday when China's highflying stock market — which doubled in value last year — suffered a 9% drop, spooking investors around the globe who had been loading up on risky investments. The selling pressure intensified amid fears that the U.S. economy could fall into recession. The 3.3% sell-off also ended the Dow's longest run without a 2% correction since 1954, which kicked off yet another wave of computer-generated selling. After a relatively calm Wednesday, panic selling hit again early Thursday before buyers surfaced in search of bargains.

DOJ_NMG_0138859

During the three-day period the Dow swung down more than 550 points and as much as 4.5% from its record.

Despite the financial pain, a dose of perspective is needed to place the week's carnage in some historical context. The price correction was sizable, but the event was not unusual. Since 1900, the market has suffered corrections of 10% or more 116 times, which equates to roughly one correction per year, Skrainka notes. Other facts that might ease investors' minds:

•Rarity factor. Big daily declines are rare. In the 21,250 trading days ended in December 2006, the Dow has suffered a daily decline of 3.4% or more on only 131 occasions, or 0.6% of the total days. "The odds of a day like Tuesday are between 1-in-400 and 1-in-500," notes Marc Reinganum, director of quantitative research at Oppenheimer Funds.

•Quick, yet "modest" decline. While the recent free fall has injected fear back into the market, the Dow has corrected only 4.5%, more than 3 percentage points less than its downdraft last summer.

•Reasonable P-Es provide a floor. Stocks are not richly priced as they were back in early 2000, when the Standard & Poor's 500 was trading at a price-to-earnings ratio of 28. Now, the S&P's P-E is 15 on estimated 2007 earnings, in line with historical norms.

"More reasonable valuations act as an important shock absorber," says Ed Keon, chief investment strategist at Prudential Financial Group.

Keon says shocks come along from time to time. But the key question is whether the market is braced to deal with the shock. "When stocks are priced for perfection, you get crashes like 1987 and bear markets like 2002," Keon says. Fortunately for investors, stocks were priced low enough to avoid a bigger meltdown.

Most Wall Street pros say more rough days can't be ruled out. But panicking will only make things worse.

"It would be a mistake for investors to view this week as a reason to get out of the stock market," says Jason Trennert, head of Strategas Research Partners.

Stock Market Settles Down After Another Sharp Sell-Off (WP)

By David Cho And Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Stock prices on Wall Street made a jittery recovery yesterday from a steep early morning fall that sent the Dow Jones industrial average plummeting more than 200 points.

The Dow closed down 34.29 points, or 0.3 percent, to 12,234.34. But the market's bungee jump, in which it plunged deep into the red just after the opening bell, recovered into positive territory and then fell again, was a sign of the anxious mood on Wall Street.

Many analysts said the wild week of trading, which included a 416-point drop by the Dow on Tuesday and a modest upswing Wednesday, could alter the economic landscape. Going forward, there simply may not be the same tolerance for risk, a shift that would have huge consequences for the United States and economies around the world.

Trading worldwide was generally grim yesterday. East Asia's largest markets dropped, with a key exchange in China falling nearly 3 percent. Europe's main indexes were down almost 2 percent before trimming losses.

"There certainly is a lot more fear in the market, there's no doubt about that," said Steven R. Howard, a partner at Thacher, Proffitt & Wood, a financial advisory firm. "The markets are much more volatile in terms of where emerging countries are going right now."

For years, because it was easy to borrow money, investors were able to make high-risk investments in the developing world and lend mortgages to credit-challenged home buyers in the United States. Private-equity firms were able to borrow tens of billions of dollars to buy out big companies.

Such borrowing and investing may have reached a turning point, some analysts said. For individual investors, that could mean smaller profits from their portfolios or difficulty obtaining a mortgage with poor credit. Globally, it could mean tighter business loans for companies as well as new struggles for promising economies such as Thailand, Indonesia, the Philippines and developing countries in Latin America.

DOJ_NMG_0138860

Signs of a reversal in the availability of what is called "cheap debt" emerged this week.

One warning of this was when the Japanese yen yesterday hit an 11-week high against the dollar. That followed a 2.3 percent ascent -- a huge climb for a currency on a single day -- on Tuesday as stock markets around the world were plunging.

The connection between the markets and the value of the yen lies in what is known as the "carry trade." The term refers to investors who borrow money in Japan because it has one of the lowest interest rates in the world and invest the funds elsewhere. Often they invest in emerging markets or buy U.S. Treasurys that pay higher interest rates.

A little math may help explain the concept: If traders borrow 1,000 yen from a Japanese bank, convert the funds into U.S. dollars and buy bonds for the equivalent amount, they would profit off the difference in interest rates. So if the U.S. bond pays 5.25 percent in interest, and the traders only have to pay 0.5 percent in Japan, they would stand to make a profit of 4.75 percent, as long as the exchange rate between the countries does not change.

No one knows how large the carry trade is, but estimates have ranged as high as $1 trillion. Economists say this trade has been a major factor in keeping borrowing rates in the United States low because it has increased the purchase of bonds and notes in the United States This, in turn, keeps interest rates on the bonds low.

But many hedge funds and investors also are using the carry trade to make high-risk investments in the developing world. Emerging countries have never been so popular with U.S. investors, several investment groups report. And most of the best-performing mutual funds over the past few years were invested in emerging markets.

"It's not just the hedge funds and the leveraged players who . . . are involved" in the carry trade, said Kathy Lein, chief strategist of DailyFX.com, which provides information on currency markets. "A lot of regular people now are invested in the foreign markets."

Axel Merk, portfolio manager at the Merk Hard Currency Fund, said that in 2006, the market rose in a nearly straight line for eight months. "People became more courageous. . . . You say, 'Lets go for it, let's take a gamble.' Now, with more volatility, people are saying, 'Oops, wait a minute, I better be more careful.' "

Merk added that investors had to "become more cautious. That applies to the carry trade, that applies to equities, that applies to everything."

This week, as the carry trade showed indications of unwinding, money flowed in the opposite direction, from the emerging markets back to Japan. That pushed up the value of the yen. The first to sell investments in the developing world were speculators and hedge fund traders who can move their money quickly, analysts said.

Others decided to weather the storm and have seen their investments take a huge hit. "Every time there is a threat to the carry trade, we get a big, very quick reaction as speculators close out their trades," said Harvey Sawikin, co-founder of Firebird Funds, a $3 billion hedge fund mostly invested in emerging markets. "You could see a painful hit for a short period of time."

But Sawikin, who is invested in Russia and other places in Asia, decided not to move his money. He said many large emerging countries such as India and Brazil can absorb short-term blows from the stock market and are much healthier than they were in 1998, when a currency crisis roiled the developing world. But smaller economies in Asia, Africa and Latin America could suffer the most from the carry trade unraveling.

"There's indications that the emerging market has reached its peak and is going to fall off," said Howard, of Thacher Proffitt. "But it depends on which part of the emerging market you are referring to."

Tse reported from New York.

Manufacturing Shows Some Vigor (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse And Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

The U.S. manufacturing sector showed signs of recovering from a recent slump, striking a positive note that boosted stocks and eased concerns the nation's economy could be headed for recession.

The Institute for Supply Management, a trade group for corporate purchasing managers, reported yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity rose to 52.3 in February from 49.3 the previous month. The index for new orders, an indicator of future activity, rose to 54.9 from 50.3. Any reading above 50 suggests the sector is expanding.

DOJ_NMG_0138861

• The News: The latest data on manufacturing show the sector doing better than expected.

• The Background: Its weakness had raised worries about a long decline that could hurt the economy.

• The Bottom Line: Manufacturers still face head winds, but the data suggest recent output cuts were needed to work off an excess of unsold goods, and the sector could soon be poised to expand.

Housing-related manufacturers, such as furniture makers, remained among the sector's most sluggish segments, while producers of petroleum, coal, plastics and rubber led the rebound.

The ISM survey caught some economists and investors by surprise, because other recent indicators had shown manufacturing faltering. Tuesday, for example, the Commerce Department reported that orders for durable goods plunged 7.8% in January. That report helped trigger Tuesday's stock-market selloff, which ended with the Dow Jones Industrial Average down 416.02 points, its seventh-largest point decline ever. The next day, the department reported that economic activity in the fourth quarter was weaker than previously thought.

But the ISM report, which covers the month of February and provides a more current look at business conditions, signaled that industrial activity is regaining momentum. "This gives some hope that manufacturers are working off excess stocks and should be poised to start growing again," said Daniel Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, a policy and research group in Arlington, Va.

He said the report indicates that the weakness in the fourth quarter and in January "is not an indication that the manufacturing sector is entering a recession" that could drag down the broader economy.

Yesterday's manufacturing news had an immediate effect on investors, helping the Dow Jones Industrial Average erase much of its 209-point drop earlier in the day. The Dow industrials closed at 12234.34, down 34.29 points, or 0.3%

Adding to yesterday's assessment, the Commerce Department reported that consumer spending rose 0.5% in January from the previous month, down from December's 0.7% growth rate but still a healthy pace. The January spending growth was fueled, in part, by a 1.0% rise in personal income, which reflected rising wages, but also the nonrecurring effect of bonuses and executives cashing in on stock options.

To be sure, manufacturers face head winds. They still have plenty of unsold inventory, and the latest data show businesses cutting back on investments in big-ticket capital goods -- all of which could slow production. Still, yesterday's reports offered reason for optimism, economists said. The data suggest consumer spending, which makes up two-thirds of the economy, is on track to grow at an annualized, inflation-adjusted rate of well more than 3% this quarter. That could help manufacturing turn around.

"Consumption entered the first quarter on a pretty strong note," said Mike Englund, chief economist at Action Economics, a consultancy in Boulder, Colo. "As long as the consumer remains healthy, production has to catch up."

Roger Douglas, president of Douglas Manufacturing Corp., Crete, Neb., a maker of products like voting booths and metal storage boxes, said it "seemed like everyone was on a long holiday vacation" at the end of last year and the first month of 2007. "But everything seems to be waking up right now -- inquiries, orders, everything seems to be taking a sudden upturn."

Not everything in yesterday's reports was positive. Americans are still spending beyond their immediate means: In January, their spending exceeded their disposable income by $116.4 billion, or 1.2%. As falling housing prices make consumers feel poorer, they may yet decide to cut back and save more. Though the latest data from the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight showed house prices up 1.1% in the fourth quarter from the third, most economists believe prices have a way to fall.

The personal-income report also contained a whiff of inflation. The Fed's preferred gauge of inflation -- the price index for personal consumption, excluding food and energy -- rose 0.3% in January after rising only 0.1% in December, and was up 2.3% from the year earlier. That is above the Fed's comfort range of 1% to 2%. Meanwhile, the housing slump keeps weighing on construction activity, which fell 0.8% in January from the previous month, the Commerce Department said. Construction of houses and other residential properties fell 1.8%.

In recent months, manufacturers in sectors tied to housing and autos have been among the hardest hit. But Norbert Ore, a procurement executive at Georgia-Pacific LLC, who oversees the manufacturing report, said signs of life in some sectors, such as wood products and textiles, suggest the worst may have passed.

DOJ_NMG_0138862

Paulson Sees 'healthy' Outlook For US (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The outlook for the US economy is healthy, though concerns remain about domestic protectionism and the slow pace of Chinese currency appreciation, US Treasury secretary Hank Paulson said on Thursday.

The remarks, in a speech to the Economic Club of Washington, followed positive figures on US personal incomes and manufacturing, which helped lift the Dow Jones index from an earlier 209-point drop. "I am watching developments carefully, and I believe that the US economy is healthy," he said.

But the turbulence in US markets indicated investors remain worried about the economy, with concern centred on doubts about what will happen next in two sectors that are important contributors to growth: housing and manufacturing.

The Federal Reserve expects these sectors to work off the bulk of the oversupply in the first half of this year and allow the economy to grow at a reasonable rate.

Central bankers expect consumer spending to hold up during this economic adjustment, with the support of strong job creation in the service sector and gains in personal income, which rose a blistering 1 per cent last month, according to fresh figures released by the Commerce Department on Thursday.

But there are persistent voices of dissent on Wall Street – which garner particular attention during a market wobble.

David Rosenberg, chief economist at Merrill Lynch, said: "It seems to me that the Fed's view is that the housing recession is coming to an end. I have some serious doubts about that."

He argues that the key is the gap between starts to construction of homes – which have started to ease as builders retrench – and completions, which remain elevated and suggest large volumes of new houses are hitting the market at a time when demand is weak.

"We have a starts at 1.4m and completions at 1.9m. That is a big gap that must be closed for equilibrium to be restored. This means we are entering a phase between now and the end of the year when the declines in production are going to be the most pronounced and we will start to see knock-on effects elsewhere in the economy," he said.

Ethan Harris, chief economist at Lehman Brothers, has a more sanguine outlook for the housing sector but he cautioned that data on the housing market was notoriously flawed and that it "was too early to call a bottom".

The Lehman economist said rising defaults by homeowners at the high-risk end of the mortgage market was introducing new uncertainty. "We don't know how many homes are going to be dumped back into the market by homeowners who default on subprime loans. A lot of those homes could come back on the market and that would mean a new round of pressure on prices."

It is this kind of unforeseen downward lurch in house prices later in the year that poses the greatest risk to consumer spending, according to Merrill Lynch.

Mr Rosenberg at Merrill Lynch is more optimistic about the manufacturing sector. "Manufacturing is not out of woods yet, but appears to be emerging," he said.

Clouds Added To Many Economic Forecasts (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A few weeks ago, Wall Street was praising the Federal Reserve for cooling the economy just enough to tame inflation without chilling it into a recession. Now, after several days of financial market turmoil and conflicting economic reports, analysts are having second thoughts.

Yesterday, several said they saw rising risks of higher inflation and much weaker economic growth.

Consumer prices jumped in January, while home construction fell sharply, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. That combined with falling stock prices, distress in some credit markets and declining business investment to sour many forecasts.

"I think the odds of a recession have gone up in the last two weeks," said David Shulman, a senior economist with the Anderson Forecast at the University of California at Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0138863

But more-optimistic observers pointed yesterday to a Commerce Department report that consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of the nation's economic activity, rose briskly in January, while incomes climbed even more rapidly.

The nation's factories also produced more goods, hired more workers and booked more new orders in February, the Institute for Supply Management, a business association, said yesterday.

And the labor market remains tight, with unemployment at a low 4.6 percent in January, though many forecasters expect that rate to edge higher in coming months.

"I think that overall the economy is in great shape," said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, who argues that buoyant consumer spending will more than offset the economy's soft spots.

The disagreement is typical of a time when the figures are mixed, and it is unclear how consumers will respond to falling stock prices. If consumers pull back now, the economy is likely to falter, several analysts said.

That hasn't happened yet. Consumer spending rose 0.3 percent in January, after adjusting for inflation, fueled by a 0.5 percent increase in after-tax income.

Before adjusting for taxes and inflation, personal income rose 1 percent in January, the fastest rate in a year, partly reflecting big bonus payments, stock market gains and pay raises for federal workers, the Commerce Department said.

This fits with Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's statement Wednesday that the central bank still foresees moderate economic growth this year -- about 2.5 to 3 percent. That would be slower than last year's 3.3 percent expansion but enough to keep unemployment low.

Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, said Monday in remarks to a private group that a recession is possible later this year -- words that contributed to the stock market sell-off Tuesday. On Wednesday, he stressed to another group that he does not see a recession as likely -- a view similar to the Fed's and many other forecasts.

And in a speech in Washington, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. said, "I am watching developments carefully, and I believe that the U.S. economy is healthy."

The latest inflation figures, however, did not match the Fed's forecast of diminishing price pressures. Core inflation, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, rose 0.3 percent in January, the fastest rate since August, and was up 2.3 percent from a year earlier, the Commerce Department said. Bernanke and other Fed policymakers have said they prefer to keep price increases in a range of 1 to 2 percent annually.

The Institute for Supply Management's report also showed that manufacturers paid higher prices for raw materials in February.

Rising inflation and a danger of slower economic growth put the Fed in a bind. Central bank policymakers restrain price increases by raising interest rates, making it harder for businesses and consumers to borrow and spend, which dampens demand; it responds to weak growth by cutting rates, which has the opposite effect.

Bernanke told Congress last month that the Fed thought it could probably hold its benchmark short-term interest rate steady for a while because it expects slower growth to lower inflation. But he also warned that if price pressures pick up, he and his colleagues would raise the rate.

Raising the short-term rate now, however, would make it harder for borrowers with adjustable-rate mortgages to refinance their loans. That would exacerbate the credit crunch in the market for loans to subprime borrowers, who have lower incomes and poor credit histories. Delinquencies and defaults on those loans have risen sharply in recent months, causing some lenders to go out of business.

The UCLA Anderson Forecast is lowering its expectations for economic growth primarily because it thinks the turmoil in the subprime mortgage market will prolong and deepen the housing slump, Shulman said. The group won't release its updated forecast until April but anticipates that defaults will rise, increasing the number of homes for sale, while lenders make fewer loans, reducing the number of buyers.

Investors in futures contracts increased their bets yesterday that the central bank will cut interest rates by summer, which might help the subprime market.

But cutting rates might also spur inflation higher, a danger that may strengthen the Fed's case for leaving policy on hold for now.

DOJ_NMG_0138864

The Fed does not have to do anything to lower long-term interest rates, such as on fixed-rate mortgages, which are determined in global financial markets. Long-term rates are already falling because investors are moving their money out of stocks and into much safer Treasury securities, pushing down their yields, which serve as benchmarks for private debt. For example, the interest rate on a 30-year, fixed-rate mortgage is linked to the yield on the 10-year Treasury bond, which has tumbled over the past week.

Interest rates have been historically low in recent months but not low enough to stimulate business spending on new plants, equipment and computers. Such capital investment spending declined in late 2006 and in January, according to two recent Commerce Department reports.

The institute's report on increased factory orders in February may signal a rebound in business spending but not a lot of momentum overall, said Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight. He attributes this to caution among the nation's chief executives because of the economic slowdown, rising prices and uncertainty about whether customer demand will hold up.

These factors "have got those

CEOs on tenterhooks right now," Bethune said.

Weak business investment and declining stock prices are among the reasons Global Insight now sees the odds of a recession as 15 to 20 percent, up from about 10 percent last week, Bethune said.

These odds, he said, "are not high, but they're not trivial."

Greenspan Now Says Economic Slowdown Isn't 'Probable' (WSJ)

By Sai Man And Kenneth Mccallum

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

TOKYO -- Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan toned down his warning that the U.S. might slip into a recession later this year, saying he doesn't think such a slowdown is "probable," according to investment bank CLSA Asia-Pacific Markets, which hosted Mr. Greenspan's speech.

"It is possible we can get a U.S. recession toward the end of this year, but I don't think it's probable," Mr. Greenspan was quoted by CLSA as telling the audience here. Mr. Greenspan spoke via satellite from the U.S. Associates of Mr. Greenspan in Washington confirmed the remarks.

The former Fed chief's comments Monday that a U.S. recession was "possible" toward the end of 2007 were cited as one trigger for a decline in stocks Monday and Tuesday, a drop in U.S. bond yields, and growing expectations for an interest-rate cut by the Fed. (See related article1.)

Mr. Greenspan had said a recession was possible, though he added it was difficult to predict the timing of any recession. Speaking yesterday to CLSA's Japan Forum, Mr. Greenspan appeared to want to hedge his bets on his prediction.

"Things look reasonably good in the short run for the U.S. and the world," he was quoted as saying. But, "we can't just assume that this extraordinary period of recovery can extend indefinitely."

Mr. Greenspan also said the U.S. has "gone through the major part of adjustment" in housing prices and "the worst is over," though the housing market is expected to remain weak, according to CLSA. The weak housing market has had only limited impact on consumer spending because American consumers have been encouraged by the decline in gasoline prices, CLSA quoted him as saying.

Greenspan Is Still Able To Move Markets (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — They are marketed as “intimate conversations” with Alan Greenspan, and groups pay about $150,000 to hear his economic outlook.

But on Thursday, for the second time this week, these private chats went public, jolting financial markets around the world and upstaging Ben S. Bernanke, Mr. Greenspan’s successor as chairman of the Federal Reserve.

First on Monday and then again on Thursday, Mr. Greenspan upset stock markets merely by uttering the word “recession” and saying that one might but probably would not occur by the end of this year.

DOJ_NMG_0138865

Few people have the power to move markets like a Fed chairman. Except, maybe, a retired Fed chairman. Mr. Greenspan's use of the R-word helped push down the Dow Jones industrial average by about 200 points on Thursday morning, though shares later recovered and closed only slightly lower for the day.

The tone if not the substance of the comments seemed to conflict with, and even undermine, Mr. Bernanke's soothing message on Wednesday that the economy still seemed poised for "moderate" growth and perhaps even a slight acceleration later this year.

It also raised several questions. Did the old Fed chairman, who has been hailed as the maestro of the economy, disagree with the new Fed chairman? For a man who had worked assiduously to keep markets calm while he ran the Fed, why was Mr. Greenspan now using an incendiary word-bomb? At almost 81, did he secretly miss the limelight? Or was he trying to build up advance interest in his new book?

In some ways. the attention given to Mr. Greenspan's remarks reflects the contrast in personal styles between him and Mr. Bernanke. To many investors, Mr. Greenspan, after 18 years of running the Fed, has star status, and remains the ultimate authority on economic issues. Mr. Bernanke, by contrast, is still an unknown. Where Mr. Greenspan had a fondness for colorful phrases, from "irrational exuberance" to the "frothiness" of the housing market, Mr. Bernanke has brought a plain-speaking openness that is often easier to understand but less catchy.

The difference in style reflects a deeper difference: where Mr. Greenspan guarded his autonomy as a decision-maker and bucked conventional wisdom, Mr. Bernanke has tried to make Fed policy less personalized and more grounded in consensus.

Fed officials declined to comment on the remarks, but noted that Mr. Greenspan has avoided any comment about monetary policy, speaking only about the economy itself.

To be clear: Mr. Greenspan did not, as some analysts incorrectly inferred, predict that a recession was imminent. In fact, he said few forecasters anticipated one. But he did caution that the United States appears to be at the end of an expansion and that such times usually bring with them the seeds of a recession.

His first comments were on Monday, in a private chat over satellite to an investor group in Hong Kong. On Wednesday, he tried to clarify his views while speaking to a group in Tokyo.

"By the end of the year, there is a possibility, but not a probability, of the U.S. moving into a recession," Mr. Greenspan was quoted as saying by Bloomberg News, which based its report on interviews with people who attended the CLSA Japan Forum in Tokyo.

Several analysts said Mr. Greenspan's comments, if read in context, did not conflict nearly as much as they seemed with the current Fed's view. But the comments highlight the delicate line Mr. Greenspan has drawn in defining his post-Fed activities. He has adamantly refused to comment on monetary policy, saying that a Fed chairman has enough problems without being second-guessed by his predecessor.

But he has also restarted his earlier career as an economic consultant and forecaster, speaking to groups of institutional investors, on average, twice a week for a fee of up to $150,000. He is represented by the Washington Speakers Bureau, whose clients include celebrities and political figures like Colin L. Powell, the former secretary of state.

On Thursday, Mr. Greenspan was in Palm Springs for a talk to another conference. He has spoken in cities around the United States, Canada, Europe and Asia, often to institutional investors at conferences sponsored by banks or trade associations.

According to the Speakers Bureau, Mr. Greenspan offers "thoughtful, in-depth question-and-answer sessions." The sessions are off-limits to the media, and recording devices are prohibited. But in practice, word gets out, and it can have a big impact.

Acquaintances of Mr. Greenspan say he has been puzzled by the reaction to his comments. In his comments on Monday, he restated his long-held caution that investors are in danger of being too complacent and too confident that the benign mix of low inflation and steady economic growth would continue. When asked whether he expected a recession later this year, Mr. Greenspan said it was impossible to rule out the possibility but went on to say that most forecasters did not expect one.

Carl Tannenbaum, chief economist at LaSalle ABN Amro in Chicago and president of the National Association for Business Economics, said Mr. Greenspan's comments were consistent with a consensus.

DOJ_NMG_0138866

The National Association for Business Economics' most recent survey of members found an average prediction that the United States economy would expand 2.4 percent in 2007 and that the chances of a recession were about 15 percent — not probable, but not impossible.

Some analysts were less charitable, speculating that Mr. Greenspan had intentionally allowed himself to sound more provocative in order to increase his appeal on the lecture circuit and perhaps build excitement for his new book. The book, for which he is to be paid about $8 million, is due out in September and is to be both a memoir and a treatise on economic issues.

To be sure, Mr. Greenspan is hardly the only former Fed official to offer his views on the economy. Laurence Meyer, a former Fed governor, resumed his career as a forecaster for Macroeconomic Advisers and now offers clients detailed interpretation of the Fed's thinking.

But Paul A. Volcker, who preceded Mr. Greenspan as Fed chairman, has been silent on Fed policy and has only rarely offered his views on the economy.

Mr. Greenspan, according to people who have spoken with him, is intent on remaining active as an economic consultant and forecaster. It is what he has done for more than 50 years, he has told people, and he sees no reason his role as a former Fed chairman should bar him from continuing to earn money at it once again.

The Big Meltdown (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

FEB. 27, 2008

The great market meltdown of 2007 began exactly a year ago, with a 9 percent fall in the Shanghai market, followed by a 416-point slide in the Dow. But as in the previous global financial crisis, which began with the devaluation of Thailand's currency in the summer of 1997, it took many months before people realized how far the damage would spread.

At the start, all sorts of implausible explanations were offered for the drop in U.S. stock prices. It was, some said, the fault of Alan Greenspan, the former chairman of the Federal Reserve, as if his statement of the obvious — that the housing slump could possibly cause a recession — had been news to anyone. One Republican congressman blamed Representative John Murtha, claiming that his efforts to stop the "surge" in Iraq had somehow unnerved the markets.

Even blaming events in Shanghai for what happened in New York was foolish on its face, except to the extent that the slump in China — whose stock markets had a combined valuation of only about 5 percent of the U.S. markets' valuation — served as a wake-up call for investors.

The truth is that efforts to pin the stock decline on any particular piece of news are a waste of time.

Wise analysts remember the classic study that Robert Shiller of Yale carried out during the market crash of Oct. 19, 1987. His conclusion? "No news story or rumor appearing on the 19th or over the preceding weekend was responsible." In 2007, as in 1987, investors rushed for the exits not because of external events, but because they saw other investors doing the same.

What made the market so vulnerable to panic? It wasn't so much a matter of irrational exuberance — although there was plenty of that, too — as it was a matter of irrational complacency.

After the bursting of the technology bubble of the 1990s failed to produce a global disaster, investors began to act as if nothing bad would ever happen again. Risk premiums — the extra return people demand when lending money to less than totally reliable borrowers — dwindled away.

For example, in the early years of the decade, high-yield corporate bonds (formerly known as junk bonds) were able to attract buyers only by offering interest rates eight to 10 percentage points higher than U.S. government bonds. By early 2007, that margin was down to little more than two percentage points.

For a while, growing complacency became a self-fulfilling prophecy. As the what-me-worry attitude spread, it became easier for questionable borrowers to roll over their debts, so default rates went down. Also, falling interest rates on risky bonds meant higher prices for those bonds, so those who owned such bonds experienced big capital gains, leading even more investors to conclude that risk was a thing of the past.

DOJ_NMG_0138867

Sooner or later, however, reality was bound to intrude. By early 2007, the collapse of the U.S. housing boom had brought with it widespread defaults on subprime mortgages — loans to home buyers who fail to meet the strictest lending standards. Lenders insisted that this was an isolated problem, which wouldn't spread to the rest of the market or to the real economy. But it did.

For a couple of months after the shock of Feb. 27, markets oscillated wildly, soaring on bits of apparent good news, then plunging again. But by late spring, it was clear that the self-reinforcing cycle of complacency had given way to a self-reinforcing cycle of anxiety.

There was still one big unknown: had large market players, hedge funds in particular, taken on so much leverage — borrowing to buy risky assets — that the falling prices of those assets would set off a chain reaction of defaults and bankruptcies? Now, as we survey the financial wreckage of a global recession, we know the answer.

In retrospect, the complacency of investors on the eve of the crisis seems puzzling. Why didn't they see the risks?

Well, things always seem clearer with the benefit of hindsight. At the time, even pessimists were unsure of their ground. For example, Paul Krugman concluded a column published on March 2, 2007, which described how a financial meltdown might happen, by hedging his bets, declaring that: "I'm not saying that things will actually play out this way. But if we're going to have a crisis, here's how."

Most Support U.S. Guarantee Of Health Care (NYT)

By ROBIN TONER And JANET ELDER

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

A majority of Americans say the federal government should guarantee health insurance to every American, especially children, and are willing to pay higher taxes to do it, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll.

How the Poll Was Conducted (March 2, 2007) While the war in Iraq remains the overarching issue in the early stages of the 2008 campaign, access to affordable health care is at the top of the public's domestic agenda, ranked far more important than immigration, cutting taxes or promoting traditional values.

Only 24 percent said they were satisfied with President Bush's handling of the health insurance issue, despite his recent initiatives, and 62 percent said the Democrats were more likely to improve the health care system.

Americans showed a striking willingness in the poll to make tradeoffs to guarantee health insurance for all, including paying as much as $500 more in taxes a year and forgoing future tax cuts.

But the same divisions that doomed the last effort at creating universal health insurance, under the Clinton administration, are still apparent. Americans remain divided, largely along party lines, over whether the government should require everyone to participate in a national health care plan, and over whether the government would do a better job than the private insurance industry in providing coverage.

Looking ahead to the presidential campaign, 36 percent of Americans polled said they had confidence in the ability of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, to "make the right decisions on health care," while 49 percent said they were uneasy about her.

But Mrs. Clinton retained the confidence of nearly 6 in 10 Democrats on the issue, despite the politically devastating collapse 13 years ago of the national health initiative she helped develop early in her husband's presidency.

The poll helps explain why health care already looms large in the presidential campaign, and in statehouses from California — where Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, has proposed a sweeping coverage plan — to Massachusetts, now instituting a program passed under Mitt Romney, the former governor and current Republican presidential candidate.

John Edwards, the Democratic presidential candidate and former senator from North Carolina, recently unveiled his own attempt at a consensus plan, one that would require everyone to have insurance and require employers to provide it or pay into a fund that would do so. Nearly 4 in 10 said that was a good idea; nearly half said they were unsure.

While Democrats are traditionally strong supporters of expanding health coverage, this survey found many Republicans and independents in agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0138868

"I think everybody should have some kind of health care available to them," said Diane Manning, 66, of Vancouver, Wash., who described herself as an independent.

"I don't necessarily think that socialized medicine is the answer, but I think everyone should have that right," said Mrs. Manning, who participated in the poll and agreed to a follow-up interview. "And there are so many people that don't."

Nearly 47 million people in the United States, or more than 15 percent of the population, now go without health insurance, up 6.8 million since 2000.

The poll also found overwhelming support behind the Children's Health Insurance Program, which covers many low- and moderate-income children and is up for renewal in Congress this year. Eighty-four percent of those polled said they supported expanding the current program to cover all uninsured children, now estimated at more than eight million. A similar majority said they thought the lack of health insurance for many children was a "very serious" problem for the country.

The nationwide telephone poll of 1,281 adults was conducted Feb. 23- 27, and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

The poll found Americans across party lines willing to make some sacrifice to ensure that every American has access to health insurance. Sixty percent, including 62 percent of independents and 46 percent of Republicans, said they would be willing to pay more in taxes. Half said they would be willing to pay as much as $500 a year more.

Nearly 8 in 10 said they thought it was more important to provide universal access to health insurance than to extend the tax cuts of recent years; 18 percent said the tax cuts were more important.

"I wouldn't want to pay a lot of taxes, but if it was spread out and everyone paid their fair share, it would be fine," said Don Galvan, 50, a computer programmer from Ringwood, N.J., who considers himself an independent. "Everybody should have some kind of medical coverage, in case they or their children get sick. Especially children."

Most participants said they were satisfied with the quality of their health care, but there was widespread concern about costs. Nearly half of those with insurance said an employer had cut back on benefits or required them to pay more for their benefits in recent years.

How the Poll Was Conducted (March 2, 2007) A quarter of those with insurance said someone in their household had gone without a medical test or treatment because insurance would not cover it. Six in 10 of those without insurance said someone in their household had gone without care because of the cost.

More people now see guaranteeing health insurance as important than did so at the end of the Clinton efforts in 1996. At that time, 56 percent polled said it was the government's responsibility to do so, and 38 percent said it was not. In the current poll, 64 percent said the government should guarantee health insurance for all; 27 percent said it should not.

Moreover, an overwhelming majority in the current poll said the health care system needed fundamental change or total reorganization, just as they did in the early 1990s, when a deep recession and soaring health care costs galvanized the public and spurred the Clinton drive.

But now, as then, this concern did not translate into a consensus on what should replace it.

One question offered a choice between the current system and a national health insurance program covering everyone, administered by the government and financed by taxpayers. Thirty-eight percent said they preferred the current system, 47 percent the government-run approach.

Robert Blendon, an expert at Harvard on public opinion and health, said politicians had to find some compromise between these philosophical divisions on the role of government, which are deep-seated in American culture, or "we're going to have the same train wreck we did before."

The Clinton plan, itself an attempt at a compromise, collapsed under attacks from an array of interests, including the insurance industry, which warned that the plan amounted to a big government takeover.

Mr. Blendon noted that many politicians were seeking a blend between the private market and the government in their health plans.

McCain And Obama In Deal On Public Financing (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

DOJ_NMG_0138869

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — Senator John McCain joined Senator Barack Obama on Thursday in promising to accept a novel fund-raising truce if each man wins his party's presidential nomination.

The promises by Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Mr. Obama, Democrat of Illinois, are an effort to resuscitate part of the ailing public financing system for presidential campaigns.

In every election since Watergate, candidates have received limited sums of taxpayer money on the condition that they abstain from raising or spending any more. But this year, the leading candidates are all sidestepping the system in a competition to raise far more in private donations, more than $500 million each, according to most projections, compared with $150 million in potential public financing.

But there is a chance that the obituaries for the public system may be premature. On Thursday, a spokesman for Mr. McCain said that he would take up Mr. Obama on a proposal for an accord between the two major party nominees to rely just on public financing for the general election.

Such a pact would eliminate any financial edge one candidate might have and limit each campaign to $85 million for the general election. The two candidates would have to return any private donations that they had raised for that period.

Mr. Obama laid out his proposal last month to the Federal Election Commission, seeking an opinion on its legality. The commissioners formally approved it on Thursday.

The manager of Mr. McCain's campaign, Terry Nelson, said he welcomed the decision.

"Should John McCain win the Republican nomination, we will agree to accept public financing in the general election, if the Democratic nominee agrees to do the same," Mr. Nelson said.

A spokesman for Mr. Obama, Bill Burton, said, "We hope that each of the Republican candidates pledges to do the same."

Mr. Burton added that if nominated Mr. Obama would "aggressively pursue an agreement" with whoever was his opponent.

Mr. McCain and Mr. Obama have backed changing campaign finances.

McCain Ups The Ante Over Campaign Finance (POL)

By Kenneth P. Vogel

The Politico, March 2, 2007

John McCain raised the stakes Thursday in an emerging campaign finance showdown among the major presidential candidates.

In move similar to Democrat Barack Obama's last month, McCain, a Republican, pledged to accept public funding in a general election, provided the Democratic nominee does the same. McCain's announcement came hours after the Federal Election Commission granted presidential candidates increased fundraising flexibility.

The moves by McCain, the senior senator from Arizona, and Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, seemed designed to solidify their positions as the field's leading advocates for reducing the influence of money in politics. But their pledges will also put some pressure on the other leading candidates from both parties to follow.

The leading Republican candidates had refrained from actively pursuing general election funds, which kept open the possibility of accepting public funds later.

The leading Democratic candidates have already announced they would not curtail their pursuit of general election funds in order to comply with the public funding system's limits. But the commission's decision gives them the chance to reconsider should they win the nomination.

Democrats Hillary Rodham Clinton, the junior senator from New York, and John Edwards, a former senator from North Carolina, both indicated they might take that newly open option. But neither went as far as Obama or McCain.

Among the GOP contenders, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani plans to start collecting general election money, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is considering it. Neither would match the pledges made by McCain or Obama.

Clinton's spokesman rejected the suggestion that his senator's position was less demonstrative than either Obama's or McCain's.

DOJ_NMG_0138870

"I don't think it's less than what anybody else is saying because we don't know what the situation is going to be," said spokesman Phil Singer. "Obviously, given the current state of affairs, we're going to consider what our options are should we become the nominee."

Giuliani's campaign issued a statement saying, "We are raising private money for the primary and will begin raising private money for the general as allowed by the FEC ruling. We have not decided at this time whether we will accept public funding if we win the nomination."

Edwards' deputy campaign manager, Jonathan Prince, echoed that stance.

"We'll make a decision at the time about the best way to ensure we have the maximum possible resources to win," he said.

The commission's decision, prompted by a request from Obama, allows candidates to seek the maximum $4,600 donation – technically $2,300 for the primary election and $2,300 for the general election – from each donor and maintain the option of returning the general election funds. That would allow them to take public financing. Previously, candidates who intended to seek public financing for the general election – as President Bush and Democrat John F. Kerry did in 2004 – were limited to accepting $2,300 per donor.

"John McCain welcomes the FEC's ruling that presidential campaigns can accept general election funds with the option to return the funds and participate in public financing once the general election phase of the campaign has begun," McCain campaign manager Terry Nelson said in a statement. The campaign will begin collecting general election funds, he said, adding "should John McCain win the Republican nomination, we will agree to accept public financing in the general election, if the Democratic nominee agrees to do the same."

The moves might prove significant only if Obama and McCain win their respective parties' nominations, since election lawyers and political analysts say the fiscal and political landscape of the 2008 campaign cycle make it unlikely that other major party candidates will sacrifice the spending ability necessary to participate in the program.

It provides roughly $85 million in taxpayer funds for the general election campaigns of candidates who agree to abide by spending limits. That's a fraction of the tally the leading candidates would be expected to raise and spend in private donations in a campaign that experts predict could top $1 billion in spending.

McCain May Opt Out Of Financing System (EX)

By JIM KUHNHENN,

DC Examiner, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Republican presidential candidate John McCain, a longtime advocate of limiting the influence of money in political campaigns, will opt out of the post-Watergate presidential public financing system unless the Democratic nominee agrees to campaign under the same financial restrictions, his campaign said Thursday.

The McCain camp's decision came after the Federal Election Commission eased some political fundraising rules in hopes of salvaging the tattered presidential financing system in the 2008 campaign.

By a 5-0 vote, the commission said presidential candidates may solicit private contributions for the general election now and still be eligible for public financing if they become their party's nominee.

The decision - a response to a request for advice from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama - would permit the two major party nominees to strike a deal and limit their campaigns to the public money available in a presidential campaign fund. In return, the candidates would have to return any private contributions they raised for the general election to their donors.

"The McCain campaign will now begin the process of accepting these general election funds, following the new FEC guidelines," McCain campaign manager Terry nelson said. "Should John McCain win the Republican nomination, we will agree to accept public financing in the general election if the Democratic nominee agrees to do the same."

FEC commissioners hailed their decision Thursday as one way to help preserve a public financing system that is in danger of becoming obsolete.

"We all know the public financing system rests on a very fragile base," said one commissioner, Hans A. von Spakovsky.

The FEC action comes as front-runners from both parties have decided to forgo public funds in primaries because acceptance of the money would require candidates to abide by spending limits. Several candidates also have said they will bypass public money in the general election, believing they could raise far more than the $85 million available for each party's nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0138871

Such a development would be the first time a presidential election would operate entirely outside the public financing system created in the wake of the Watergate scandal more than 30 years ago. Campaign strategists and election money experts predict the two party nominees could end up spending $500 million each in the primary and general elections, far more than would be available if they simply took public financing.

In addition to Obama, Democrats Hillary Clinton and John Edwards have also said they will raise general election contributions now. The decision by McCain, however, was especially significant because he has been a champion of legislation to restrict the role of money in elections. The 2002 law that bans wealthy donors, unions and corporations from giving unlimited contributions to the national parties bears his name.

Taxpayers contribute to the public finance system by selecting whether to direct $3 of their tax liability to the presidential fund in their tax returns. Legislation pending in Congress seeks to retain the public financing system by increasing the amount that taxpayers would set aside and by removing spending restrictions for primary candidates who accept the public money.

Obama's lawyers, in seeking the FEC's opinion, said he wanted to be able to raise private money for the general election while retaining the option of seeking a bipartisan agreement to only accept the public money.

The FEC on Thursday said he and the other candidates could do that provided they keep the general election money separate and return it to donors if they decide not to use it.

The question remains whether candidates would even consider such a spending armistice, especially if an accelerated primary schedule results in a lengthy and expensive general election campaign.

In their request to the FEC, Obama's lawyers said only that Obama would not "rule out" a publicly financed campaign and stressed that "both major parties' nominees" would have to agree to such a step.

On Thursday, Obama spokesman Bill Burton said: "If Senator Obama is the nominee, he will aggressively pursue an agreement with the Republican nominee to preserve a publicly financed general election."

The FEC's decision could have gone in another direction. At issue was a provision in campaign finance law that nominees are eligible for public financing if "no contributions have been or will be accepted by candidate or his or her authorized committee."

But commissioners said strict adherence to that provision would simply force candidates to forgo the public financing system entirely.

"It would be wrong for the agency to stand on a wooden interpretation of its regulations and of the statute while the public financing system crashes and burns," Commissioner Ellen Weintraub said.

Analysis: High Hurdles Set Before McCain (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, March 2, 2007

This time a Republican heavyweight not an underdog, John McCain embarks on his second presidential run facing numerous challenges in courting a GOP establishment he once spurned at nearly every turn.

In a move meant to spark his campaign, the Arizona senator chose a late-night talk show to make clear Wednesday what long had been anticipated — "I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States."

But a day after he disclosed his plans on CBS' "Late Night With David Letterman" to formally enter the race in April, McCain found himself on the defensive for saying during the appearance that U.S. lives had been "wasted" in Iraq.

"I should have used the word 'sacrificed' as I have in the past," the former Vietnam prisoner of war said amid some Democratic complaints.

The episode underscored the intense scrutiny in store for McCain — the freewheeling candidate of 2000 — while he seeks the presidency as one of the GOP's strongest contenders and as the country wages an unpopular war to which McCain is perhaps forever linked.

DOJ_NMG_0138872

Projecting an air of invincibility, McCain spent more than a year laying the foundation for another White House bid and ended 2006 as the front-runner for the GOP nomination. He added veterans of President Bush's campaigns to his own experienced staff, recruited proven fundraisers and collected early endorsements from senators and local elected officials alike.

But over the past few months, McCain has put most of his efforts into Iraq and shepherding Bush's unpopular troop increase through Congress. Meanwhile, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani made it clear he was running and enthusiasm for his candidacy grew while ex-Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts formally entered the race and set the pace in fundraising.

Recently, Giuliani's edge in national popularity polls has widened considerably over McCain, even among white evangelicals who make up a core of the GOP base. All that has caused some Republicans in Washington to question — mostly in private conversations — whether McCain's campaign needed a jump start.

"McCain is on target, on schedule, but maybe is suffering a bit from Giuliani being the flavor of the month," said Ken Duberstein, a GOP consultant in Washington. Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster in Alexandria, Va., was more blunt: "He doesn't seem to have made any progress lately, let's put it that way."

Countering that perception, McCain told The Associated Press earlier this week: "We've had very good movement ... It's not only not stalled, it's that we've seen significant progress."

Regardless, 10 months before the first primary votes, McCain's work to woo the GOP base — and become the party's standard-bearer — is just beginning, and he must overcome a spate of hurdles to get the Republican nomination.

The feisty McCain long has been known in Congress as an independent Republican unafraid to buck the party or speak his mind — and he reveled in his rebel reputation in his bitter and ultimately unsuccessful 2000 race against George W. Bush.

Then, much of the GOP establishment lined up behind Bush early on so McCain had no choice but to run as an anti-establishment candidate — and he did so with fervor, said Kenneth Sherrill, a political science professor at Hunter College in New York.

"This time, McCain has worked very hard to identify himself as the heir apparent and to be as closely aligned as possible to the forces that vanquished him in 2000, but he does face a couple of problems," Sherrill said.

McCain must convince Republican primary voters that they can trust him to be a loyal party champion who will adhere to GOP's core principles — and not waver.

Some conservatives, who make up a critical part of the Republican base, are skeptical of his veracity given that he once derided their leaders as "agents of intolerance" but now has sought to repair relations with them.

In what is being perceived as another slight, McCain decided to skip a major annual gathering of conservatives in Washington this weekend even though most in the crowded GOP field were attending.

As he campaigns, he likely will have to answer for conflicts on certain issues that give conservatives pause:

_On taxes, McCain voted against Bush's tax cut in 2001, but now says he favors extending the cuts. He says doing otherwise would amount to a tax increase.

_On abortion, McCain said once in 1999 that he didn't think Roe v. Wade, the landmark decision legalizing abortion, should be overturned but now he advocates its repeal.

McCain also may find himself having to explain other actions that further rankled the base — spearheading the law that reformed the campaign finance system, backing Bush's call for an eventual path to citizenship for some of the millions of illegal immigrants in the U.S., and his collegial working relationship with liberal lion Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

At the same time, McCain could end up fighting the perception that he's the past. Giuliani and Romney are fresh faces to GOP primary voters, who largely know McCain from his previous run — and have deep-seated feelings for him, for better or worse.

McCain's age and his health also might become an issue. Should he win this nomination and then the presidency, McCain, 70, would be the oldest president ever sworn into office for a first term. He also is a cancer survivor.

He bristles at the notion that voters may see him as unfit to serve, telling AP: "I work seven days a week, 16 plus hours a day. I'm fine. I'm healthy."

Oddly, Iraq — the four-year-old war a majority of Americans oppose — could end up being McCain's ticket to winning the Republican nod.

DOJ_NMG_0138873

Although he has criticized how Bush handled it, McCain's unflinching support for the war and Bush's troop increase could endear him to hard-core Republican voters — and, perhaps, prove they can count on him.

Senators Regret Remarks On Troops (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — They come from different parties and have opposite views on what should be done in Iraq. But both Senator John McCain and Senator Barack Obama have now had to express regret for saying that American lives have been "wasted" in battle.

Mr. McCain, the Arizona Republican who has been a big supporter of the war and has backed President Bush's call for more troops, made his remarks Wednesday in an appearance on "Late Night With David Letterman" while criticizing the White House's management of the war.

"Americans are very frustrated, and they have every right to be," he said. "We've wasted a lot of our most precious treasure, which is American lives, over there."

Mr. Obama, the Illinois Democrat who has been a critic of the war from the start, made a similar remark in a visit to Iowa after announcing his candidacy. "We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged, and to which we now have spent $400 billion and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted," he said.

Mr. McCain was criticized on Thursday by the Democratic National Committee for making the remark, just as Mr. Obama had been criticized by conservative groups.

"How is it that John McCain now believes American lives are being wasted, yet he so stubbornly supports the president's plan to escalate the war in Iraq and put more American lives in harm's way?" asked Karen Finney, a spokeswoman for the Democratic committee.

Mr. McCain and Mr. Obama responded to the criticisms the same way: by recanting remarks they said they regretted.

"I should have used the word 'sacrificed,' as I have in the past," Mr. McCain said. "No one appreciates and honors more than I do the selfless patriotism of American service men and women in Iraq."

McCain Apologizes For Gaffe On Troops (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Sen. John McCain yesterday apologized for saying the lives of the troops killed fighting the war in Iraq were "wasted," becoming the latest White House hopeful recanting his word choice within hours of announcing 2008 candidacy.

Less than 24 hours after telling CBS' David Letterman he would seek the Republican presidential nomination, the Arizona senator was forced to issue a statement clarifying his remarks.

"Last evening, I referred to American casualties in Iraq as wasted. I should have used the word 'sacrificed,' as I have in the past," said Mr. McCain, a decorated Vietnam War veteran and a key ally of President Bush on Iraq policy.

"No one appreciates and honors more than I do the selfless patriotism of American servicemen and women in the Iraq War," he said in the statement, which did not use the word "apology."

Mr. McCain told Mr. Letterman on Wednesday: "Americans are very frustrated, and they have every right to be. We've wasted a lot of our most precious treasure, which is American lives."

The Democratic National Committee immediately called on Mr. McCain to apologize to American military families.

"How is it that John McCain now believes American lives are being 'wasted,' yet he so stubbornly supports the President's plan to escalate the war in Iraq and put more American lives in harm's way?" DNC spokeswoman Karen Finney fired off in a statement, saying he was "insulting our brave troops."

A similar semantic scuffle erupted following Sen. Barack Obama's official presidential announcement last month, when he told Iowans, "We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized, and should have never been waged, and on which we've now spent $400 billion, and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted."

DOJ_NMG_0138874

The Illinois Democrat later apologized for a "slip of the tongue," telling the Des Moines Register, "I was actually upset with myself when I said that, because I never use that term. Their sacrifices are never wasted."

"What I meant to say was those sacrifices have not been honored by the same attention to strategy, diplomacy and honesty on the part of civilian leadership that would give them a clear mission," he said.

Mr. McCain's apology was similar and welcomed by his colleagues, who said he should be forgiven for misspeaking.

"This is life with constant media exposure," said McCain friend Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican.

"He is in the spotlight and every thought is analyzed and every word is subject to criticism," he said. "Presidential aspirants are human, and they are all going to go through this."

Indeed, few 2008 wannabes remain without a gaffe.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr.'s first day as a candidate was dominated by a verbal flap for which he was compelled to apologize by early evening.

His announcement was overshadowed by a New York Observer article in which he said Mr. Obama as a candidate was the "first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

The Delaware Democrat's apology said he meant no offense to Mr. Obama or past black presidential candidates.

John Edwards, a former Democratic senator from North Carolina, was embarrassed when his official announcement was leaked on the Internet the day before he intended to declare his presidential intentions.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton did her announcement via Web video, eliminating the possibility of an error. But a week later, she faced less-than-friendly headlines for a joke she tried to make in Iowa about "evil" men.

A supporter asked Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, how she was equipped to fight "evil men" such as terrorist Osama bin Laden. As she repeated the question, pausing at the words "evil men," she made the audience laugh, prompting reporters to speculate she was making a joke about either her husband, former President Bill Clinton, or former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

"I've made a lot of mistakes, fortunately they've been in places that you guys aren't located," said presidential contender Sen. Sam Brownback, referring to reporters. The Kansas Republican joked that he'd rather not share them now.

On a serious note, Mr. Brownback defended Mr. McCain as a "patriot," noting, "I don't think anybody thinks the troop lives have been wasted."

Mr. Obama agreed, telling reporters, "As somebody who has had the same phrase in a speech, you know, I think that nobody would question Senator McCain's dedication to our veterans."

He also speculated Mr. McCain meant to express a similar sentiment to his own, that lawmakers have a "sacred duty to make sure that we are honoring their sacrifice by giving them missions in which they can succeed."

In his statement, Mr. McCain acknowledged U.S. mistakes in Iraq.

"We have paid a grievous price for those mistakes in the lives of the men and women who have died to protect our interests in Iraq and defend the rest of us from the even greater threat we would face if we are defeated there."

Anyone But McCain, Santorum Says (POL)

By Carrie Budoff

The Politico, March 2, 2007

Former Sen. Rick Santorum has drawn at least one conclusion about the Republican presidential primary field: Anybody but John McCain.

The Pennsylvania Republican, who signed a contract Thursday as a Fox News contributor, said that he has spoken with every GOP candidate except the senator from Arizona but that it's still too early for him to endorse.

"The only one I wouldn't support is McCain," Santorum said during an interview in his office at the Ethics and Public Policy Center in Washington, where he is a senior fellow.

"I don't agree with him on hardly any issues,'' Santorum said. "I don't think he has the temperament and leadership ability to move the country in the right direction."

Responding, McCain spokesman Danny Diaz said McCain was a "well-known and respected conservative."

DOJ_NMG_0138875

Santorum lost his Senate seat last fall in a landslide to Democrat Bob Casey but remains a prominent voice in the conservative movement – a voting bloc in search of a presidential candidate.

Santorum's critical appraisal of McCain contradicts a seemingly cordial relationship, at least in the last year. McCain had headlined a fundraiser for Santorum, and they co-authored an ethics overhaul proposal.

For More Info Visit Our Candidates Page

Over the years, however, Santorum said they have clashed on campaign finance reform, environmental policy, tax cuts, immigration and other issues.

Santorum suggested that McCain also wasn't as solidly anti-abortion as he would like. "He may be pro-life, but I served with him for 12 years, and I know how pro-life he is," Santorum said.

Diaz said McCain favors overturning Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court ruling that legalized abortion, and has picked up support from other conservative senators.

"He has been a lonely voice for fiscal discipline in the nation's capital," Diaz said, "and has fought to protect life and build a strong defense."

Santorum has spent the last two months building a new life outside of Congress, where he served for 16 years in the House and Senate.

He will begin appearing soon on Fox News shows. He also is writing a book and producing a documentary on a theme he began pressing in the final months of his campaign: the threat of radical Islam on the nation's security.

He said he's weighing an offer from The Philadelphia Inquirer to write an op-ed column,and will start his own communications consulting business – but do no lobbying.

"That's not me," Santorum said.

Besides, he added, "I want to keep my political options open."

FEC Rules On Presidential Campaign Funding (CHIT)

By John McCormick

Chicago Tribune, March 2, 2007

The Federal Election Commission said Thursday that presidential candidates may accept private contributions for potential general election campaigns and still remain eligible for public financing if they ultimately win their party's nomination.

The ruling came after a request for clarification from Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who has suggested he would like the option of running a publicly financed general election campaign — with its associated spending limits — if he could convince a future Republican opponent to do the same.

Political observers, however, say the ruling is likely a moot point since a financial truce is highly unlikely in an era where political advertising, organization and travel are extremely expensive and both parties will be ferociously fighting for a White House with no incumbent.

The decision, in a 5-0 vote, comes as front-runners from both parties have forgone public funds and spending limits for the primaries.

Obama had requested the ruling, stating that two of his top rivals for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), have indicated they likely would reject the public financing system that has governed presidential elections for more than three decades.

The system, started in the wake of the Watergate scandal, gives presidential candidates money for campaign expenses, if they agree to certain spending limits. In 2008, the allocation is expected to be about $80 million, a small portion of what observers suspect each candidate will actually spend.

The commission said Obama may solicit and receive contributions for the general election if he meets certain conditions, including that the money be kept in a separate escrow account and that the funds not go for anything but general election activities.

If Obama were to win the Democratic nomination and then decide to accept public funding for the general election, he would also need to refund all general election contributions within 60 days of certifying his eligibility for public funds.

DOJ_NMG_0138876

"Sen. Obama is pleased the FEC took this important step in preserving the public financing system," Obama spokesman Bill Burton said. "If Sen. Obama is the nominee, he will aggressively pursue an agreement with the Republican nominee to preserve a publicly financed general election."

Panel Upholds Obama Funding Request (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The US Federal Election Commission yesterday unanimously upheld a request by Barack Obama, one of the leading Democratic presidential candidates, to continue to raise private funds without closing off his right to public financing if he were nominated as his party's candidate.

Mr Obama, who polls say is closing in on Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, said he would do all that he could to preserve the US's virtually broken system of public election financing.

His stance contrasts sharply with that of Mrs Clinton, who announced in January that she would rely solely on private sources of money for both the party primaries and the general election.

In a statement from his campaign headquarters in Chicago, Mr Obama said that if he was nominated as the Democratic party's 2008 presidential candidate he would "aggressively pursue" a deal with his Republican counterpart to forgo private funding in favour of the public system. He also said that he had sought the FEC's opinion in order to try to preserve public financing.

The first-term senator from Illinois, who has based his candidacy on a promise to bring a new tone to US politics, has surprised many in his party by offering a sharp and direct challenge to Mrs Clinton, whom many saw as unsurpassable a few months ago.

Mrs Clinton, who yesterday announced she had raised $1m over the past week from online donors, is expected to raise more money during the 2008 campaign than any previous candidate in US history. The FEC has projected that the two party nominees will have spent $500m apiece by the end of 2008 - more than double that of 2004.

Almost all the leading candidates of both parties, including Mr Obama, have opted to rely solely on private money for the party primary campaigns, which conclude when the official nominations take place at the party conventions in August 2008. But Mr Obama, who last week raised $1.3m at a Hollywood fundraising event, is the only leading candidate to say that the system of public financing is worth preserving.

Obama Ruling Could Prove Moot, Backfire (POL)

By Kenneth P. Vogel

The Politico, March 2, 2007

Prompted by Barack Obama, a federal panel Thursday granted unprecedented fundraising flexibility to presidential candidates.

But the unanimous ruling by the Federal Election Commission is likely to have little practical long-term impact. And it could leave Obama, the junior senator from Illinois and among the front-runners for the Democratic nomination for president, in a tricky spot.

The senator earned kudos when he asked the commission for permission to pursue an innovative fundraising strategy that his lawyer suggested would pave the way for a clean election and save the struggling presidential public financing system.

In explaining his vote to approve Obama's request, commission Vice Chairman David Mason said, "The overall enterprise I think all of us are about and all of us agree on is preserving the flexibility of candidates to get back into the public financing program for the general election if they chose to do that.''

Election lawyers and political analysts, however, say the fiscal and political landscape of the 2008 campaign make it unlikely that either major party nominee will use that flexibility.

"If I had to bet, I would bet that they'll wind up not taking public money and going with what they raise," said Brett Kappel, a Democratic campaign finance lawyer with Vorys, Sater, Seymour and Pease.

DOJ_NMG_0138877

Together, the nominees are expected to spend upwards of $1 billion on their campaigns. By that calculation, nominees who go the new route could be required to return roughly $165 million each soon after their respective conventions – typically the start of an expensive advertising blitz that continues through the November general election – in order to qualify for $85 million in matching public funds.

Many of the leading contenders for the Democratic and Republican nominations have already either said they will opt out or are considering opting out of the system.

Before the decision, candidates were required to opt out to seek the maximum $4,600 donation – technically $2,300 for the primary election and $2,300 for the general election – from each donor.

Now, candidates can raise $4,600 from each donor and still hold open the possibility of taking public financing. Previously, candidates who intended to seek public financing for the general election – as President Bush and Democrat John F. Kerry did in 2004 – were limited to accepting $2,300 per donor.

Obama himself is raising money for the general election, but his attorney sent a letter to the commission last month asking it to clear the following scenario: Obama would raise money for the general election and if he wins the nomination, he and the Republican nominee would return general election funds and decide to participate in public financing.

"Should both major party candidates elect to receive public funding, this would preserve the public financing system, now in danger of collapse, and facilitate the conduct of campaigns freed from any dependence on private fundraising," wrote Obama's attorney, Bob Bauer of Perkins Coie.

The request earned Obama accolades – including an editorial in the Miami Herald crediting him with "an idea that could keep the public financing system alive" – and enhanced the good government profile he's cultivated (he led the ethics reform charge in the Senate and sponsored a bill to overhaul the public system for the 2012 presidential election).

And the request gave Obama a rhetorical club to wield over both his Democratic competitors – particularly Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, the first to announce she was opting out of public financing – and potentially the Republican nominee.

It was carefully worded to stress that Obama would return general election contributions and take public financing only "if both major parties' nominees eventually decide, or even agree, on this course."

That may not entirely inoculate him against criticism for declining public financing, said University of Virginia political science professor Larry Sabato. "When you present yourself as a 'clean' candidate, you are often held to a higher standard, whether that is fair or unfair," Sabato said. "Media and observers outside the arena may insist that Obama follow through on public financing in the general election, even if his opponent isn't doing so."

Obama's spokesman Bill Burton said that if Obama is the nominee, he would "aggressively pursue an agreement with the Republican nominee to preserve a publicly financed general election."

The newly approved course is open to any of the candidates, but the leading campaigns either did not respond to requests for comment or were noncommittal.

"It will be a consideration that will be part of any decision made at a point further down the road," said Kevin Madden, campaign spokesman for Republican Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts. "Right now, our concentration is focusing both our organizing and our fundraising efforts on the primary," Madden said.

The commission ruling allows the nominees to accept public financing provided they keep any general election contributions they raised in separate accounts, don't spend them and refund them within 60 days of winning the nomination.

That's not permitted under the law, said Paul Ryan, associate legal counsel for the Campaign Legal Center, a nonprofit organization that along with another group wrote the commission urging rejection of Obama's request. The route Obama proposed would neither free candidates from constant fundraising nor shield them from the "deleterious influence of large contributions," the groups wrote.

Still, their letter characterized the request as "a good faith effort by Senator Obama and his campaign to preserve, and have the opportunity to use, this extremely important and valuable system to our democracy and the American people."

Saving The System (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0138878

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

THANKS TO an innovative request from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, the Federal Election Commission voted yesterday to try to salvage the endangered public financing system for presidential elections. Now it is up to presidential candidates who claim to support that system to put real commitment behind their rhetoric.

The FEC ruled that candidates can raise general election money now -- as most top-tier contenders are doing -- but change their minds down the road, return the private money and accept public financing instead. Candidates who are sincere supporters of public financing ought to be willing to pledge to stay within the system if they win their party's nomination and the other side's nominee promises to do the same.

So far, the indications are favorable. "If Senator Obama is the nominee, he will aggressively pursue an agreement with the Republican nominee to preserve a publicly financed general election," spokesman Bill Burton said after the FEC action. He was matched by the campaign of Arizona Sen. John McCain. "Should John McCain win the Republican nomination, we will agree to accept public financing in the general election, if the Democratic nominee agrees to do the same," said campaign manager Terry Nelson.

The 2008 campaign had been shaping up to be the first in which both parts of the post-Watergate presidential financing system collapsed. By the 2004 race, the cost of campaigning and the capacity for fundraising had so outstripped spending restrictions for the primary campaign that none of the serious contenders agreed to accept matching funds in exchange for limiting his spending. This time around it looked as if the system of full financing for the general election -- each major party nominee would receive about $85 million in exchange for forgoing private funds -- would be obsolete as well.

But the FEC's approval of Mr. Obama's request would allow candidates to agree to call off the general election money race -- provided that other candidates follow the example of Mr. Obama and Mr. McCain. The campaigns of John Edwards and Rudolph W. Giuliani did not respond to e-mail inquiries; Mitt Romney's campaign said it was focused on the primaries. "We'll definitely consider it," said Phil Singer, a spokesman for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign.

Candidates who believe in public financing need to do more than consider Mr. Obama's challenge. They should just say yes and help save the system.

At Site Of '65 March, An '08 Collision (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Bill Clinton will join Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton at a commemoration of the 1965 civil rights march in Selma, Ala., on Sunday, bringing his star power and popularity among African Americans to a weekend of events that had been shaping up as a showcase for the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama.

It will be the former president's first major public appearance with his wife since she launched her campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination last month.

Obama (D-Ill.) announced several weeks ago that he would deliver the keynote speech at a service honoring the march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge, joining Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.) and other veterans of the civil rights movement in marking the historic event. Obama has gained significantly among black voters in recent months, according to a recent Washington Post-ABC News survey, jeopardizing Clinton's early lead in the Democratic primary field.

Reluctant to give any ground to Obama even at this stage of the campaign, Clinton (N.Y.) decided early last week that she, too, would go to Selma this weekend. She arranged a simultaneous appearance at a church just steps away from the one where Obama will speak Sunday morning, and she agreed to accept a civil rights award on behalf of her husband.

Late yesterday, after organizers initially said that the former president would not attend, the Clinton campaign announced that he would be making the trip after all.

The convergence of the Clintons and Obama in the small Alabama town that became the focus of national attention during a series of police beatings and civil rights demonstrations that ultimately helped pave the way for the Voting Rights Act of 1965 sets the stage for an extraordinary political showdown -- and media circus.

DOJ_NMG_0138879

The imminent collision of the two candidates, who cross paths in the Senate but have avoided each other on the campaign trail, offers a vivid snapshot of how important the campaigns believe black voters will be in the primaries. And the swift move by the Clintons to try to claim the spotlight at the event demonstrated that the former first lady does not intend to cede the black vote to Obama.

"I think the Clinton camp is sending a signal that they will aggressively contest Barack Obama for the African American vote," said Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), who has endorsed Obama and whose district includes Selma. "It's a good thing the black vote will not be taken for granted and will be actively contested." Alabama, which has a large black electorate, has not locked in a primary date; it could come as early as Feb. 5, 2008, which is shaping up to be a national primary with contests from coast to coast.

Lewis -- an icon of "Bloody Sunday" whose skull was bashed by Alabama police as he helped lead a peaceful march from Selma to Montgomery on March 7, 1965 -- organizes a pilgrimage back each year, traditionally with a group of both Democratic and Republican members of Congress in attendance (though this year, few Republicans are expected to attend, in part because the event appears poised to become dominated by Democratic politics). Numerous other Democratic lawmakers are planning to join Lewis on his three-day pilgrimage, including Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who has close ties to the Clintons and Obama.

"I think it's gratifying to see that two of the leading contenders for the Democratic nomination would want to come to Selma 42 years after Bloody Sunday, and I think it dramatizes the changes that have occurred in American politics and black politics in particular," Lewis said in an interview.

He said he has not decided whom to support in the Democratic primary. "I have been talking with Mr. Obama, and haven't talked so much to Senator Clinton, but I've talked to President Clinton, and I think right now, I'm just trying to get through the weekend and make this journey successful," Lewis said. He described the black vote in general as "up for grabs."

The main events this weekend will occur Sunday, when Obama speaks at a unity breakfast and then delivers the keynote address at Brown Chapel AME Church, the most historic church in Selma and the place where demonstrators organized for the 1965 march. Lewis plans to attend that service.

A short distance away, at precisely the same time, Clinton will speak at First Baptist Church.

Later that afternoon, Obama and Clinton are planning to participate in the crossing of the Edmund Pettus Bridge, where Lewis and his fellow demonstrators were turned back by baton-wielding police in 1965. President Clinton plans to fly in that afternoon for his induction into the Hall of Fame at the National Voting Rights Museum, where his wife originally planned to represent him.

"President Clinton is deeply honored by this recognition on an issue on which he and Senator Clinton care so deeply about, and he rearranged his schedule to be there on Sunday because this was an event he felt he couldn't miss," Clinton spokesman Jay Carson said.

How the joint Clinton trip came about was a subject of some debate: The senator's advisers dismissed the suggestion that the former president was rushing in at the last minute to help his wife's standing among black voters. But they admitted that the decision was made yesterday, more than a week after Hillary Clinton made her plans to go to Selma.

Obama spokesman Bill Burton said of the Selma showdown: "It's an important event. The more folks who commemorate and pay attention to it, the better."

Bill Clinton To Join Wife In Alabama (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK Mar 1, 2007 (AP)— In competition for a key Democratic voting bloc, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is enlisting the help of her husband, former President Clinton, at a weekend civil rights commemoration headlined by a formidable black rival, Sen. Barack Obama.

Clinton and Obama, the party's top 2008 presidential contenders, will be in Selma, Ala., Sunday to observe the 42nd anniversary of a civil rights march that helped end racial segregation in the South. Obama is scheduled to deliver the day's keynote address at a Selma church that morning, with Sen. Clinton speaking at another church nearby.

DOJ_NMG_0138880

But late Thursday, the Clinton campaign announced that the former president would join his wife in a symbolic march across the Edmund Pettus bridge, where civil rights workers were beaten by state troopers in 1965. Obama also will participate in the march, along with civil rights activists and others.

Bill Clinton also will be inducted that day in the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame another high-profile opportunity for the Clintons to grab the spotlight from the charismatic Obama.

The joint appearance marks the first time the Clintons have appeared together publicly since she announced her candidacy in January.

Normally, Clinton might not worry much about the support of black voters after serving eight years as first lady in a White House that enjoyed legendary popularity among blacks. Bill Clinton was dubbed "the first black president" by author Toni Morrison, and Hillary Clinton has enjoyed strong support from black voters a critical Democratic constituency as a senator and presidential contender.

But that popularity is being challenged by Obama, a first-term senator from Illinois who some believe has a real chance at becoming the nation's first black president.

Obama spokesman Bill Burton said the more people who attend the anniversary events, the better.

A New Twist To An Intriguing Family History (BSUN)

By David Nitkin And Harry Merritt

The Baltimore Sun, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON // Many people know that Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's father was from Kenya and his mother from Kansas.

But an intriguing sliver of his family history has received almost no attention until now: it appears that forebears of his white mother owned slaves, according to genealogical research and Census records.

The records -- which had never been addressed publicly by the Illinois senator or his relatives -- were first noted in an ancestry report compiled by William Addams Reitwiesner, who works at the Library of Congress and practices genealogy in his spare time. The report, on Reitwiesner's Web site, carries a disclaimer that it is a "first draft" -- one likely to be examined more closely if Obama is nominated.

According to the research, one of Obama's great-great-great-great grandfathers, George Washington Overall, owned two slaves who were recorded in the 1850 Census in Nelson County, Ky. The same records show that one of Obama's great-great-great-great-great-grandmothers, Mary Duvall, also owned two slaves.

The Sun retraced much of Reitwiesner's work, using Census information available on the Web site ancestry.com and documents retrieved by the Kentucky Department for Libraries and Archives, among other sources. The records show that Overall, then 30, owned a 15-year-old black female and a 25-year-old black male, while Mary Duvall, his mother-in-law, owned a 60-year-old black man and a 58-year-old black woman. (Slaves are listed in the 1850 Census by owner, age, "sex," and "colour," not by name.)

An Obama spokesman did not dispute the information and said that the senator's ancestors "are representative of America."

"While a relative owned slaves, another fought for the Union in the Civil War," campaign spokesman Bill Burton said tonight. "And it is a true measure of progress that the descendant of a slave owner would come to marry a student from Kenya and produce a son who would grow up to be a candidate for president of the United States."

The research traces the Duvalls to Mareen Duvall, a major land owner in Anne Arundel County in the 1600s. The inventory of his estate in 1694 names 18 slaves, according to a family history published in 1952.

The records could add a new dimension to questions by some who have asked whether Obama -- who was raised in East Asia and Hawaii and educated at Columbia and Harvard -- is attuned to the struggles of American blacks descended from West African slaves.

DOJ_NMG_0138881

"The twist is very interesting," said Ronald Walters, a political scientist who is director of the African-American Leadership Institute at the University of Maryland, College Park. "It deepens his connection with the experience of slavery, even if it deepens it on a different side of the equation."

Gary Boyd Roberts, a senior research scholar at the New England Historic Genealogical Society who published a book on the family lineages of presidents, said he did not think the slave-holding history was "particularly unusual."

"If you have a white Southern mother, or a mother from the middle states who has ancestry in the South, it doesn't strike me that that should be very surprising," he said. While the majority of such families did not own slaves, many with some wealth did, Roberts said.

Reitwiesner's research identifies two other presidential candidates, Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Democratic Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, as descendants of slave owners. Three of McCain's great-great-grandfathers in Mississippi owned slaves, including one who owned 52 in 1860. Two ancestors of Edwards owned one slave each in Georgia in 1860.

It was unclear tonight whether Obama was aware of any slave-holding ancestors, but he makes no mention of them in his 1995 memoir, Dreams from My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance.

The book contains many approving references to his mother's side of the family. At one point, he writes that his mother "could give voice to the virtues of her midwestern past and offer them up in distilled form."

The memoir, however, comes close to confirming the Overall-Duvall lineage -- stopping a generation short. Census and other records complete the gaps.

In a reference to his American ancestry, Obama writes "while one of my great-great-grandfathers, Christopher Columbus Clark, had been a decorated Union soldier, his wife's mother was rumored to have been a second cousin of Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederacy."

Clark was actually Obama's great-great-great-grandfather, according to Reitwiesner's research and Census data available at ancestry.com. A 1930 Census document lists Clark, 84, living in the same El Dorado City, Kansas household as a 12-year-old great-grandson, Stanley A. Dunham. Dunham was Obama's grandfather.

Clark's wife, Susan, was the daughter of George Washington Overall, the latest known family slave owner.

Reitwiesner, the researcher, declined to be interviewed for this article. "I'll let my Web page [wargs.com] speak for itself," he said in an e-mail message. The Obama report contains a disclaimer that appears on all of Reitwiesner's work: "The following material … should not be considered either exhaustive or authoritative, but rather as a first draft."

Genealogical experts who reviewed the Obama family tree at the request of The Sun would not vouch for its findings.

Most of the historical entries lack citations of authenticating source material, such as birth and death certificates or marriage licenses, said Barbara Vines Little, past president of the National Genealogical Society in Virginia, adding that "he has nothing here that I can see that would allow you to make any logical link."

"You just can't casually throw some documents together and make a sophisticated analysis," said Tony Burroughs, author of Black Roots: A Beginners Guide to Tracing the African American Family Tree and a consultant on a project by the New York Daily News that found that relatives of former Sen. Strom Thurmond appear to have owned the ancestors of civil rights activist Rev. Al Sharpton.

But Roberts, the New England scholar, collaborated with Reitwiesner on a 1984 book about the American roots of Princess Diana, and calls him "exceptionally bright" and "quite a good researcher."

The online Obama family tree, Roberts said, is the work of "an informal team of genealogists" who specialize in Internet-based research and post their findings to test their validity.

"When you are gathering up things from the Internet, you can get fantastical -- by that I mean wild and unbelievable -- connections," Roberts said. "Many of them will fall; only a few of them will hold up. But some absolutely extraordinary things do hold up."

Assisting in the Obama research was Christopher Challender Child, a genealogist at the New England Historic Genealogical Society, who said that Reitwiesner culled fragments from a variety of sources. "There's a limit to what you can verify without a lot of money," Child said. "But from what I see, the line looks pretty good."

DOJ_NMG_0138882

For some, the records may underscore Obama's unique racial heritage as a presidential candidate.

Author and essayist Debra J. Dickerson wrote in a January salon.com article that she had previously refrained from opining about the senator because "I didn't have the heart (or the stomach) to point out the obvious: Obama isn't black."

" 'Black,' in our political and social reality, means those descended from West African slaves," Dickerson said.

Walters, who was deputy campaign manager for Jesse Jackson in 1984 and the author of Black Presidential Politics in America, agreed that questions raised by Dickerson and others "is an important debate."

"What people are really asking is, 'Can I trust this guy? Do I have confidence in this guy? Does he understand my situation, and therefore [is he] able to take my issues into the political system?'" Walters said.

Romney Assails Rivals On National Issues (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, March 2, 2007

Republican Mitt Romney assailed his two leading presidential rivals Wednesday, criticizing John McCain's stance on immigration and dismissing Rudy Giuliani's support for gun control, abortion and gay rights as a losing combination in the GOP primary.

Running a distant third in national polls, Romney used a campaign stop in New Hampshire to challenge McCain's support for stronger border security paired with an eventual path to citizenship for some of the 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States.

Also, in an interview with the Christian Broadcasting Network, the former Massachusetts governor criticized Giuliani for his moderate stands on abortion, gays and gun control — even though Romney expressed similar views in previous campaigns.

Romney began a series of appearances in New Hampshire, the first presidential primary state, by targeting McCain on immigration.

"I don't agree with it; I think it's the wrong course," Romney said at the outset of four appearances in the first presidential primary state. "I do not believe amnesty is the right course for the 11 or 12 million illegal immigrant who are living here. It didn't work in the 1980s; it's not going to work in the 2000s either."

McCain, who announced Wednesday night that he will formally become a candidate next month, had pushed legislation with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., that categorized illegal immigrants and established different criteria for them to remain in the United States legally.

Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, said he opposes amnesty, favors securing the U.S.-Mexico border with a fence, and wants to institute an employment verification system through high-tech identification cards.

"If we can do that, then we can solve our problem with immigration. The answer is not amnesty," Romney said to hearty applause from an audience of more than 150 gathered at New Hampshire Technical College.

McCain spokesman Matt David cited the discrepancy in Romney's statements on the issue, citing his comment last March in which the former governor said he doesn't believe in rounding up 11 million people and forcing them at gunpoint from the country.

"At a time when Senator McCain is working with the White House to solve one of our nation's biggest challenges, factually inaccurate rhetoric might score short-term political points but it does nothing to solve the larger issue," David said.

In December, Romney was embarrassed when it turned out he had used a lawn care company that hired illegal workers.

In the interview posted on the CBN Web site, Romney said of Giuliani: "He is pro-choice, he is pro-gay marriage and anti-gun. That's a tough combination in a Republican primary."

He also criticized in the interview McCain for opposing a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage. McCain has said marriage is between a man and a woman, but argues the issue should be left to the states.

In his criticisms, Romney drew renewed scrutiny to his own past positions.

In previous campaigns, Romney has said that regardless of his own personal beliefs, abortion should be safe and legal. He changed his position about two years ago and now describes himself as "pro-life." In 1994, he wrote a letter promising a gay

DOJ_NMG_0138883

Republican group he would be a stronger advocate for gays and their rights than his liberal opponent, Edward M. Kennedy, although Romney says he has always opposed gay marriage.

In the past, Romney emphasized his support of gun-control measures. In 1994, he said: "I don't line up with the NRA." In August, he became a card-carrying National Rifle Association member.

Responding to the criticism, Giuliani spokeswoman Katie Levinson said: "Mayor Giuliani has the utmost respect for Governor Romney. The mayor's position on gay marriage has been both clear and consistent — he does not support gay marriage and believes marriage should be between a man a woman."

During a New Hampshire news conference after his town hall meeting, Romney also sought to turn admitted flip-flops from a possible character flaw into a badge of honor. Romney, for example, likened his conversion on abortion to Ronald Reagan's change of heart on the issue.

"If you had somebody in the private sector who didn't change their mind when they knew they were wrong, you fired them because they were stubborn," said Romney, a former venture capitalist. "I'm happy to admit when I make mistakes and go on. And my experience is that to the voters, the response is overwhelmingly positive: 'We've got a guy who'll admit his mistakes, tell us what he's going to do and he'll honor that.' "

Giuliani Leads In Spartanburg County Straw Poll (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, March 2, 2007

SPARTANBURG, S.C. - In a sign of what die-hard Republicans may think of the field of presidential contenders, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani was leading 10 other candidates Thursday in a straw poll in conservative Spartanburg County.

With 81 of 92 precincts reporting, Giuliani garnered 158 votes. California Rep. Duncan Hunter was running in a close second with 152 votes and Arizona Sen. John McCain was third with 116 votes, according to county GOP officials.

Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback had 83 votes, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney had 80 votes and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee rounded out the front-runners with 21 votes.

The voting isn't binding and comes as the county party goes about the business of organizing precincts and ultimately sending people to its county convention and the state GOP convention in May.

People attending meetings starting at 7 p.m. could vote for one of 11 GOP candidates who have said they're running for the nomination or have set up exploratory committees.

Rick Beltram, the county's GOP chairman, said before the straw poll he expected fewer than 2,000 people to vote. After the voting, he blamed rainy weather for the low turnout and slow counting, which will resume Friday morning.

A spokesman for Giuliani said the numbers, while small overall, were encouraging.

"I think this is one small event of a very, very, long campaign, but it's a clear indication that the mayor's message of leadership and his proven track record is resonating," Elliot Bundy said.

Hunter's strong second-place showing proves his potential in a conservative area, his campaign said.

"What is such a relief to us is, we've always known we're the conservative alternative, and we kept hearing on the news that there's not a real conservative in the race," spokesman Roy Tyler said. "Well, there is now."

McCain's third place finish is not a reflection of his strength in South Carolina, campaign spokesman Adam Temple said.

"There's going to be many polls between now and election day," Temple said.

Romney's campaign said they were pleased with the former governor's finish.

"I think we outperformed where we've been, where all the public polls that had us at 5 and 6 percent," spokesman Terry Sullivan said.

Selective School Choice (WSJ)

By Clint Bolick

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

There's something about our nation's capital that converts many leading Democrats to school choice. Perhaps it's the glimpse that Washington, D.C. affords into inner-city public schools.

DOJ_NMG_0138884

But in most cases this appreciation of school choice extends only to their own children -- and not to the millions of children in failing public schools. Indeed, a nearly perfect correlation exists among Democratic presidential candidates who have exercised school choice for their own children and those who would deny such choices to the parents of other children.

When the Clintons came to Washington, D.C. in 1993, they could choose any public school for Chelsea. Being responsible parents of means, Bill and Hillary Clinton sent her instead to the elite private Sidwell Friends School. Two years later Mr. Clinton vetoed a bill that would have allowed low-income D.C. parents to use public funds to send their children to private schools. (A subsequent version of that program was signed into law by George W. Bush.)

And today presidential candidate Mrs. Clinton continues to stridently oppose school choice. In a speech to the National Education Association she vowed "never to abandon our public schools" -- speaking apparently as a politician, not a parent.

John Edwards, Mr. Populist, decries that "America has two school systems -- one for the affluent and one for everyone else." He should know. When he joined the U.S. Senate he sent his children to a religious school because, according to USA Today, the D.C. "public schools are deeply troubled." Mr. Edwards, however, opposes private school choice for low-income families on the curious grounds that this would "drain resources" from public schools. By such logic Mr. Edwards himself "drained" approximately $132,000 from the D.C. public schools.

Al Gore, who may yet join the presidential race, has said empathetically, "If I was a parent of a child who went to an inner-city school that was failing, I might be for vouchers, too." But he isn't, and so he is not. Mr. Gore sent all of his children to elite private schools in the nation's capital, like the one he attended growing up. But he militantly opposes school choice for low-income families.

There is only one Democratic aspirant who sent his children exclusively to public schools, and he was also the only one who signed a school choice bill into law in his own state: former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who withdrew from the race when his candidacy failed to gain traction. And there is only one candidate -- Sen. Joe Biden -- who has both sent his children to private school and supported school choice for others.

The mystery man is Sen. Barack Obama, who sends his child to a private school in Chicago yet once referred to school vouchers as "social Darwinism." Still, he says that on education reform, "I think a good place to start would be for both Democrats and Republicans to say . . . we are willing to experiment and invest in anything that works."

Well, school choice works. Every study that compares children who applied for school choice scholarships and received them with those who applied but did not shows improved academic performance. More important, every study that has examined the effect of school choice competition has found significantly improved performance by public schools.

Given their track records it is doubtful how many candidates will agree with Sen. Obama's professed openness to experiment. But as he might say, we can always have the audacity to hope.

Mr. Bolick is president and general counsel of the Alliance for School Choice and senior fellow at the Goldwater Institute.

Washington: Impeachment Resolution Urged (NYT)

By Martin Stolz

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Mayor Rocky Anderson of Salt Lake City appeared before a committee of the State Senate in Olympia in support of a resolution asking Congress to begin impeachment proceedings against President Bush. Mr. Anderson, a Democrat, said the case for impeachment was not partisan. He said the president should face impeachment for “heinous human rights violations, breaches of trust, abuses of power injurious to the nation, war crimes, misleading Congress and the American people,” among other reasons. Mr. Anderson also submitted a 22-page, heavily footnoted statement to legislators.

Latest Reports On Iran And North Korea Show A Newfound Caution Among Analysts (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — For more than three years, American intelligence officials have insisted that they learned from their mistakes in the months leading to the Iraq war, when murky information about Saddam Hussein’s weapons programs was presented as fact and inconclusive judgments were hardened into statements of near certainty.

The more calibrated intelligence assessments that have come to light in recent weeks, particularly on Iran and North Korea, appear to show a new willingness by American spy agencies to concede the limits of their knowledge.

The new caution reflects adherence to what some officials now call "the Powell Rule." That rule is intended to avoid a repetition of former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell's humiliation after the satellite photos and intercepted communications he presented to the United Nations Security Council as proof that Iraq was stockpiling banned weapons turned out to be nothing of the sort.

It was in large part because of the Iraq intelligence debacle that top intelligence officials over the past year have overhauled the way in which they pass judgments about some of the world's most difficult spying targets, including Iran and North Korea. The new operating approach is intended to ensure that intelligence is solid before it is publicly presented, and even then, that clear distinctions are made between facts and inferences.

Intelligence professionals have several motivations for the new approach. Those include protecting their own credibility and ensuring that assessments can stand up to careful scrutiny in the wake of multiple government investigations condemning the prewar intelligence assessments about Iraq. Officials also said that greater caution had become ever more necessary because of increasing inexperience in the work force; about 50 percent of current intelligence analysts have less than five years of experience.

At the same time, the use of specific, careful language is seen by intelligence professionals as a barrier that can help to prevent intelligence assessments from being exaggerated, twisted or otherwise misused by policy makers to advance specific agendas.

Under the new guidelines, the assessments produced by intelligence agencies must include detailed descriptions of the subjects on which analysts disagree, and analysts must now "show their work" by including in their judgments the chain of logic that led them to their conclusions.

Intelligence analysis has always been more art than science, and in recent statements, American intelligence officials have laid bare the limits of what they believe they know about Iran and North Korea. Officials have said they are certain that Iranian paramilitary groups are providing lethal bomb material to Iraqi Shiite groups, but they do not know whether this support has been approved at the highest levels of government in Tehran.

In testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee this week, Mike McConnell, the new director of national intelligence, said that it was possible Iran could produce a nuclear weapon by the beginning of the next decade, but that it was also possible Iran would not develop a weapon until 2015. At the same hearing, another top official acknowledged publicly that the American intelligence agencies were less certain today than they were five years ago about whether North Korea was pursuing a clandestine uranium enrichment program.

John D. Negroponte formalized the new analytical procedures in a directive issued in January, one of his last acts as director of national intelligence. The directive stated that "the analytic process must be as transparent as possible" and that "analysis must be objective and independent of political considerations."

The pre-emptive war doctrine that President Bush has articulated since the Sept. 11 attacks holds that the United States has an obligation take action against security threats before they fully materialize. A corollary embraced by the White House has held that policy makers must assume the worst about the intentions of adversaries, even with imperfect intelligence about their intentions and capabilities.

That worst-case approach was very much on display when Mr. Bush said with certainty in 2002 and 2003 that Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons. On North Korea, Mr. Bush said in November 2002 that "contrary to an agreement they had with the United States, they're enriching uranium, with the desire of developing a weapon."

As intelligence agencies have backed away from those views, some former officials worry that the Iraq experience may cause the pendulum to swing too far in the direction of circumspection. They say that they hope the administration does not accept at face value the denials from North Korea and Iran about their banned weapons programs.

"I worry about that, but I am not willing to accept that doomsday is upon us," said John R. Bolton, who stepped down in December as ambassador to the United Nations after it was clear he would not win Senate confirmation. Mr. Bolton said he still believed that policy makers would not allow intelligence analysts' new caution to soften the United States' policies toward its enemies too much.

DOJ_NMG_0138886

The intelligence community's renewed emphasis on debate and dissent has been reflected in decisions about which officials earned promotions in the aftermath of the Iraq intelligence failures.

Thomas Fingar, who once ran the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, is now in charge of all analysis for the director of national intelligence.

It was Mr. Fingar's State Department office in 2002 that produced one of the most significant dissents to that year's National Intelligence Estimate, now discredited, challenging the majority view that Iraq had bought aluminum tubes to build up its nuclear weapons program.

During an interview late last year, Mr. Fingar said it was now his job to ensure there was as much competitive analysis as possible before intelligence reports were completed, if only to avoid a repeat of the 2002 N.I.E. findings, which were pivotal to the Senate vote that authorized the Iraq war.

"The basic idea is to avoid a premature rush to an artificial consensus," Mr. Fingar said. "The interesting thing is not when analysts agree. It's when they disagree."

Analysis: U.S. Intel On Nukes In Doubt (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, March 2, 2007

New doubts are arising about the accuracy of U.S. intelligence on the nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran, only a few years after faulty warnings about weapons of mass destruction helped President Bush justify the invasion of Iraq.

North Korea agreed earlier this month to dismantle its plutonium-producing nuclear facilities in exchange for economic aid and security assurances from the United States and four other world or regional powers. The pact successfully put aside for now the possibility of military action.

But the Western standoff with Iran remains tense. The Bush administration says it won't rule out an attack if Tehran refuses to end its nuclear enrichment program.

However, in both cases, once-strident U.S. pronouncements about the programs — which raised the tension level with Pyongyang and Tehran along with Saddam Hussein's Iraq — are apparently being replaced by less alarming assessments.

Just weeks after the Feb. 13 six-nation pact with North Korea, new U.S. statements suggest that Washington might have overstated a purported secret North Korean second-track nuclear program. The result was that it derailed what could have been a peaceful resolution to the North Korean issue more than four years ago.

The U.S. alleged then that North Korea had a large-scale gas centrifuge plant for uranium enrichment — the same program Iran now is developing. The Bush administration used that information to scrap a plan developed under the Clinton administration to supply energy to the North in exchange for its pledge to mothball its plutonium program.

Tensions rose and Pyongyang withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in January 2003, sparking the process that led to its test of an atomic weapon late last year.

Now, however, Bush administration officials are toning down assertions that such a program had been developed. Intelligence official Joseph DeTrani, in testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Tuesday belief that such a program exists was now "at the mid-confidence level."

The "mid-confidence" terminology means that analysts have differing views or credible information exists but has not been fully corroborated. That's a notable departure from the previous U.S. view of "high confidence" that the North was working on such activities.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Wednesday that the U.S. knows that North Korea has bought equipment that could be used only for uranium enrichment. But he expressed uncertainty about the program's current state.

"How far they've gotten, whether they've actually been able to produce highly enriched uranium at this time — I mean these are issues that intelligence analysts grapple with," Hill told a hearing of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. "But what we know is they have made the purchases, and we need to have complete clarity on this program."

DOJ_NMG_0138887

A U.S. government official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the subject's sensitivity, said there was no change in the intelligence assessment. Degrees of certainty were always reflected in the CIA's judgment, the official said.

The U.S. intelligence community found with "high confidence" in 2002 that North Korea obtained components that could be used to enrich uranium. However, there has always been less confidence in the analysis of what precisely North Korea planned to do with the components, the official said.

It was a worst-case scenario when a CIA paper in 2002 stated that the plant "could produce enough weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year when fully operational — which could be as soon as mid-decade."

The next line of the paper highlighted the uncertainty, reminding readers that North Korea's nuclear program was "a difficult intelligence collection target."

Bush said on Nov. 7 of that year that Pyongyang was "enriching uranium, with the desire of developing a weapon."

Chief U.N nuclear inspector Mohamed ElBaradei has been invited to Pyongyang in mid-March for a visit expected to result in the return of his inspectors after a four-year hiatus.

The U.S. intelligence record on Iran's nuclear activities also is being questioned.

Several senior diplomats familiar with work of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, which ElBaradei heads, told The Associated Press that while U.S. intelligence helped reveal Iran's secret nuclear program in 2002, none of the information provided the U.N. nuclear watchdog by American spy agencies since then had led to meaningful leads. Still unproven is whether Tehran is using the cover of a nuclear power plant program to try to make atomic weapons.

One of the diplomats — who, like others demanded anonymity because he was discussing confidential information — said that in the case of Iran, lack of good intelligence was due to "no presence on the ground." Intelligence is increasingly scarce because "the Iranians have tightened up on their operations" since the 2002 revelations about their secret uranium enrichment program, he added.

Broad assessments often hinge on detailed information about equipment, which can be difficult to prove.

For North Korea, a key U.S. assertion that Pyongyang was trying to create an industrial-scale uranium enrichment program parallel to its plutonium operations was based on evidence that the North Koreans had purchased or were trying to buy thousands of highly machined aluminum tubes, he said. The CIA cited Iraqi purchases of such tubes to support its assertion about a purported nuclear weapons program under Saddam.

A CIA fact sheet made public four years ago claimed "clear evidence indicating that the North has begun constructing a centrifuge facility," and estimated it could produce material for at least two or more nuclear weapons a year by 2005.

Former U.N. nuclear inspector David Albright, who recently visited Pyongyang and held talks on the North's nuclear program, does not question U.S. assertions that the North bought a few dozen centrifuges from the same Pakistani black market network that supplied Iran's program.

"However, a large centrifuge plant likely does not exist; perhaps it never did," says Albright in a report of his Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security that tracks the North Korean and Iranian nuclear programs.

The diplomat agreed, noting it made no sense for the energy-starved North — which is to get the equivalent of up to 1 million tons of heavy fuel oil under the nuclear disarmament deal — to run such a program consuming record amounts of power at a time it was making good progress on its plutonium-based arms program.

Problems At The Parks? But How? (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The National Park Service has developed a PowerPoint presentation touting President Bush's new and widely supported Centennial Challenge to boost funding for the national parks leading up to the service's 2016 centennial celebration.

The presentation's cover photo neatly shows Bush backdropped by Washington, Jefferson, Teddy Roosevelt-- the champion of the park system -- and Lincoln at Mount Rushmore.

Back in August 2002, when the shot was taken, Bush, soaring in the polls, seemed a strong candidate to join the Great Ones. Chances seem to have diminished a bit of late.

DOJ_NMG_0138888

The cover photo has quotes overlaid from speeches by Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson and John F. Kennedy along with Bush's presidential message last year on the 90th anniversary of the Park Service.

The presentation notes that despite overwhelming public support and "the commitment of the Administration," there are certain challenges. "Operating budgets have not kept pace" with needs and the parks have been hurt by "shrinking staff and aging facilities."

Unclear who might bear responsibility for those occurrences. Maybe Congress and the administration? Maybe some natural phenomenon, like El NiÃ±o or something?Doug Feith, in His Own Words

The nation apparently continues to be roiled by the Feb. 8 report by Pentagon Inspector General Thomas Gimble accusing former undersecretary of defense for policy Doug Feith of "inappropriate" actions in challenging the intelligence community's assessments in the run-up to the war in Iraq, soon to be entering its fifth year.

Fortunately, Feith, after several solid TV appearances and a lengthy op-ed in this paper after the report came out, is staying on the offensive. On Wednesday, Feith Fans got an e-mail from him:

I have created a website that contains articles and information on this DOD IG report. The website is www.dougfeith.com. You may want to take a look. I plan to use it to continue posting informative items about the IG report. I will soon add material on other subjects. . . .

Stay tuned.

On the site, Feith says he "created this website to provide accurate information and sound commentary on the IG report controversy" -- a raging controversy perhaps only briefly overshadowed by Anna Nicole Smith and Britney Spears.

There is a section called "Media Myths vs. Facts." Nothing there but a note promising "More information coming soon."

Better still for his fans, Feith -- now a teacher at Georgetown University, a visiting scholar at Harvard's Kennedy School and a distinguished visiting fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford -- is working on a memoir of his five years at the Pentagon. It's to be published, perhaps late this year, by HarperCollins and promises to put into context Feith's contributions to the administration's efforts to launch the war.

Since former CIA director George Tenet's book, which is not likely to deal kindly with Feith, is due out this spring, be sure to frequently check the Web site, http://www.dougfeith.com.

If you've never heard of Feith, there's a handy tab: "About Doug Feith" with a brief bio and with his own "Remarks at My Farewell and Award Ceremony" at the Pentagon in August 2005.Moving On

Ken Mehlman, former Republican National Committee chairman and before that White House political director, is heading back to Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld.

Mehlman practiced law for three years at the firm before entering politics. He worked on the House side for two Texas representatives and later served as national field director for the Bush campaign in 2000 and campaign manager in '04.

Meanwhile, Thomas DiNanno, deputy assistant secretary for infrastructure protection at the Department of Homeland Security, is leaving after six years in the administration to join the International Assessment and Strategy Center in Alexandria consulting on infrastructure-protection issues.

That leaves only one member of the original Tom Ridge White House-DHS team still on board -- the assistant secretary for infrastructure, Bob Stephan. DiNanno was recently tasked with building the department's chemical security office, leaves a small but dedicated staff pushing hard to meet a congressionally mandated April 4 deadline to work up a regulation to secure about 20,000 U.S. chemical plants.Harmonic Convergences Dept.

The fox? The henhouse? The White House yesterday said it had tapped Michael E. Baroody, longtime top official and most recently executive vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers, to be chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission.

Baroody started his career in 1970 working for Sens. Roman Hruska (R-Neb.) and Bob Dole (R-Kan.) and then moved on to the Republican National Committee, the Reagan White House and the Department of Labor. He joined NAM in 1990 and served as senior vice president for policy and communications.

He was seen as the main internal candidate to succeed NAM President Jerry Jasinowski, who retired in 2004, but lost out to former Michigan governor John Engler. Insiders say Engler effectively sidelined Baroody.

DOJ_NMG_0138889

In a statement yesterday, Engler said that "this is an excellent nomination and is in everyone's interest."Thanks -- I Think

This week's Emily Litella award . . .

Reporters yesterday pressed White House spokeswoman Dana Perino on news reports that the administration is backing away from its absolute claims that North Korea has a uranium-enrichment program. This was based on intelligence the White House used to buttress its case that the regime was part of the "Axis of Evil."

"Have you checked into this North Korea story," a reporter asked, "what -- exactly what our intelligence says about the North Korean uranium-enrichment program?"

"I did try to check into it," Perino said. "I think what I need to do is refer you to the intelligence community." Ah, yes, a crowd long known for on-the-record briefings on its sources and process. "We've said for a long time," she said, that "North Korea is an opaque regime," so it's hard to be sure what they're doing.

"I'm sure the intelligence community continually tried to assess and reassess and look at the information that they have," she said. "What we do know is that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon. . . . So, from our standpoint, that's what we know is happening at the moment. In regards to intel and what they knew and when they knew it, I think I'd have to refer you back to them."

Never mind.

A Suddenly Convenient Truth (NYT)

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

We would like to believe that the Bush administration has finally figured out how dangerous and counterproductive it is to hype intelligence — and that that's why officials are admitting they're not sure North Korea ever got very far with a secret uranium-based nuclear program. But we doubt it.

It was just last month that intelligence officials, with their bosses' clear blessings, were insisting that Iran's leaders had personally ordered the smuggling of especially lethal roadside bombs into Iraq. At least they did until the Pentagon's top general admitted that no one knew who in Iran was really calling those shots, and President Bush announced that it didn't matter anyway.

So we suspect that this week's confessions of doubt about North Korea had less to do with a sudden burst of candor than the fact that Pyongyang has agreed to readmit nuclear inspectors — who probably won't be able to find the active uranium enrichment program the administration has been alleging for more than four years. Add to that the White House's eagerness for a diplomatic win in these bleak times — and its insistence that a nuclear deal cannot go ahead if the North is believed to be hiding things — and you understand why the White House might find this truth so convenient.

Late may be better than never, but it isn't nearly enough to make up for the damage caused. And we haven't even raised the issue of Iraq and its long-gone weapons.

Let's be clear. The North Koreans had and have an illicit nuclear arms program. They tested a device from their plutonium-based program last October. And Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, has admitted that North Korea bought some 20 centrifuges — useful only for enriching uranium — from Abdul Qadeer Khan's nuclear black market.

The problem is that the Bush administration eagerly spun those 20 centrifuges into an industrial-scale enrichment program, and then used it as an excuse to scuttle a Clinton-era deal to close down the North's plutonium-based weapons program. Four years later, the North set off that test.

And while we are pleased that the administration has finally managed to negotiate an agreement to start shutting down the North's nuclear complex, there is no guarantee that Pyongyang will ever give up its weapons.

If that's not bad enough, consider some frightening truths. There is no doubt that Iran is moving ever closer to mastering the skills it will need to produce the fuel for a nuclear weapon — and blithely defying the Security Council's demand that it stop. But even America's closest European allies have little stomach for a showdown with Tehran, while Russia and China have strong economic incentives to look the other way. Which means that Washington is the only one left out there to warn the world about the dangers of a nuclear-capable Iran.

Make no mistake: there are real and present dangers out there. But who still believes warnings from this White House?

Another Intelligence Twist (WP)

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138890

ONCE AGAIN the Bush administration is being accused of exaggerating intelligence to justify an aggressive policy toward a rogue regime, with disastrous results. In October 2002 the State Department announced that North Korea had acknowledged secretly developing a uranium enrichment program. The next month the CIA reported to Congress that it had "recently learned that the North is constructing a plant that could produce enough weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year when fully operational -- which could be as soon as mid-decade." On this basis the administration suspended a deal under which North Korea received fuel oil in exchange for freezing a separate program to produce plutonium. Pyongyang responded by restarting that program and producing enough plutonium for a number of nuclear weapons, one of which it tested last October.

Now administration officials are conceding that outside experts may be right when they say that the North probably never constructed a large uranium-enrichment plant. According to the New York Times, a new intelligence update concludes "with moderate confidence" that the uranium program continues, but it says it's not known how much progress has been made. Christopher R. Hill, the principal U.S. negotiator with North Korea, told Congress on Wednesday that it's debatable "whether they've actually been able to produce highly enriched uranium."

Clearly there's a basis for investigation about whether the 2002 CIA estimate was justified. But it's also worth underlining that the issue here is not whether North Korea sought a uranium enrichment capacity. The uncertainty is about how far the program advanced. That distinction makes a difference both in reconsidering the Bush administration's actions in 2002 and judging how the problem should be managed in the new disarmament negotiations with the North beginning next week.

What the administration knew in 2002 -- and what remains uncontested now -- is that North Korea secretly obtained 20 centrifuges for uranium enrichment from Pakistan and purchased other equipment needed to construct a large-scale enrichment facility. When U.S. officials confronted the North Koreans at a bilateral negotiation session, members of a U.S. diplomatic team received what they believed was a defiant confirmation. That tipped an internal administration debate toward hard-liners who all along had wanted to renounce the Clinton administration's "agreed framework" with Pyongyang.

No doubt those hard-liners made use of the CIA's conclusions about a factory under construction. Yet even without that intelligence some action would have been warranted. The United States and its allies were supplying Pyongyang with food and energy on the assumption that its nuclear program was frozen, only to discover that it had covertly begun work in another area. It would have been foolish to ignore such activity by a criminal regime.

Similarly, the weakening of the intelligence about an ongoing uranium program does not mean that the United States can drop the issue in the next phase of negotiations. On the contrary, a crucial test of the diplomatic process will be whether the North will reveal what it did with the centrifuges and other materials it is known to have acquired. Pyongyang's response will show whether it, like the Bush administration, is more inclined to conduct serious negotiations than it was four years ago.

Uranium Do-Over (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Things sure are looking up for Kim Jong Il. The North Korean dictator has already been promised 50,000 tons of fuel oil and eased sanctions in return for one more pledge to give up his nuclear weapons. And now, even before he has to declare all of his nuclear facilities, the Bush Administration appears to be backing down from its own intelligence judgments on North Korea.

That's the meaning of this week's disclosure at a Senate hearing by Administration spook Joseph DeTrani about Pyongyang's uranium enrichment program. Asked for an update by Rhode Island's Jack Reed, the new Director of National Intelligence Michael McConnell invited Mr. DeTrani to address the issue. Mr. DeTrani replied that while the U.S. had previously had "high confidence" about the uranium effort, now it was only "at the mid-confidence level."

Keep in mind that the uranium program is separate from the plutonium that Kim has already used to explode a nuclear device. Confronted with U.S. intelligence in 2002, North Korean officials admitted to the secret uranium effort in a face to face meeting with then Assistant Secretary of State Jim Kelly. Such an effort violated both the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and the Agreed Framework that Kim had signed with the Clinton Administration. The North Koreans have since denied saying that, or having any such program, but U.S. intelligence has claimed to have solid evidence that it did.

What's changed now? Mr. DeTrani didn't elaborate, but the timing of this intelligence walk-down is certainly strange. Under the six-party accord signed in Beijing on February 13, North Korea has 60 days to come clean about all of its nuclear programs and facilities. By telegraphing to Kim that the U.S. has new doubts about his uranium plans, the Bush Administration is all but inviting Kim to declare as little as possible. The flip-flop has all the earmarks of the intelligence community trying to cover its own keister if Kim does precisely that.

DOJ_NMG_0138891

This is all the more bizarre given the volumes of public evidence that North Korea's uranium-enrichment program is very real. Following North Korea's admission in 2002, numerous Bush officials made the rounds discussing what they knew. "The enriched uranium issue, some have assumed, is somewhere off in the fog of the distant future. It is not," Mr. Kelly told the Senate in March 2003. "It is only probably a matter of months, and not years, behind the plutonium."

Richard Armitage, then Deputy Secretary of State and hardly a neocon, said at the time that North Korea was acquiring "many more [centrifuges] than was orginally thought." And he added that North Korea had been "intent on going to a full-up production program" starting from "at least" February 2000.

Don't believe Bush officials? How about Pervez Musharraf? In his recent memoir, the Pakistan President discloses that he learned as early as 1999 that North Koreans were canoodling with Pakistani A.Q. Khan to buy uranium-enrichment technology. "I received a report suggesting that some North Korean nuclear experts, under the guise of missile engineers, had arrived" at Pakistan nuclear labs "and were being given secret briefings," Mr. Musharraf writes.

In his book about the A.Q. Khan network, "Shopping for Bombs," BBC reporter Gordon Corera reports that Mr. Musharraf has admitted that "probably a dozen" centrifuges were sent to North Korea from Pakistan, "both plans and complete devices," as well as "blueprints and designs."

And in May 2002, two Germans were convicted in Stuttgart for trying to ship 22 million tons of aluminum tubing to North Korea. The tubing had been ordered by Yun Ho-Jin, Pyongyang's man at (of all places) the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna. The measurements on the tubing were made to European standards for the kind of vacuum casings used for gas centrifuges to enrich uranium.

Meanwhile, the Washington Post reported in March 2005 that the U.S. found traces of North Korean UF6, or uranium hexafloride, when it dismantled Libya's nuclear program. The Post said Pyongyang had sold the UF6 to Pakistan, which had later sold it to Libya.

All of this is merely what's on the public record. We understand that intelligence is rarely definitive. But if this is what adds up to "mid-confidence level," what does the CIA need for "high"? And what in the world qualifies as a "slam dunk"? * * *

The bigger issue here is what this intelligence reversal suggests about Bush Administration policy. When the February 13 accord was announced, senior officials assured us that it included "all" North Korean nuclear programs, not just plutonium. But now that the U.S. is embarked on an "arms control process," the pressure to keep making unilateral concessions or overlook Kim's transgressions will be great.

Assume that, in its 60-day declaration, North Korea admits some past attempt to buy centrifuge technology but says it's all been destroyed and there's nothing to inspect. Would President Bush really walk away from the talks, amid the inevitable criticism from China, South Korea and the American media? We think we know where the State Department would come out. Chris Hill, State's negotiator with the North, has already hinted that its uranium program isn't that big a deal.

White House officials say President Bush has earned the benefit of the doubt on North Korea and that he'll insist on dismantling all of its nuclear facilities. We hope he's not relying on the U.S. intelligence community to tell him when that's happened.

Come Clean On North Korea (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

HERE WE GO AGAIN. Or do we? In 2002, the U.S. accused North Korea of having a secret program to enrich uranium for nuclear bombs. Alleging that the North had cheated on a deal agreed to eight years earlier, Washington cut off heavy fuel oil shipments. In response, Pyongyang accused the Bush administration of reneging on the deal, fired up its mothballed plutonium plant and, last fall, detonated an atomic bomb. Only now are U.S. officials admitting there was some question about the intelligence they relied on.

DOJ_NMG_0138892

At the time, the Bush administration seemed confident of its case against Pyongyang. It told Congress in 2002 that the CIA had "clear evidence indicating that the North had begun constructing a centrifuge facility" to spin uranium for nuclear weapons and that the plant could be operational "as soon as mid-decade." In 2003, it told allies the plant was 18 months away from producing the fissile material needed for a bomb.

On Wednesday, however, the chief U.S. negotiator to North Korea, Christopher R. Hill, back-pedaled hard while testifying on Capitol Hill. If the U.S. determines that there is a uranium program, he said, "it's got to go," adding: "How far they've gotten, whether they've been able to actually produce highly enriched uranium at this time … we need to have complete clarity on this program."

Indeed we do. Did the Bush administration rush to provoke a crisis with North Korea on sketchy evidence, trashing a flawed but workable arms-control agreement? Administration hawks had been on record for years opposing the 1994 deal. Did they "spin" the intelligence to justify preordained policies? Beijing has always disputed Washington's allegations. On the other hand, it's indisputable that North Korea bought centrifuges from Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan.

Cynics may even wonder whether the administration, having opted for a deal with North Korea, may be downplaying for political purposes the significance of the very intelligence it once cited as proof of Pyongyang's malevolence. Some might even ask why it matters what the administration knew then — and with what degree of certainty — given that North Korea has already tested a plutonium bomb. It's because the U.S. has declared itself the world's nuclear watchdog, refusing to be bound by the decisions of the International Atomic Energy Agency or the U.N. Security Council.

Yet for the second time, serious questions have been raised about the credibility of U.S. assessments of the potential nuclear threat posed by an enemy nation. Are these charges justified? Given the U.S. need to enlist other nations to adopt sanctions to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions and deal with other proliferation challenges, that's a question that demands an answer.

N. Korea Reasserts Pledge To Denuclearize (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

SEOUL, March 1 -- North Korea's No. 2 leader reiterated Thursday his country's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons, as the impoverished nation sought a resumption of aid in its first high-level talks with South Korea since conducting an atomic test.

Kim Yong Nam said that "the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula is the dying wish" of the country's founding president, Kim Il Sung, who died in 1994. North Korea "will make efforts to realize it," he told South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jae Joung in Pyongyang, the North's capital.

Lee pressed for North Korea to follow through on its breakthrough Feb. 13 agreement with the United States and four other countries to shut down its sole operating nuclear reactor in 60 days, and to eventually dismantle all its atomic programs.

Kim Yong Nam also called for the two Koreas to work together to reunify the peninsula, which remains officially at war because the 1950-53 Korean War ended in a cease-fire, not a peace treaty.

South Korea has been one of the North's main aid sources since leaders of the two nations held their first and only summit in 2000. This week marks the 20th cabinet-level talks since then.

The North wants to resume separate discussions this month on economic cooperation that would address aid, but South Korea prefers to wait until after April 14 -- the deadline for the North to switch off its nuclear reactor, South Korean journalists said.

N. Korea Again Pledges To End Nuke Program (WT/AP)

By Burt Herman, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

SEOUL -- North Korea's No. 2 leader reiterated yesterday his country's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons, as the impoverished nation sought a resumption of aid at its first high-level talks with South Korea since conducting an atomic test.

Kim Yong-nam said "the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula is the dying wish" of the country's founding president, Kim Il-sung, the father of current leader Kim Jong-il.

DOJ_NMG_0138893

North Korea "will make efforts to realize it," he told South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jae-joung in Pyongyang, the North's capital.

Mr. Lee pressed for North Korea to follow through on its breakthrough Feb. 13 agreement with the United States and four other countries to shut down its sole operating nuclear reactor in 60 days, and to eventually dismantle all its atomic programs.

"It is important to make efforts to ensure that South and North Korea cooperate and six countries each assume their responsibilities," Mr. Lee said.

Kim Yong-nam also called for the two Koreas to work together to reunify the peninsula, which was divided after World War II and remains officially at war since the 1950-53 Korean War ended in a cease-fire, not a peace treaty.

South Korea has been one of the North's main aid sources since the two nations held their first and only summit in 2000. This week's meetings are the 20th Cabinet-level talks since then.

But South Korea halted rice and fertilizer shipments to the North after it test-fired a barrage of missiles in July, and relations worsened following North Korea's Oct. 9 underground nuclear test.

The provocations were the most serious challenge yet to South Korea's "sunshine" policy of engagement with its longtime foe, which has been criticized by conservatives for helping prop up the North's totalitarian regime without requiring reforms or disarmament.

South Korea has been hesitant at this week's talks, which run through today, to immediately restart aid without seeing the North take real steps to dismantle its nuclear program.

The North wants to resume separate discussions this month on economic cooperation that would address aid, but South Korea prefers to wait until after April 14 -- the deadline for Pyongyang to switch off its nuclear reactor, pool reports from South Korean journalists at the talks said.

However, the South may offer a limited amount of fertilizer if the North agrees to other conditions, such as resuming reunions of families split between the Koreas, the pool reports said. The sides may also agree on conducting trial runs of trains on restored rails across the border.

Earlier over dinner, the North's main negotiator at the talks, Senior Cabinet Councilor Kwon Ho-ung, said "a wide road will be opened for the drastic development of North-South relations" if certain measures are implemented. He did not specify them.

Last month's six-nation nuclear agreement has raised hopes it will foster a relaxation of regional tensions, since the deal also provides for North Korea to hold talks to normalize ties with Japan and the United States, both of which are scheduled to begin next week.

The nuclear pact also calls for negotiations to finally establish a peace agreement between the Koreas.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun urged in a speech yesterday in Seoul that the agreement "be successfully implemented so that a peace regime can be firmly established on the Korean Peninsula."

U.S., North Korea Soften Their Stances (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Two weeks after signing a deal aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear-weapons program, the Communist nation and the U.S. are showing signs of softening toward one another.

Negotiators from both sides plan to meet Monday to discuss steps toward normalizing relations 54 years after the end of the Korean War. The meetings, the first of their kind in more than six years, come as President Bush's administration eases assessments of how advanced North Korea's nuclear program may be. The U.S. is close to resolving a high-profile crackdown, launched in September 2005, on a Macau bank used by the North Korean government.

Under the Feb. 13 agreement, North Korea promised within 60 days to shut down its Pyongyang nuclear plant, allow international inspectors back in and provide a list of its nuclear-weapons activities. In return, it will receive energy and economic assistance from the U.S. and other countries with which it negotiated, including China, Russia and South Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0138894

A similar arrangement fell apart in late 2002 when the Bush administration accused Pyongyang of pursuing a secret uranium-enrichment program. The North Koreans ejected international inspectors and pushed ahead with their missile and nuclear-weapons programs, testing a nuclear device in October.

Yet U.S. officials are saying while they know North Korea purchased equipment and specialty products typically used in a uranium program, they have no strong evidence the country processed highly enriched uranium. Chinese diplomats have told the U.S. repeatedly that Beijing believes North Korea had no uranium program, U.S. officials said.

North Korea boasted of having nuclear weapons last year but has denied having a uranium-enrichment program. The U.S. assertion that North Korea was working on a secret uranium-enrichment program set off the 2002 crisis.

In congressional testimony this week, diplomatic and intelligence officials expressed doubt about how much progress North Korea has made in researching or developing uranium-based weapons. The U.S. national intelligence director's mission manager for North Korea, Joseph DeTrani, categorized the U.S. belief that North Korea was seeking a uranium-production program "at the mid-confidence level," meaning it lacked corroboration. Previously, it had been categorized at "high confidence."

U.S. officials have said there is no clear-cut evidence North Korea has any nuclear-weapons arsenal. The U.S. suspects North Korea has amassed at least 50 kilograms of plutonium and has made great strides in missile development. "But weaponization is very hard to get at," said one senior U.S. official. Even the October test remains murky, the official said, with U.S. intelligence analysts able to say only that it was "a high-explosives test" that emitted some detectable radiation.

"What we really need to do is track down where is the fissile material," the official said, referring to the stored plutonium North Korea is known to have.

North Korea has gone out of its way to appear cooperative since last month's agreement. It has sent an envoy to New York and Hanoi and has even taken down propaganda signs put up after the October test, said South Korean reporters visiting Pyongyang this week. It has invited the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, to visit Pyongyang; he is expected to go in mid-March.

Macao Signals Release Of Funds (FT)

By Tom Mitchell

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Deposits frozen during an investigation into a Macao bank the US suspects of acting as an illicit conduit for North Korean funds could be released by the end of this month, according to an executive for a company whose accounts have been affected.

Colin McAskill, who heads Hong Kong-based Koryo Asia, said the head of a Macao government-appointed committee now in charge of Banco Delta Asia told him recently that some of the $24m in deposits frozen during the investigation could be released soon. The Macao official, Hurculano de Sousa, did not return calls seeking comment on Thursday.

Koryo Asia controls Pyongyang's Daedong Credit Bank, which has $7m in affected deposits at the Macao bank. Approximately $2.6m of this belongs to British American Tobacco, which makes cigarettes in North Korea.

Mr de Sousa heads a three-man committee appointed by the Macao government to manage Banco Delta Asia after US accusations that it was helping the North Korean regime launder money led to a run on the bank in September 2005.

Mr McAskill said the Macao and US governments were sending mixed messages.

Daniel Glaser, a US Treasury department official, visited Macao earlier this week to discuss the two governments' separate investigations into the bank. While Mr Glaser and other US officials reiterated their intention to resolve the crack-down on North Korea's overseas financial activities, they have not yet indicated they will ease the pressure on Banco Delta Asia.

During his visit Mr Glaser said the Treasury department's investigation included the review of more than 300,000 documents.

"There is a direct conflict between what Glaser is saying and what the Macao government told me," Mr McAskill said on Thursday.

US officials declined to comment.

It is not clear whether the Macao government might release some of the affected funds but hold back others.

"Let's be frank. I'm not interested in the other money, I'm interested in our money," Mr McAskill said.

DOJ_NMG_0138895

North Korea's number two leader reiterated on Thursday his country's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons, as the impoverished nation sought a resumption of aid at its first high-level talks with South Korea since conducting an atomic test, AP reports from Seoul.

Kim Yong-nam said denuclearisation was “the dying wish” of the country's founding president, Kim Il-sung, the father of current leader Kim Jong-il.

U.S. Claims On North Korea Come Under Scrutiny (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay And Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration, which used some false and exaggerated intelligence to make its case for invading Iraq, also may have inflated some of its allegations against North Korea to justify a hard-line policy toward the Stalinist regime.

President Bush claimed in 2002 that North Korea was making highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons when there was no intelligence that it was doing so.

Now there are new questions about the administration's assertions that a bank in Macau knowingly laundered proceedings from North Korean narcotics trafficking, cigarette smuggling and counterfeit American currency.

An audit of the Banco Delta Asia's finances by accounting firm Ernst & Young found no evidence that the bank had facilitated North Korean money-laundering, either by circulating counterfeit U.S. bank notes or by knowingly sheltering illicit earnings of the North Korean government.

In a filing submitted to the Treasury Department last October, Heller Ehrman LLP, the bank's New York law firm, reported that an audit by the government of Macau also had found no evidence of money-laundering.

The Treasury Department refused to discuss the findings of either audit, as did the government of Macau and Ernst & Young.

Taken together, the pronouncements raised questions about whether the administration has been overstating its case against North Korea, a heavily armed communist dictatorship that Bush included in his "axis of evil" with Iran and Iraq under the late dictator Saddam Hussein.

The White House didn't respond immediately to a request for comment.

The Bush administration used its charges against Pyongyang to justify a hard-line policy that led the regime of Kim Jong Il to end an eight-year freeze on plutonium production. It then harvested enough plutonium for as many as a dozen nuclear weapons and conducted its first nuclear test explosion in October.

Meanwhile, talks with North Korea on ending its nuclear program collapsed over the U.S. charge that Pyongyang was laundering counterfeit money and proceeds from other illicit activities through the Macau bank. North Korea walked out of the talks and refused to return until the United States agreed to discuss lifting its restrictions on the Macau bank.

The administration has since softened its stand. Under a deal reached last month, North Korea agreed to give up the nuclear program, and the United States agreed to provide aid to the destitute country and open talks on normalizing relations.

North Korea hasn't publicly acknowledged the Bush administration's charges that it was secretly pursuing uranium enrichment in parallel with its known plutonium production program.

But Bush appears to have gone well beyond what U.S. intelligence could support in describing the advanced state of the North Korean program. At a Nov. 7, 2002, news conference, Bush said that North Korea was enriching uranium in violation of two treaties and a 1994 deal with the United States.

"We discovered that, contrary to an agreement they had with the United States, they're enriching uranium with the desire of developing a nuclear weapon," Bush asserted.

But that same month, an unclassified CIA report to Congress said that North Korea had begun building a plant that could be used for uranium enrichment, but that it wouldn't become operational until at least 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0138896

The administration cited the uranium enrichment effort in its decision to halt heavy-fuel oil shipments to energy-starved North Korea under a deal reached in 1994 with the former Clinton administration. The cutoff prompted the North to end the freeze on plutonium production and expel U.N. nuclear inspectors.

Former and current senior U.S. intelligence officials and diplomats involved in Korea policy disclosed that the United States knew with "high confidence" that North Korea was purchasing materials around the world for a uranium enrichment program.

North Korea bought two dozen or so machines - known as centrifuges - that spin uranium hexafluoride gas at supersonic speeds into highly enriched uranium from the same Pakistani scientist who sold nuclear technology to Iran and Libya.

Pyongyang also managed to acquire thousands of aluminum tubes milled precisely to the dimensions of the Pakistani-supplied devices, said James Kelley, the former assistant secretary of state who oversaw talks with North Korea.

But he and other current and former officials said that the United States had no information - and still doesn't - that North Korea has acquired the knowledge or overcame the technical hurdles required to build an industrial-scale enrichment plant with tens of thousands of centrifuges.

"There never was a judgment that they had a uranium enrichment-producing program," former Ambassador Charles Pritchard, who resigned in 2003 as Bush's special envoy to the negotiations, said in an interview.

Pritchard suggested that Bush might simply have misspoken in declaring that North Korea was enriching uranium.

U.S. officials admit that they don't know the current status of the effort.

"It's a complex program. It would require a lot more equipment than we know that they have actually purchased," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the current chief U.S. negotiator, said in a Feb. 22 talk at a Washington think tank. "It requires some production techniques, considerable production techniques, that we are not sure whether they have mastered."

The controversy surrounding the Banco Delta Asia and the North Korean leadership's accounts there may come to a head soon, as the Treasury Department has said it'll conclude its investigation shortly.

The Treasury Department said that its initial allegations against the Banco Delta Asia stand up. But according to the filing by the bank's attorneys, which the Treasury Department hasn't challenged, there was almost no way that North Korea could have laundered counterfeit U.S. currency through the bank.

Large deposits of North Korean cash were sent to the New York branch of the giant HSBC bank to be run through sophisticated counterfeit-detecting machines, the law firm's filing said. The only evidence of counterfeit currency that Banco Delta Asia found was much earlier, in 1994, and the bank notified local authorities immediately, the filing said.

Progress Made On Possible Iran Sanctions (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, March 2, 2007

The world's major powers made progress Thursday on possible new sanctions against Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment but some differences remain, U.N. diplomats said.

Foreign ministry political directors from the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany held a two hour conference call to discuss what to include in a new U.N. Security Council resolution, the diplomats said.

"They had a good productive discussion during which they made progress in agreeing on the elements of a resolution," the U.S. State Department said in a statement. "A few more issues remain for discussion, and the political directors agreed to convene another conference call on Saturday morning."

The State Department said it expects that ambassadors from the six countries "could begin drafting the text of a resolution next week."

Iran's refusal to freeze all its enrichment-related activities prompted the U.N. Security Council on Dec. 23 to impose sanctions targeting its nuclear and missile programs and persons involved in them. The council gave the country 60 days to halt enrichment or face additional measures.

The International Atomic Energy Agency's report last week that Iran was expanding enrichment instead of suspending it set the stage for new U.N. sanctions to try to pressure Tehran to agree to a freeze ahead of negotiations on its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0138897

Iran insists its nuclear program is aimed solely at producing nuclear energy — not nuclear weapons — and it has adamantly refused to halt it.

The six countries, who have been the key players in trying to negotiate with Iran, all believe the initial sanctions have had a positive effect on Tehran, the U.N. diplomats said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the negotiations are private.

Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry said recently the new resolution would be looking at an "incremental" strengthening of sanctions.

Other U.N. diplomats have also used the word "incremental" — an indication that the U.S., Britain and France who might want tough new sanctions will settle for less to ensure that Russia and China, who have close ties to Iran, are on board.

That would ensure that the new resolution can be adopted unanimously — which all six countries appear to want so they can remain united in their stance on Iran.

Some diplomats said the new measure may include travel bans, expand the list of technology and materials countries are banned from making available to Iran, and create stiffer economic sanctions including a ban on export guarantees to Iran, among other options.

China Urges Iran To Return To Nuke Talks (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

China urged Iran on Thursday to halt uranium enrichment and step up efforts to reach a peaceful, negotiated solution to the international dispute over its nuclear program amid a visit by Iran's deputy foreign minister.

"We hope that Iran can give a positive response to the appeal of the international community and faithfully abide by resolution 1737," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang at a regular news briefing.

Iran has ignored a U.N. deadline set in the Dec. 23 resolution to halt the enrichment of uranium, which the U.S. says is part of a secret effort to build nuclear weapons. Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel but highly enriched uranium can be used in an atomic bomb.

In talks with Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister Abbas Araghchi in Beijing Thursday, China's Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing reiterated that China hopes the dispute can be resolved through diplomatic negotiations as soon as possible, a ministry statement said.

Qin said the international community should "keep calm and make efforts, including efforts outside the framework of the U.N. Security Council to push forward the resumption of negotiations."

China has repeatedly spoken out against the use of sanctions and other types of force against Iran but also has been part of discussions focused on finding ways to pressure Iran to suspend enrichment.

Senior diplomats from the five permanent Security Council members and Germany met Monday in London to discuss the issue. Officials in London and Washington said new measures would likely include incremental restrictions on trade and arms.

However, sharp differences appear to remain between the tough U.S. position and what Russia and China — veto-holding council members with close ties to Iran — are willing to accept.

Iran And Saudis Plan Summit Talks On Crises (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah And Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, March 1 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran will visit Saudi Arabia on Saturday for a summit meeting with King Abdullah intended to tackle the Middle East's growing sectarian and political crises, Iranian officials said Thursday.

The visit, Mr. Ahmadinejad's first state visit to Saudi Arabia, was initiated by Iran, said a former Saudi official with knowledge of the discussions.

It marks the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts by the two regional powers, as well as other Arab countries, to settle the political standoff in Lebanon, cool sectarian violence in Iraq and possibly even avert a looming confrontation with the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0138898

To some the trip is seen as a defensive move by an increasingly isolated Iran while to others it marks the start of another public relations offensive for the bellicose president.

"When the views of the two countries get closer, they can play an influential role in the chaotic situation of the Islamic world and the Middle East," Mohammad Hosseini, Iran's ambassador to Saudi Arabia, told the official Iranian news agency, IRNA. "Unrest is increasing in the Middle East and if the situation continues, it will become a threat for all the countries in the region."

A Saudi official confirmed Mr. Ahmadinejad's visit, which will include a meeting with King Abdullah on Sunday, but the official Saudi news agency, SPA, made no mention of the trip, adding weight to the theory that the visit was an Iranian initiative.

Rumors of a likely meeting between the leaders had been circulating in Saudi Arabia for the past week, several analysts said, but the exact date appears to have been set within the last few days, just before the United Nations is expected to begin deliberating tougher sanctions on Iran for its continued uranium enrichment efforts in violation of United Nations resolutions.

The announcement also comes just two days after the United States agreed in principle to hold a high-level meeting with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, to help stabilize Iraq, setting the stage for the highest-level contact between American and Iranian officials in more than two years.

The American decision to participate in that Iraqi regional meeting in Baghdad on March 10 was unconnected to the Saudi-Iranian summit talks, American officials said. They claimed to be untroubled by the summit plans despite their strong mistrust of Mr. Ahmadinejad.

King Abdullah and Mr. Ahmadinejad are expected to discuss ways of ending the political standoff in Lebanon between the American-backed government of Fouad Siniora and Hezbollah, which is supported by Iran. Both countries are also concerned that growing sectarian tensions in Iraq, Lebanon and elsewhere in the region could fuel further instability.

"The last visit by an Iranian official to Riyadh was by national security chief Ali Larijani last month, but the Iranians were left feeling quite unsatisfied," said Adel al-Toraifi, a Riyadh-based Saudi analyst with close ties to the government.

Experts said talks had broken down when the Iranians balked at a deal that would increase Hezbollah's representation in the government, but would also start an international tribunal to try suspects connected to the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafik Hariri, in 2005, a Saudi priority.

Hezbollah took to the streets of Beirut in December demanding a greater role in the government, and threatening to continue its protest until Mr. Siniora resigns or gives its allies more seats in the cabinet.

"The Iranians want to come to an understanding with the Saudis," said Khaled Dakhil, professor of political sociology at King Saud University in Riyadh. "The Iranians want the help of the Saudis on the nuclear front, and they do want to improve relations between Syria and Saudi Arabia."

Other likely agenda items are finding a peaceful conclusion to the standoff with the international community. Iran has sought to emphasize to its Persian Gulf neighbors that if the United States attacks it, they too will be affected, analysts say.

The six Persian Gulf states that make up the Gulf Cooperation Council have insisted to Iran that they will not veer from United Nations Security Council resolutions, and that they are preparing to defend themselves.

"They want to deliver two messages — 'It is bad for the area; if we are attacked you will be affected,' " Abdelaziz Sager, chairman of the pro-Saudi Gulf Research Center in Dubai, said of the Iranians. "The other message is, 'If you have an easy way to solve the crises, tell us what it is.' They know that the best thing that can happen to Iran at this stage is for the Americans to attack them."

With Iran poised to gain from possibly two civil wars in the Middle East — one in Iraq and a potential one in Lebanon — Saudi Arabia in recent months has abandoned its behind-the-scenes checkbook diplomacy to take a central, more aggressive role in tempering the region's conflicts.

The kingdom has increased its public involvement in Iraq and its support of the Sunni-led government in Lebanon, and last month played host to Hamas and Fatah at a meeting in Mecca to settle the differences between the feuding Palestinian factions and form a national unity government.

The talks on Saturday may be a sign that Saudi Arabia's shuttle diplomacy has begun to have an effect.

DOJ_NMG_0138899

"It is a matter of pure interests and the Iranians understand that very well and have their own interests to protect," said Osama Safa, head of the Lebanese Center for Policies, a research center. "The Saudis have several cards to play at this point, and they will be played when Ahmadinejad comes to Saudi Arabia."

In Tehran, many were skeptical about the political significance of Mr. Ahmadinejad's trip. Saudi officials had good relations with former Iranian presidents, like Mohammad Khatami and Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, but Mr. Ahmadinejad became a political threat after his fiery rhetoric against Israel and in support of the Palestinians began resonating on Arab streets.

"Riyadh knows that if it wants to have serious discussions with Iran, it has to do it directly with Mr. Khamenei or through Mr. Larijani or Velayati," said Abbass Abdi, a political analyst in Tehran, speaking of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and Ali Akbar Velayati, a former foreign minister and more moderate politician who is close to Mr. Khamenei. "This trip is more like a show for Mr. Ahmadinejad to say that Iran is not an isolated country."

Iran's President To Visit Saudi Arabia (AP)

By Donna Abu Nasr

AP, March 2, 2007

Iran's president heads to Saudi Arabia on Saturday for discussions with King Abdullah, an indication that weeks of talks between their envoys on simmering conflicts in Iraq and Lebanon have made some headway.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's visit to Riyadh comes as the U.S. is pushing for harsher U.N. sanctions against Iran over its nuclear program, and it may reflect that he is looking for a way out of a tight corner.

Ahmadinejad is expected to travel to Saudi Arabia on Saturday for a one-day visit, a Saudi Foreign Ministry official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media.

Iran's ambassador to Riyadh, Mohammad Hosseini, confirmed that Ahmadinejad's trip was "imminent," but declined to elaborate, Iran's official IRNA news agency said.

The visit will culminate weeks of diplomatic activities spearheaded by Saudi Arabia, including talks between Iranian and Saudi diplomats, a meeting between Abdullah and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and the accord reached in the Saudi city of Mecca to form a unity Palestinian government.

It also precedes a conference on Iraq in Baghdad on March 10, which will include its neighbors, Iran and Syria, as well as the U.S. and Britain. At the end of the month, an Arab summit is planned in the Saudi capital.

Washington is pushing for tougher U.N. sanctions on Tehran over its failure to comply with demands to halt its uranium enrichment program that the West fears could be used to build a nuclear weapon. Although the U.S. has said it has no plans to strike Iran militarily, it has also refused to rule out any option.

There are other crises both countries are worried about. Violence in Iraq is escalating, Shiite-Sunni tensions are simmering across the Mideast and Lebanon remains tense as the opposition tries to bring down the Western-backed government.

Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia is worried Shiite-Sunni fighting in Iraq — with which the kingdom shares a long border — and sectarian tensions in Lebanon could veer out of control and send shockwaves throughout the Middle East.

"The region is facing several potentially explosive crises points and these are all issues of common concern for Riyadh and Iran," said Saudi analyst, Khaled al-Dakhil.

"Saudi Arabia has become the focus of the diplomatic activity in the region, and therefore, Iran should try to keep an open channel with Saudi Arabia and try to use it at the regional and international level," he added.

But keeping diplomatic channels open has not been Ahmadinejad's strength. Speaking Thursday in Sudan, Ahmadinejad blamed the U.S. and Israel for the world's problems.

"There is no place in the world that suffers from divisions and wars unless America or the Zionists' fingerprints are seen there," the Iranian president said. "Our strength and the cornerstone of the victory is in our (Muslims') unity ... we have to pay attention to the devils who want to cause divisions among us."

DOJ_NMG_0138900

Another Saudi official said Ahmadinejad's trip may be the result of a possible realization that he needs to maintain good relations in the region to ensure stability. It may even help ward off sectarian tensions that could ultimately work against the groups which Iran supports.

Sunnis increasingly fear Shiite-majority Iran's growing influence in the region. Iran is a strong backer of Hezbollah, which is striving to bring down the U.S.- and Saudi-backed government in Lebanon. Tehran also has close ties to Shiite political parties in Iraq, and Washington accuses it of backing Shiite militias there.

"The fact that the (Saudi) king would meet with him will raise Ahmadinejad's status domestically and internationally as a ... responsible statesman," said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. "Knowing the style of Saudi diplomacy, they won't give him this carrot without having received certain assurances that he will pursue a reasonable path."

Saudi officials have not divulged any details about their negotiations with the Iranians. But some Lebanese politicians have said Iran and Saudi Arabia are still trying to find a solution to the Lebanese crisis.

Former Lebanese Prime Minister Salim Hoss said Wednesday after returning from Tehran that Iran was ready to cooperate with Saudi Arabia, and probably Syria, to help forge a national dialogue in Lebanon.

Legislator Saad Hariri, head of Lebanon's anti-Syrian parliamentary majority, said he hoped the Saudi-Iran summit would work toward this.

"I think political dialogue is important, and I think that the kingdom of Saudi Arabia plays a pivotal role in the region," Hariri said.

Democrats Move To Require Approval Before Any Strike On Iran (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Fearing that President Bush may be preparing to launch a military strike against Iran, Senate Democrats are drafting legislation that would require the White House to seek congressional approval before any such action.

Freshman Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., a former Republican Navy secretary and decorated Vietnam veteran who opposes the Iraq war, is leading the effort. Webb said Thursday that he's still working on the details, but he intends to introduce his measure next week as an amendment to the $93.4 billion war spending bill.

Democrats aren't satisfied with assurances from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace that there are no plans to attack Iran.

Despite their assurances, Bush has deployed two aircraft carrier battle groups off of Iran's coast. He also frequently denounces Iran's alleged supply of weapons to Shiite fighters in Iraq, and he has issued orders to U.S. troops there to hunt those Iranians who are making mischief.

In addition, there are persistent reports quoting people close to the administration saying that an attack on Iran is under consideration, both to inhibit Iran's nuclear program and to try to undermine its leaders.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he supports Webb's concept.

"There are many out there much smarter than I am who believe the administration is ramping up to have the same thing happen in Iran that's happened in Iraq," Reid said.

At the same time, the administration announced this week that it will attend a regional conference on Iraq that will include representatives from Iran and Syria, reversing its previous refusal to talk to either regime.

Many Democrats are skeptical that the Bush administration is committed to solving its problems with Iran diplomatically. They see similarities to the buildup to the Iraq war and want to leave no doubt that the 2002 authorization to use force in Iraq doesn't extend to Iran.

Webb said that under his proposal, the U.S. military "would still be able to repel an immediate attack if it began on Iranian soil or (undertake) hot pursuit if there were Iranian activity where they were to cross the border. I want to be very reasonable about this."

DOJ_NMG_0138901

"What we would be going after would be any notion of beginning unilateral military action inside Iran without provocation and without the consent of the Congress. I'm not saying, `Don't do it,'" Webb said. "I'm saying if they want to begin that sort of new military activity, they should come to the Congress and discuss it."

Republicans are expected to fight Webb's effort. Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., who last month helped his party block debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing a troop buildup in Iraq, said an Iran amendment is a political stunt.

"It sounds to me like somebody's trying to make an issue for the sake of getting some press," he said.

Webb also must convince at least one skeptical Democrat, Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin of Michigan.

Levin said he believes the law already requires Bush to seek congressional approval if he decides to attack Iran. He suggested that the amendment could backfire on Democrats if Republicans block it or the president vetoes it, and he said that Bush might then argue anew that he doesn't need congressional approval to attack.

The urgency is heightened as anti-war Democrats quarrel among themselves over whether to rescind the 2002 Iraq war authorization, renew it with restrictions or leave it untouched.

"We don't trust the president," said Sen. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio. "I want to support something that forces the president to come to us before he goes into Iran."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Recycled Oscar

It's a good thing National Geographic News waited until after the Oscars were presented in Hollywood on Sunday night before publishing its story on global warming, or else Al Gore might have flown home empty-handed.

Three days after "An Inconvenient Truth," Mr. Gore's global warming show, took home an Oscar, National Geographic's Kate Ravilious reports that it's not just Earth, but Mars too, that "appears to be enjoying more mild and balmy temperatures."

She cites 2005 data from NASA's Mars Global Surveyor and Odyssey missions, revealing that the carbon dioxide "ice caps" near Mars' south pole are diminishing, "evidence that the current global warming on Earth is being caused by changes in the sun."

Habibullo Abdussamatov, head of the St. Petersburg's Pulkovo Astronomical Observatory, is quoted in the article as saying the Mars data is evidence that the "long-term increase in solar irradiance is heating both Earth and Mars."

The question now is whether Mr. Gore's coveted Oscar can be recycled?

Pray tell

King Abdullah II of Jordan will address a joint session of Congress next Wednesday, becoming the first world leader to address such a meeting under the new Democratic-led Congress.

Merissa Khurma, spokeswoman for the Jordanian government in Washington, tells us the king's speech will partly address the crisis in neighboring Iraq and ways to restore security and stability there. Congress, no doubt, will be all ears.

Defining courage

There's been a great deal of reaction to yesterday's item about the new film "Silent Wings," which praises heroic glider pilots who fought during World War II, described by one general as the "the most uninhibited individuals ever to wear an American uniform."

Most were interested in our mention that Walter Cronkite and Andy Rooney, each of whom appear in the film, were among eight civilian and military combat journalists known as "The Writing 69th." Many did not realize that Sgt. Rooney wrote for Stars and Stripes, while Mr. Cronkite reported for United Press.

Indeed, in June 1973, Mr. Cronkite, the trusted news anchor for CBS, spoke personally of his wartime reporting during an interview with Playboy magazine.

"I'm embarrassed when I'm introduced for speeches and somebody takes a CBS handout and reads it, because it makes me sound like some sort of hero: The battle of the North Atlantic, the landing in Africa, the beachhead on D-Day, dropping with the 101st Airborne, the Battle of the Bulge.

DOJ_NMG_0138902

"Personally, I feel I was an overweening coward in the war," Mr. Cronkite said. "I was scared to death all the time. I did everything possible to avoid getting into combat. Except the ultimate thing of not doing it. I did it. But the truth is that I did everything only once. It didn't take any great courage to do it once. If you go back and do it a second time — knowing how bad it is — that's courage."

Yield to Mexico

Round up the children and dogs; the trucks are coming, the trucks are coming.

"The next sound you hear will be the rumble of thousands of Mexican trucks streaming across our southern border," warns Rep. Ted Poe, Texas Republican, referring to the U.S. government agreeing to allow 100 Mexican trucking companies to send trucks, as he calls it, on the highways and byways of America.

"Presently, Mexican trucks may only go 20 miles inside the U.S. border. The U.S. government says they will inspect the trucks for safety and inspect the drivers as well. Yeah, right," the congressman states. "There are already 6,000 trucks a day crossing in each direction just between Laredo, Texas, and Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, and only a fraction of these are inspected."

Even worse, the congressman fears the "low paid, unqualified drivers that may not even be able to read highway signs."

That we do

"CORRECTION: In the e-mail we sent you earlier this morning, regarding the Waxman-Davis 'Executive Branch Reform Act' (H.R. 984), there was a typo that identified [Henry A.] Waxman as 'R-Ca.' Mr. Waxman, as we all know, is a Democrat."

Report Slams Venezuela For Drug Trafficking (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - In its harshest assessment yet of drug trafficking in Venezuela, the State Department on Thursday said the country is turning into a haven for smugglers because of corruption and the government's refusal to cooperate with other nations.

The department's 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategies Report also expressed uneasiness over Bolivia's efforts to expand the cultivation of coca, the raw material used to make cocaine, and the State Department offered rare praise for Cuba for deporting a Colombian trafficker to Bogota.

It also praised three countries - Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico - that Bush will visit this month during a swing through Latin America, saying the three were trying to halt drug smuggling, if not succeeding.

The report also said that opium production hit a record high in Afghanistan last year and that the drug trade was undermining democracy there.

The report says Afghanistan produced a record 5,644 metric tons of opium in 2006, a 26 percent jump from the previous year. The State Department said there was "strong evidence" that drug trafficking was funding the Taliban insurgency.

"These links between drug traffickers and anti-government forces threaten regional stability," the report said.

Venezuela's leftwing President Hugo Chavez has long been at loggerheads with the Bush administration, which has accused him of everything from undermining democracies in the hemisphere to provoking an arms race - allegations denied by the Chavez government.

The report calls Venezuela "one of the principal drug-transit countries in the Western Hemisphere," with Colombian traffickers setting up shop there because the Chavez government is "permissive and corrupt."

Anne Patterson, the State Department's top anti-drug trafficking official, told reporters that suspected drug trafficking flights from Venezuela to Haiti and the Dominican Republic had soared by 167 percent last year.

More than 200 metric tons of cocaine transit through Venezuela every year, according to the report, which covers the entire world. Arrests are limited to small-time traffickers, and seizures within Venezuela dropped while Venezuelan shipments interdicted in other countries tripled.

The Venezuelan embassy in Washington declined to comment on the report, but in the past Chavez and several of his government's officials have denied any relaxation of its fight against illicit drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0138903

The report praises Colombia, the world's top cocaine producer, as "completely committed" to the drug war. It calls Mexican efforts to combat traffickers last year as "unmatched" by any previous government there. About 90 percent of the cocaine in U.S. streets is believed to have come through the border with Mexico.

Guatemala is described in the report as "major drug-transit country" that made "substantial progress" in reforming the police's ability to combat drugs. The report, prepared weeks ago, made no mention, however, of the Feb. 19 murders of three Central American legislators in what Guatemala's President Oscar Berger said may have been a drug-related crime.

Four police officers arrested in the deaths, including the head of Guatemala's organized crime unit, were murdered days later in their cells at a prison outside Guatemala City. The assailants, who are still at large, passed through eight prison checkpoints unchallenged, officials said.

Patterson denied that the report picked on Venezuela because of Chavez's strident criticism of Bush.

"In contrast to the strong stands taken by the governments of Mexico and Colombia," Patterson said, "political will in Venezuela and Bolivia faltered last year."

She said Venezuela long had one of the strongest records in the hemisphere against trafficking. "And frankly, that's all stopped, for reasons that aren't entirely clear to me."

The Bush administration stepped up its criticism of Venezuela after Chavez ousted Drug Enforcement Administration agents from Venezuelan government facilities in late 2004, allegedly because they were spying. The two countries later negotiated an agreement to allow DEA agents to return, but Venezuela has so far refused to sign it, the report says.

In September of last year, the administration "de-certified" Venezuela as a helpful ally in the drug war and cut off aid and weapons shipments, among other sanctions.

Patterson praised Cuba for deporting alleged trafficker Luis Hernando Gomez-Bustamante to Colombia after holding him in prison for several months. He is expected to be extradited soon from Colombia to the United States.

"There is not a major trafficking issue through Cuba," she added. The Cuban government has long maintained that it is carrying on a strong fight against illicit drugs, despite past U.S. allegations that government officials there were involved in protecting foreign traffickers.

Bolivia's leftist President Evo Morales wants to increase the acreage of legally grown coca while fighting the illegal trade in cocaine. The Bush administration believes more coca will lead to more cocaine and is to decide by March 15 if Bolivia is doing enough to stop drug trafficking.

Bolivia's ambassador to the United States, Gustavo Guzman, described the report as "serene and balanced."

Report Looks At Cocaine Trade (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Venezuela has become a significant player in the flow of cocaine from Colombia to the USA by allowing drug smugglers to operate freely and making little effort to cooperate with U.S. anti-drug efforts, a State Department report said Thursday.

The number of flights from Venezuela suspected of ferrying Colombian cocaine to the Dominican Republic and Haiti — key transfer points for U.S.-bound shipments of the drug — increased 167% last year, Assistant Secretary of State Anne Patterson said. She added that the leftist government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, a frequent critic of the United States, has allowed drug trafficking to flourish.

"Venezuela's permissive and corrupt environment led to more trafficking, fewer seizures and an increase in suspected drug flights (from Venezuela) over the past 12 months," Patterson said.

In 2006, the Department of Defense's Joint Interagency Task Force South documented 75 flights from Venezuela to the Dominican Republic and 46 flights into Haiti, says U.S. Coast Guard Rear Adm. Jeff Hathaway, who directs the task force.

"What we have seen emerging over the last 12 months is a virtual explosion of drug trafficking emanating from Venezuela," Hathaway said.

The task force gives information about suspected drug flights to the Venezuelan government, but it rarely acts on it, he said. "Venezuela is not making any attempt to stop the aircraft when they are being tipped off by the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0138904

The Venezuelan Embassy did not respond to phone calls and e-mails requesting comment.

Patterson praised governments in Mexico and Colombia for aggressive counterdrug programs, but she said both countries continue to be major drug suppliers to the USA. In Bolivia, she said, the political will to counter drug trafficking has declined.

Recently elected Bolivian President Evo Morales has said the government would allow farmers to increase cultivation of coca to be used legally for flavorings and pharmaceuticals from 29,653 acres to 49,421 acres. The U.S. government contends that just 618 acres of coca cultivation would meet worldwide industrial demand.

The report also said Afghanistan's opium-poppy cultivation rose 59% last year, making the 2006 crop the largest ever. Patterson said profits from the opium trade help finance Taliban forces.

The Afghan government does not control Helmand and Kandahar provinces, where much of the opium poppies are grown, Patterson said.

Officials at the Afghan Embassy did not respond to a request for comment.

Embassy Row (WT)

By James Morrison

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

'Threat to the world'

Iran's nuclear weapons program poses the "most serious threat to the world," Israeli Ambassador Sallai Meridor warned.

"There is limited time [to stop Iran], and the question is, 'What will be done with that time,' " he said in an interview with National Public Radio's "All Things Considered" program.

The threat is not limited to Israel, which Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has vowed to destroy, the ambassador said.

"We see the Iranian threat as the most serious threat to the world," he said. "It's [a threat] to Israel because [Iran] threatens Israel's very existence and denies our right to exist.

"It's [a threat] to the region because they would like to dominate the entire Middle East. But beyond that, I think that it will be a different world for our children and grandchildren were Iran to be able to have a nuclear weapon."

Mr. Meridor predicted that Iran would disrupt nuclear nonproliferation efforts and let "many, many genies out of many, many bottles."

He urged the "world community" to act "responsibly and seriously and determinedly by diplomatic ways, by economic pressure on Iran, by explaining to the Iranian people the wrongdoing of their government."

Mr. Meridor also said the Israeli government is "constantly" looking for any change in the views of the militant Hamas group that dominates the Palestinian government. Hamas has refused to recognize the state of Israel.

"Not only our hearts and hands, but our ears are constantly open [to any change in Hamas]," he said. "There is nothing Israel wants more than peace, and we are constantly tuned to any potential change in our enemies and in their views. So far, as we know, Hamas is committed to the opposite of peace."

Trip to Mexico

Mexico's new ambassador, when he presented his diplomatic credentials at the White House this week, praised President Bush for his upcoming visit to Mexico City.

The two-day visit beginning March 12 will "strengthen the already firm foundations on which our bilateral relationship rests," Ambassador Arturo Sarukhan said.

"It is a bilateral relationship whose breadth, complexity and vitality has no parallel elsewhere in the world," he added.

The ambassador said his top priority is to advance the agenda of President Felipe Calderon. Mr. Sarukhan served as a foreign policy adviser and spokesman to the international press during Mr. Calderon's presidential campaign.

"It is time to roll up our sleeves and work together to achieve a constructive dialogue with forward-looking solutions for the future well-being of our two peoples," Mr. Sarukhan said.

DOJ_NMG_0138905

Earlier in his diplomatic career, Mr. Sarukhan served in Washington as chief of staff to Mexican Ambassador Jorge Montano in 1993. Two years later, he was appointed the embassy's director for counternarcotics and law-enforcement issues. From 2003 to 2006, Mr. Sarukhan was Mexico's consul general in New York.

Conservative honor

Yulia Tymoshenko will cap her busy Washington visit this evening when she will be honored at the annual dinner of top U.S. conservatives, who will give her some original documents signed by President Reagan.

Mrs. Tymoshenko, who will begin her day with a 9 a.m. press conference at the National Press Club, will be recognized tonight by the Conservative Political Action Committee for her promotion of democracy in Ukraine, first as a leader of the 2005 Orange Revolution that drove a corrupt government from power and later as prime minister. She is now leader of the opposition in the Ukrainian parliament.

Columnist and author John Fund will present her with original presidential proclamations pertaining to the Cold War.

•Call Embassy Row at 202/636-3297, fax 202/832-7278 or e-mail jmorrison@

washingtontimes.com.

U.S. Wants Missile Radar In Caucasus (AP)

By Slobodan Lekic

AP, March 2, 2007

The director of the U.S. Missile Defense Agency said Thursday that Washington wants to base an anti-missile radar in the Caucasus, a move that could provoke a further rift with Russia.

Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering declined to specify which country the long-range radar could be installed in, but noted that "it would be very useful for the anti-missile system."

Speaking on a stop at NATO headquarters in Brussels, he said "we would like to place a radar in ... the Caucasus."

The United States has said the planned defenses would not be aimed at Russia, and are intended to defend against missile attacks from countries such as Iran.

Moscow has angrily criticized Washington's plan to locate an anti-missile system in the Czech Republic and Poland. It is likely that placing another radar in a U.S.-allied country such as Georgia or Azerbaijan would provoke further protest.

Unlike anti-aircraft systems, anti-missile radars have very narrow beams that cannot be used to monitor large swathes of air space. They have high resolution and very long ranges, allowing them to follow objects the size of a baseball at distances of up to nearly 2,000 miles.

Russia has warned that Poland and the Czech Republic risked being targeted by Russian missiles if they agreed to host the U.S. anti-missile bases.

In Moscow, Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Grushko said the missile elements planned by Washington for Poland and the Czech Republic would become a "factor that we will have to take into account while determining our steps in the military-political sphere and military development."

"In the modern world, security is indivisible. You can't ensure your own security if you provoke other nations' concerns about their security," Grushko said in a statement posted on the Foreign Ministry's Web site.

Tymoshenko Seeks Early Elections (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Ukraine's revived Orange Coalition will press for early elections in a bid to halt Russia's growing influence and control over the country's vital energy assets, opposition leader Yulia Tymoshenko said in an interview yesterday.

Mrs. Tymoshenko, a former prime minister and key figure in the pro-Western Orange Revolution street protests of December 2004, said Ukraine's sovereignty and hopes for better relations with the West are in jeopardy if the government of pro-Moscow Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych serves out its full term to 2011.

DOJ_NMG_0138906

"If this government is in power until then, there would be nothing left of a democratic Ukraine," she said, speaking through an interpreter with editors and reporters at The Washington Times. "The territory would still exist, but it would not be Ukraine any longer."

Mrs. Tymoshenko's party and the party of pro-Western President Viktor Yushchenko signed a new deal over the weekend to cooperate in parliament, seeking to end a disastrous feud among the Orange Revolution allies that enabled Mr. Yanukovych's pro-Moscow party to reclaim power in August 2006.

Mrs. Tymoshenko, considered a front-runner among reformists for the 2009 presidential vote, said the reunited pro-reform parties will push for early parliamentary elections, although the move faces both political and constitutional hurdles.

On a high-profile U.S. visit that includes meetings with Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Mrs. Tymoshenko said the United States must speak out for Ukraine despite a full foreign-policy plate that includes Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan and other pressing crises.

She noted there was "disillusionment" in Washington about backsliding in Ukraine since her coalition was propelled to power in 2005 by a wave of street protests that became known as the Orange Revolution because of the orange flags and banners carried by the protesters.

But, she said, "a country as large and influential as your own has to lead this kind of work. Your country does not have the right to be fatigued about Ukraine's future."

Mr. Yanukovych, whose tainted win in the 2004 presidential election sparked the Orange Revolution, has engineered an abrupt about-face in Ukrainian policy since his political comeback last summer.

With a power base in Ukraine's Russian-speaking east, the prime minister has put a hold on Ukraine's efforts to join NATO, dismissed Mr. Yushchenko's pro-Western foreign minister, and signed an accord tightly linking Ukraine's economy to those of Russia and Belarus.

The charismatic Mrs. Tymoshenko, sporting her trademark blonde braids, said Mr. Yanukovych's allies dominate the courts and key security ministries in Kiev.

Rich eastern business clans from Mr. Yanukovych's political base in Donetsk are buying influence and lawmakers to keep him in power, she said.

Mr. Yanukovych's party "is trying to buy deputies like chickens in a bazaar," she said, "and these politicians are allowing themselves to be bought."

She was particularly scathing about the government's energy concessions to Moscow. She said Russia, through a shadowy Swiss-based intermediary company, is in the process of locking up Ukraine's oil, gas and electricity markets, giving Russia a near-monopoly of energy supplies to much of Europe.

"Our new government and the Russian Federation are eating up the country's energy system like eating buns for breakfast," she said.

But she stressed she did not consider herself an "enemy of Russia," blaming instead Ukrainian officials for failing the country's basic economic and political interests.

Russian President Vladimir Putin "is doing his own thing," she said.

"It isn't that I don't like Russia. Politics cannot be motivated by such feelings. It's simply that I love Ukraine," she said.

Mrs. Tymoshenko acknowledged that she had moved too quickly in her short, stormy first stint as prime minister. Mr. Yushchenko dismissed her after just nine months in office in September 2005, and her tenure was marked by numerous policy and personal clashes.

She said Mr. Yushchenko also had underestimated the power of entrenched interests opposed to the Orange Revolution reforms. A series of constitutional changes since 2004 have weakened the president's power while building up the prime minister.

She compared Ukraine in 2005 to a scuba diver trying to surface too quickly after years in the stagnant political depths.

"If I have a chance to have the responsibility in the future, unfortunately the reforms will have to come at a slower tempo, to make sure we do not get another case of the bends," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0138907

US Deputy Secretary Of State Starts Asia Tour (AFP)

AFP, March 2, 2007

New US Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte on Thursday started an Asian tour in which he is expected to discuss a breakthrough nuclear deal with North Korea.

Negroponte arrived in Tokyo, the veteran diplomat's first foreign destination since taking the post of number-two to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

He is likely to meet Foreign Minister Taro Aso and other officials on Friday, a ministry official said. After a three-day stay, Negroponte will head on to China and South Korea.

Tokyo has refused to fund the February 13 deal, under which North Korea agreed to shut a key nuclear reactor in exchange for fuel aid, due to a dispute over Pyongyang's past abductions of Japanese civilians.

US Vice President Dick Cheney assured close ally Japan that he understood the concerns about the kidnapping row during a visit last week.

Negroponte, the London-born son of a Greek tycoon, has served in a series of top positions under US President George W. Bush including national intelligence director and as ambassador to both the United Nations and Iraq.

China Expands Sub Fleet (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

China's military is engaged in a major buildup of submarines that includes five new strategic nuclear-missile boats and several advanced nuclear-powered attack submarines, according to the Office of Naval Intelligence.

The new nuclear-powered missile submarines (SSBNs), identified as Type 094s, will be outfitted with new 5,000-mile range JL-2 missiles that "will provide China with a modern and robust sea-based nuclear deterrent force," the ONI stated in report made up of written answers to questions on the Chinese submarine buildup.

The ONI report was first disclosed to Sea Power magazine, and a copy was obtained by The Washington Times. It was the first time the Pentagon has identified the number of new Chinese strategic submarines under construction.

The five new missile submarines will "provide more redundancy and capacity for a near-continuous at-sea SSBN presence," the ONI said, which noted that sea trials for some of the submarines are under way and the first deployments could begin as early as next year.

The buildup is raising new concerns among senior Pentagon planners already worried by Beijing's broader strategic nuclear-forces buildup, which also includes several new long-range land-based nuclear missiles and a land-attack cruise missile similar to the Tomahawk.

"This is a troubling development," Richard Fisher, a specialist on the Chinese military with the private International Assessment and Strategy Center, said of the submarine buildup.

The five missile submarines, each equipped with 12 JL-2 missiles, shows that China is working to achieve a force of 120 long-range nuclear missiles over the next decade, about half of them to be carried on the submarines, Mr. Fisher said. The other half would be the 60 land-based DF-31 missiles that current deployment rates will give China by then, he said.

The 120 missiles also could have multiple-warheads, since China is known to have acquired all the needed technology from the U.S. during the 1990s.

Retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell, commenting at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on Tuesday, said China's nuclear missiles pose a threat.

"It's a matter of they're building their military, in my view, to reach some state of parity with the United States," said Mr. McConnell, the new director of national intelligence. "So they're a threat today, they would become an increasing threat over time."

Little is known about China's nuclear forces and efforts by Pentagon officials to engage Chinese military leaders about their strategic weapons and forces has not been successful. China's government has insisted its current modernization is part of a peaceful development, but the contrasting strategic nuclear-forces buildup is worrying, defense officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0138908

Chinese Gen. Zhu Chenghu told reporters in 2005 that China would attack U.S. cities with nuclear weapons in response to any conventionally armed U.S. missile strikes against China during a conflict over Taiwan. Years earlier, Gen. Xiong Guangkai threatened to use nuclear weapons against Los Angeles if the U.S. helped Taiwan defend against a Chinese invasion of the island.

The missile-submarine buildup would provide Beijing with a major upgrade on current capabilities. In 1983, China built one Xia-class nuclear-powered ballistic missile submarine, reportedly with 12 1,000-mile range JL-1 missiles. But that solitary submarine has only twice test-fired its missiles and never ventured beyond China's regional waters.

"Although the range of the JL-1 limits the Xia's utility as a deterrent platform, targets throughout the region, including U.S. military facilities, could be targeted with the JL-1 from launch points inside traditional Chinese navy operating areas," the ONI said.

On China's new attack submarine, the ONI stated that China already has launched and is performing sea trials on an unspecified number of Type 093 nuclear-powered attack submarines. Published reports in China have said two Type 093 attack submarines are deployed and use "foreign technologies" and advanced anti-ship missiles and torpedoes.

The new advances are part of China's efforts to bolster its anti-ship weapons to permit strikes at greater ranges from the Chinese coast than its current diesel-powered submarine force offers, the ONI said. China currently is upgrading its current force of about 55 attack submarines -- most of them easy-to-track diesel boats -- with more-advanced and harder-to-track vessels, including Russian-made Kilos, and its own Song- and Yuan-class submarines.

"Each of these submarine classes, which are quiet platforms with anti-ship cruise missiles, is an integral part of China's regional anti-access strategy," ONI said. "The quieting incorporated into these submarines is required for successful operations in the open ocean operating areas which could facilitate the [Chinese navy's] wartime mission of keeping enemy combatants outside of strike range of the theater of operation."

A Song-class submarine surfaced undetected within five miles, well within firing range, of the aircraft carrier USS Kitty Hawk in October.

The ONI stated that China's maritime strategy is focused on blocking U.S. or Japanese intervention in a future conflict over Taiwan. To that end, Beijing has begun equipping its medium- and short-range ballistic missiles based on shore, hundreds of which are deployed across the Taiwan Strait from the island that the communist regime views as a renegade province, with maneuvering warheads.

These radar-guided or heat-seeking weapons "provide the accuracy necessary to attack a ship at sea," ONI said.

But China's rise in international trade and commerce, plus its growing dependence on imported foreign oil, also has expanded Beijing's maritime strategy from a mostly submarine force to one of building surface ships to "defend sea lines of communication" (SLOCs), because protecting sea-lanes with submarines is difficult.

ONI also said that in addition to new destroyers, "by 2020, China is likely to operate an aircraft carrier, the initial unit of which may be the refurbished ex-Varyag, acquired from Ukraine in 2000, to further support SLOC protection."

Beijing Likens Cheney Criticism To Nosy Neighbor (WT)

By Ed Lanfranco

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

BEIJING -- Foreign ministry spokesman Qin Gang responded yesterday to Vice President Dick Cheney's remarks about China during his recent Asia trip with an earthy metaphor about home invasion and a barbed eight-point statement outlining China's diplomatic philosophy.

Mr. Qin's comments strayed far from the tepid boilerplate answers normally issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs when he was asked about remarks by Mr. Cheney, who had expressed concern over the transparency of Chinese military expenditures and suggested that China's anti-satellite test in January posed a threat to the world.

Acknowledging that the comparison might not be entirely appropriate, he said: "If you had a neighbor always standing at your doorstep, peering into your household and constantly shouting at you, 'Why don't you open your door and let me see what's in your house, what's in your family,' how would you feel about that?"

DOJ_NMG_0138909

Mr. Qin continued: "You wear your clothes, you wear your underwear, and when there are people shouting at you, 'Please take off all your clothes and let me see what's inside,' how would you respond? I think you will cry for police help.

"I hope such a comparison will help you better understand our position," Mr. Qin said.

The foreign ministry official then gave an eight-point statement on whether China poses a threat to the world, telling reporters, "We hope you can make your judgment on the basis of Chinese diplomatic philosophy and its precepts."

Here is the transcript of Mr. Qin's remarks:

"First of all China will not seek hegemony. We are still a developing country. We don't have the resources to seek hegemony. Even if China becomes a developed country, we will not seek hegemony.

"Second, China will not play power politics and we will not interfere with other countries' internal affairs. We will not impose our own ideology on other countries.

"Third, we maintain all countries, big or small, should be treated equally and respect each other. All affairs should be consulted and resolved by all countries on the basis of equal participation. No country should bully others on the basis of strength.

"Fourth, [in international affairs] China will make judgment on each case, each matter on the merit of the matter itself and we will not have double standards. We will not have two policies: one for ourselves and one for others. We will not do that. We believe we cannot do unto others what we do not wish others do unto us.

"Fifth, we advocate all countries handle their relations on the basis of the United Nations Charter and norms governing international relations. We advocate stepping up international cooperation and do not play politics unilaterally. We should not undermine the dignity and the authority of the U.N. We should not impose and set our own wishes above the U.N. Charter, international law and norms.

"Sixth, we advocate peaceful negotiation and consultation so as to resolve our international disputes. We do not resort to force, or threat of force, in resolving international disputes. China maintains a reasonable national military buildup to defend our own sovereignty and territorial integrity. It is not made to expand, nor do we seek invasion or aggression.

"Seventh, China is firmly opposed to terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. We are a responsible member of the international community, and as for international treaties, we abide by all them in a faithful way. We never play by a double standard, selecting and discarding treaties we do not need.

"Eighth, we respect the diversity of civilization and the whole world. We advocate different cultures make exchanges, learn from each other, and compliment one another with their own strengths. We're opposed to clashes and confrontations between civilizations, and we do not link any particular ethnic group or religion with terrorism."

A Cry To Limit Chinese Imports Rings At Paper Mill (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

LUKE, Md. — For years the residents of this economically distressed hollow in the Appalachians have watched textile mills, glass factories and tire makers close down one after the other. Now its lone remaining big factory — "the last man standing," as the production manager at the paper mill here put it — is threatened by imports of cheaper paper made in China.

"We're still the economic engine for this whole area," said Scott Graham, the production manager, referring to the river valley and forested hills surrounding the mill. "But our operations cannot compete with these below-cost imports."

It is a familiar story in the struggle of the American industrial base to cope with globalization, but this one may have a different ending.

The problems of paper mills here and elsewhere around the country have become a test case for a possible new confrontation between the United States and China, which many industry officials and members of Congress hope could lead to new tariffs on imports not only of Chinese-made paper but also of steel, furniture, textiles and plastics.

In coming weeks, the Commerce Department is expected to decide whether to impose duties on high-gloss paper known as "coated paper" — the kind made here in Luke — that is imported from China. Many trade specialists in Congress and in the industry expect it to do so. Indeed, China has gone to court to block the decision in advance.

DOJ_NMG_0138910

If imposed, the duties would set an important precedent, reversing 20 years of settled American trade policy in which the United States refrained from making accusations that "nonmarket economies" like China were granting illegal subsidies. In its court case, China argues that changing that policy without legislation or a full regulatory hearing would be illegal.

The Bush administration's decision to face the issue of subsidies comes at a time of mounting pressure by Congress for a tougher stance on trade. With the American trade gap with China widening to a record $232.5 billion last year — roughly one-third of the entire deficit — Democrats say that if the Commerce Department does not act, they will pass legislation forcing its hand.

Many lawmakers say it is time to stop treating China with kid gloves, arguing that Beijing no longer deserves a free ride in which it benefits from a special exemption generally forbidden to Japan, Europe and other advanced industrial powers.

"I'm glad the administration is finally doing something," said Representative Sander M. Levin, a Michigan Democrat and chairman of the trade subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee. "They are beginning to recognize that there was an election last year."

The travails of the Luke mill are similar to those of other aging factories. But the NewPage Corporation, the company that owns the plant and is the largest producer of the high-quality paper, argues that it has hardly stood still in the face of foreign competition.

Mr. Graham, the production manager, whose grandfather helped pour concrete for the mill's old 600-foot smokestack, points out that in seven years, the mill has invested hundreds of millions of dollars in labor-saving computerized equipment while reducing its work force to 1,000 from 1,500 and increasing its output by a third.

True, the plant, a sprawling complex on the upper reaches of the Potomac River, is fired by coal mined nearby and fed by huge quantities of water from local reservoirs, the same way it was when it was built in the 1880s here on the Maryland-West Virginia border.

Giant truckloads of trees are hauled up at one end of the mill. On the other end, thick rolls of shiny white paper are loaded on trucks. Among the clients for NewPage's paper are producers of annual reports, labels, Hollywood movie posters and the glossy catalogs put out by Williams-Sonoma, Pottery Barn and Neiman Marcus.

Although Chinese companies also use modern equipment, NewPage maintains that their real advantage results from subsidies. They include government grants for modernization, low-cost loans, debt forgiveness, tax breaks for export-oriented companies and subsidies for suppliers of wood and pulp.

China's market share in coated paper is still small, but rather than wait until Chinese producers dominate the business — as they have in things like toys and underwear — the paper mill's backers are hoping to block what they see as unfair competition before it is too late.

The involvement of NewPage in the Commerce Department's strategy was not accidental. Last year the department quietly informed critics of China's trade policies that it would be willing to review its longstanding policy of not challenging Chinese subsidies as illegal if they could come up with a clear-cut case.

Lawyers for NewPage say that Chinese producers charge $800 for a midgrade roll of paper, compared with the $1,000 the American company charges. The price differential alone does not prove the case, but it has enabled Chinese producers to increase their share of the American market from less than 1 percent in 2000 to 5.4 percent last year, the company says.

Under the complicated rules of trade, countries may impose tariffs in two situations: if an import is deemed to have been "dumped," or sold below cost; or if certain illegal subsidies were involved.

The first category of tariffs — to guard against dumping — are imposed, threatened, disputed, retaliated against and ultimately negotiated all the time. The United States and China have frequently accused each other of dumping, and antidumping tariffs are being contemplated in the coated-paper case.

What makes this case significant, however, is that the department announced last November that it was also investigating whether to seek duties above and beyond those, to punish China for illegal subsidies.

Antidumping duties are often low. But if antisubsidy duties are imposed, they could double the price of Chinese paper, eliminating it from the market entirely, lawyers for the Chinese government say.

DOJ_NMG_0138911

The Commerce Department is expected to announce its decision by April 2. The argument for changing the policy is that China has become a major aggressive player on the world economic stage, and that a policy forged when Beijing was just beginning to move away from communism — and its subsidies barely produced a ripple — is out of date.

Franklin L. Lavin, the under secretary of commerce for international trade, said that he could not comment on the merits of the case, but that politics did not play a role in the decision to investigate.

"Look at the timeline," he said. "This was not a response to the midterm elections or to politics. It's a response to the fact that the China of today is very different from the China of 15 years ago."

Lawyers handling the case for the Chinese government and for several Chinese companies say these subsidies are in effect being counted twice in the investigation of antidumping and antisubsidy actions.

"The fear is that this case is going to be exploited by industry after industry," said William H. Barringer, a partner at Vinson & Elkins, which represents the Chinese government on the issue. "The first people in the door will be steel. If this is upheld, China will be overwhelmed having to defend all these cases."

If China loses the case, it has the option of pursuing two kinds of appeals: one with the United States Courts of Appeals and the other with the World Trade Organization in Geneva. The lawyers for China say that Beijing would pursue these appeals rather than engage in any retaliatory tariffs on American goods.

Many experts see the coated-paper case as one of three recent administration moves to raise pressure on China and to try to pre-empt Congress, forestalling legislation that might dictate trade policy and possibly nullify past trade accords with China and other countries.

The other two were a February announcement by the United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, that the United States would challenge Chinese subsidies at the World Trade Organization in Geneva, and a parallel threat to seek relief at the trade organization if China did not do more to crack down on piracy and counterfeit goods.

The administration's tougher stance also comes at a time of little progress in the so-called strategic economic dialogue with China, begun with great fanfare last fall by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.

"It's clear these steps are intended to slake Congressional appetites and avert legislation that would put President Bush in a bind," said Gary C. Hufbauer, a senior fellow and trade expert at the Peter G. Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington. "It's also designed to give some heft to the 'strategic economic dialogue.' "

Some in Congress also see the China actions as a sign that Mr. Paulson, who resigned as chief executive of Goldman Sachs to become Treasury secretary last summer, realizes that his policy toward Beijing is faltering. A main focus has been a failed effort to persuade China to stop interfering with its currency levels in a way aimed at promoting exports.

"When Paulson came in, he thought all you have to do is talk logic with the Chinese," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York and a vociferous critic of China. "They talked very nicely and gave him ice in the winter. Now he's learning that you have to be tougher. It's not like doing a deal with Goldman Sachs."

A spokeswoman for Mr. Paulson, Brookly McLaughlin, said that the dialogue was "not designed to replace other bilateral negotiations or the necessary enforcement of our trade laws." Mr. Paulson, meanwhile, will be trying to shore up his approach with a visit to China in March, his third since taking office.

The policy rests on the basic idea that American consumers gain tremendous benefits from access to goods from China and that the American economy has proved itself capable of adapting to even the most intense foreign competition, in that way constantly advancing the nation's prosperity and productivity.

But that perspective does not carry much weight here in Luke.

"Somebody's got to be left who can do more than flip burgers for a living," said Thomas Caldwell, who ran a machine cutting rolls of paper into sheets at the plant before becoming president of the local union seven years ago. "I'm scared to death of how my grandkids are going to have to deal with this."

U.S., Brazil Plan Ethanol Partnership (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138912

WASHINGTON — U.S. and Brazilian officials are negotiating details of an ethanol partnership in advance of President Bush's scheduled visit to Brazil next week.

"We are interested in forming a global ethanol market" with the United States, Brazilian Foreign Minister Celso Amorim said this week.

If completed, the planned deal would help increase both nations' production of ethanol, creating significant economic as well as political implications.

First, expanding world ethanol markets would help the USA and other nations reduce their dependence on foreign oil. Also, reduced demand for oil might reduce the clout of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, who has tried to use his nation's oil reserves to undercut U.S. policies in the region.

The USA and Brazil produce more than 70% of the world's ethanol; the U.S. supply comes mainly from corn, while Brazil taps its abundant sugar cane crop.

Today, officials from the United States, Brazil, China, India, South Africa and the European Commission will announce the creation of the International Biofuels Forum. The group, affiliated with the United Nations, will work to create worldwide ethanol standards.

White House press secretary Tony Snow declined to comment on ongoing negotiations.

Bush will visit São Paulo on Thursday and Friday in the first stop of a week-long journey that also includes Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico. In Brazil, Bush is scheduled to discuss alternative energy sources with President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva.

The presidential tour comes just a few weeks after Latin American visits by State Department officials who discussed an ethanol deal with Brazilian officials.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told reporters Feb. 13 that the United States and Brazil should work together on research to make ethanol production more efficient.

An ethanol partnership would also seek "a global market," Burns said. "This will be a big issue for the president's visit, for us to cooperate."

Burns said one of the motivations is Bush's goal of reducing U.S. gas consumption by 20% over the next decade. Bush has touted ethanol as a way to wean the USA off what he calls its "addiction" to oil.

A report this week by the Government Accountability Office said Brazil has replaced its foreign oil imports with ethanol. Brazil started its ethanol program in 1975.

Amorim said Brazil also plans to ask the United States to cut tariffs on ethanol imports.

Some members of Congress from corn-growing states have already said they oppose cutting ethanol tariffs. Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, wrote Bush to oppose some of the proposals being discussed, including a pilot ethanol plant in the Caribbean region.

Grassley said he doesn't understand using U.S. tax dollars "to encourage new ethanol production in other countries, production that could directly compete with U.S.-produced ethanol."

Johanna Mendelson Forman, who studies renewable energy at the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the Caribbean is a potentially valuable ethanol market because many of those countries currently buy oil from Chávez.

"Creating an independent region that does not depend on Chávez's oil is a medium-to-long-term goal," she said.

Chávez has dismissed Bush's upcoming trip as "destined for the depths of defeat."

Report: Pakistan Nabs Key Taliban Insurgent (USAT)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Pakistan arrested a former Taliban defense minister regarded as a top figure in the Afghan insurgency, three Pakistani intelligence officials said today. Mullah Obaidullah Akhund is a key associate of Mullah Omar, the fugitive Taliban leader.

Akhund was among five Taliban suspects arrested in a raid on a home in the city of Quetta earlier this week, an official told the Associated Press. The official requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to reporters. Two other intelligence officials in Quetta, who also didn't want to be named because of the sensitive nature of their jobs, would only confirm the arrests to the AP. There was no official confirmation from the Pakistani government.

DOJ_NMG_0138913

The New York Times, citing two unnamed Pakistani officials, said Akhund was arrested on Monday, the day U.S. Vice President Cheney visited Pakistan.

Peacekeeping force arrives in Somalia

Ugandan troops flew into Somalia, the first contingent in an African peacekeeping force to shore up a United Nations-backed transitional government threatened by Islamic militants.

The 30 Ugandan soldiers arrived in Baidoa, seat of the government, Police Chief Adan Biid Ahmed said. Somali troops backed by Ethiopian soldiers ousted the Council of Islamic Courts militia from the capital, Mogadishu, in December, but the militants have staged daily guerrilla attacks.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since 1991 when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on one another.

Cuban minister: Castro may return soon

Fidel Castro "could return to work soon," Cuban Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said during a visit to Honduras. "I can't give an exact date," he said, "That will happen when he has satisfactorily concluded his recovery period." Perez Roque's comments follow other positive assessments of Castro's health from officials and relatives. Castro, 80, stepped aside in July after surgery for an undisclosed stomach ailment. His brother, Raul, has been in charge.

Continental Divide: U.S. Stirs Debate Over Africa Bank (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

TUNIS, Tunisia -- To the Bush administration, it seems obvious: The African Development Bank's headquarters should be in black Africa.

Four years ago, the bank, which funds development and antipoverty efforts, fled civil war in its longtime home in Ivory Coast for a temporary refuge in Tunisia, a stable country in Arab North Africa. Now, the U.S. says, it's time for the bank to leave Tunisia, give up hopes of returning to Ivory Coast, and find a new permanent home somewhere else south of the Sahara.

"A permanently temporary location simply will not do," Ahmed Saeed, a senior U.S. Treasury official, said at the bank's annual meeting last May.

In a roomful of African and European bank delegates, not a single person rose to endorse the U.S. position. Instead, the suggestion that the bank move has fueled a prickly fight involving African pride and European colonialism, with accusations traded about Arab racism and American arrogance.

Many black African and European member nations agree in principle that the bank should have its headquarters in a sub-Saharan country. What's more, some black Africans say they experience racism in Tunisia. "People call you 'monkey,' " says one West African banker. "Sometimes you feel like killing the person. But you just give up."

But leaving Ivory Coast permanently, black Africans fear, would signal that a country once hailed as a model of African hope is now just another horror story. North Africans quietly hope that if they bide their time, the bank will end up staying in Tunisia out of bureaucratic inertia.

And everyone but the U.S. thinks pressing the issue is the diplomatic equivalent of hitting a hornet's nest with a stick. "We should not even open this discussion," says one senior bank official from black Africa.

Since it was established in Abidjan, Ivory Coast, by African heads of state in 1964, the bank has provided more than $56 billion in financing. Although it went through financial woes and mismanagement in the 1990s, the bank's supporters say it is now back on track to fight poverty and disease. Tapping financial markets and rich-country donations, the bank's efforts include grants to fight the Marburg virus in Angola, loans to build roads in Congo and credits to support state banks in Tunisia. The U.S., one of the 77 member nations, is contributing $138 million to the bank this year.

For years, the bank's home country stood as a shining example of Africa's potential. Ivory Coast boasted good roads, fine restaurants and West Africa's only ice-skating rink.

DOJ_NMG_0138914

Things fell apart in 2002, when rebels attempted to overthrow President Laurent Gbagbo, triggering massacres and civil war. With gunfire in the air, managers of the development bank frantically evacuated about 1,000 employees and their families in early 2003. The bank picked Tunisia as a temporary refuge in large part because of the stability offered by the dictatorial government of President Zine el Abidine Ben Ali.

The new home sparked something of a culture clash, both bank and Tunisian officials say. The influx of thousands of bank professionals and their families jarred a country that had little experience with black Africans, except as students or laborers. Bank professional staff earn between $48,000 and $150,000 a year, far more than the average Tunisian, and many drive Mercedes or BMW sedans with easily identifiable African Development Bank license plates. They say they have often returned to their parked cars to find them intentionally scratched.

"Sometimes we're our own worst enemies," says one East African bank official. "We're too ostentatious for our own good."

Four years after the move, Ivory Coast remains in limbo. Some 10,000 French and United Nations troops patrol a buffer zone between the government-controlled south and the rebels in the north. The bank's official home is still Abidjan, but the Bush administration believes returning there isn't in the cards. This month President Bush cited "the massacre of large numbers of civilians" and "widespread human-rights abuses" in Ivory Coast in an executive order freezing assets of those contributing to the violence.

U.S. Treasury officials who want the bank to find a permanent home say Tunis is inconvenient because it has no direct flights to most of eastern, central or southern Africa. A bank staffer going to negotiate a loan in Rwanda might have to spend a night in Paris and another in Nairobi. Washington also believes it enjoys more support than is apparent on the surface, especially from Anglophone southern and eastern Africa. Ethiopia and Zambia have quietly let it be known that they'd be happy to host the bank, according to an official familiar with the discussions.

Publicly, most Africans aren't ready to abandon Ivory Coast. "Most people feel if your neighbor is in trouble, you should help him and not just run away," says Gerald Zirimwabagabo, who represents Rwanda, Ethiopia, Uganda and several other nations on the bank's board of directors.

France, the former colonial ruler of both Tunisia and Ivory Coast, is particularly reluctant to see the bank move to a country where people don't speak French. Meanwhile, many European staff members enjoy hopping to Rome, Paris and other European capitals for long weekends. "My opinion is that this relocation in Tunis will continue" until Ivory Coast stabilizes, says Francesco Pittore, who represents Italy, France and Belgium on the board of directors. It cost an estimated $100 million to move out of Abidjan, he says.

Tunisian officials say they aren't working to supplant Ivory Coast. "But if the question is on the table about finding a new permanent headquarters, we would present our candidacy to be the host," says Moncef Bouallagui, Tunisia's representative on the board of directors. Tunisia aspires to be a regional financial center, and Mr. Bouallagui says the bank's presence is "a sparkling sign to other businesses that people trust Tunisia."

Largely unspoken in the public debate is simmering discontent with Tunis among the bank's black African staff. The employees' union estimates that three-quarters of the bank's staff are living apart from their children, spouse or both. Many employees had lived in Ivory Coast for a decade or more prior to the evacuation. They owned homes that, in some cases, now sit empty. Many of their spouses ran small businesses; in Tunis, they typically need a Tunisian as a majority partner to go into business.

Black Africans say they feel unwelcome in Tunis. "They look at you like you're from Mars," says one veteran Central African bank staffer. While bank employees say such overt racism has diminished in recent years, they still encounter it.

"I don't say that kind of behavior doesn't exist," says Moufida Jaballah Srarfi, a director in Tunisia's Ministry of Development and International Cooperation. "As a Tunisian, if I go to Europe or another country maybe I'll encounter racist behavior. But I can't judge all Westerners as racist based on one case. We can't pigeonhole people."

One Tunisian, Isabelle Naouar, senses opportunity among the homesick and well-off. Last month, she opened a restaurant next door to the bank. The decor is West African, the chef Ivorian, and the tables full.

"We hope the bank won't move back," she says.

DOJ_NMG_0138915

Speeding HIV's Deadly Spread (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

FRANCISTOWN, Botswana -- The young and hip at ground zero of the AIDS epidemic meet, drink and pair off under the knowing gaze of bartender Brian Khumalo. Sometimes they first buy a three-pack of condoms from the box he keeps by the liquor, sometimes not.

Night after night they return for the carefree, beery vibe, with the same partners or new ones, creating a web of sexual interaction. A growing number of studies single out such behavior -- in which men and women maintain two or more ongoing relationships -- as the most powerful force propelling a killer disease through a vulnerable continent.

This new understanding of how the AIDS virus attacks individuals and their societies helps explain why the disease has devastated southern Africa while sparing other places. It also suggests how the region's AIDS programs, which have struggled to prevent new infections even as treatment for the disease has become more widely available, might save far more lives: by discouraging sexual networks.

"The problem of multiple partners who do not practice safe sex is obviously the biggest driver of HIV in the world," said Ndwapi Ndwapi, a top government AIDS official in Botswana, speaking in Gaborone, the capital. "What I need to know from the scientific community is, what do you do? . . . How do you change that for a society that happens to have higher rates of multiple sexual partners?"

Khumalo, 25, tall and lanky with a crooked-toothed smile, described the problem succinctly as he pointed to a spiky-haired woman in a corner booth of the bar. "She's new around here, so every guy is going to talk to her," he said. "She will be with me today. Tomorrow she will be with my best friend. And I will be with somebody else."

Khumalo moved from Gaborone to Francistown last March, finding a city of 85,000 with a red-brick downtown, modest concrete homes and an accommodating sexual culture. The first night, he slept with a woman he had just met, he said. He did the same the second night, the third, the fourth.

Though he used condoms each time, he said, an alarmed friend soon drove him to the white, low-slung buildings of Francistown's biggest AIDS clinic. "I saw thousands of beautiful women going to get pills," Khumalo recalled.

It scared him, but not enough. By the end of the year, Khumalo had slept with more than 100 women, he said.

But the number of sexual partners is not the only factor that increases the risk of AIDS. The most potentially dangerous relationships, researchers say, involve men and women who maintain more than one regular partner for months or years. In these relationships, more intimate, trusting and long-lasting than casual sex, most couples eventually stop using condoms, studies show, allowing easy infiltration by HIV.

Researchers increasingly agree that curbing such behavior is key to slowing the spread of AIDS in Africa. In a July report, southern African AIDS experts and officials listed "reducing multiple and concurrent partnerships" as their first priority for preventing the spread of HIV in a region where nearly 15 million people are estimated to carry the virus -- 38 percent of the world's total.

But for many Batswana, as citizens of this landlocked desert country of 1.6 million call themselves, it is a strategy that has rarely been taught.

"There has never been equal emphasis on 'Don't have many partners,' " said Serara Selelo-Mogwe, a public health expert and retired nursing professor at the University of Botswana, who recalled stepping past broken bottles and used condoms as she arrived on campus each Monday morning. "If you just say, 'Use the condom' . . . we will never see the daylight of the virus leaving us."A Lethal Mix of Causes

International experts long regarded Botswana as a case study in how to combat AIDS. It had few of the intractable social problems thought to predispose a country to the disease, such as conflict, abject poverty and poor medical care. And for the past decade, the country has rigorously followed strategies that Western experts said would slow AIDS.

With its diamond wealth and the largess of international donors, Botswana aggressively promoted condom use while building Africa's best network of HIV testing centers and its most extensive system for distributing the antiretroviral drugs that dramatically prolong and improve the lives of those with AIDS.

DOJ_NMG_0138916

But even though the relentless pace of funerals began to ease in recent years, the disease was far from under control. The national death rate fell from the highest in the world, but only to second-highest, behind AIDS-ravaged Swaziland. Men and women in Botswana continued to contract HIV faster than almost anywhere else on Earth.

Twenty-five percent of Batswana adults carry the virus, according to a 2004 national study, and among women in their early 30s living in Francistown, the rate is 69 percent.

Researchers increasingly attribute the resilience of HIV in Botswana -- and in southern Africa generally -- to the high incidence of multiple sexual relationships. Europeans and Americans often have more partners over their lives, studies show, but sub-Saharan Africans average more at the same time.

Nearly one in three sexually active men in Botswana reported having multiple, concurrent sex partners, as did 14 percent of women, in a 2003 survey paid for by the U.S. government. Among men younger than 25, the rate was 44 percent.

The distinction between having several partners in a year and several in a month is crucial because those newly infected with HIV experience an initial surge in viral loads that makes them far more contagious than they will be for years. During the three-week spike -- which ends before standard tests can even detect HIV -- the virus explodes through networks of unprotected sex.

This insight explained what studies were documenting: Africans with multiple, concurrent sex partners were more likely to contract HIV, and countries where such partnerships were common had wider and more lethal epidemics.

A model of multiple sexual relationships presented at a Princeton University conference in May showed that a small increase in the average number of concurrent sexual partners -- from 1.68 to 1.86 -- had profound effects, connecting sexual networks into a single, massive tangle that, when plotted out, resembles the transportation system of a major city.

A second key factor helping the virus spread through southern Africa is low rates of circumcision. Before European colonialists arrived, most tribes in the region removed the foreskins of teenage boys during manhood rituals. Those rites, which were discouraged by missionaries and other Westerners who regarded them as primitive, have gradually declined as the region rapidly modernized.

Dozens of studies, including three experimental trials conducted in Africa in recent years, show that circumcised men are much less likely to contract HIV because the most easily infected cells have been removed.

These factors, researchers say, explain how North Africa, where Muslim societies require circumcision and strongly discourage sex outside monogamous and polygamous marriages, has largely avoided AIDS. They also explain why the epidemic is far more severe south of the Sahara, where webs of multiple sex partners are more common, researchers say.

West Africa has been partially protected by its high rates of circumcision, but in southern and eastern Africa -- which have both low rates of circumcision and high rates of multiple sex partners -- the AIDS epidemic became the most deadly in the world.

"That's the lethal cocktail," said Harvard University epidemiologist Daniel Halperin, a former AIDS prevention adviser in Africa for the U.S. government, speaking from suburban Boston. "There's no place in the world where you have very high HIV and you don't have those two factors."No Word for 'Fidelity'

From under the broad thatched roof of Francistown's Customary Court, which handles minor crimes and misconduct, Chief Judge Ludo Margaret Mosojane had long suspected that the city's torrent of AIDS deaths flowed from its sexual culture. Each year brought more cases resulting from elaborate, overlapping relationships, she said.

"It explains why Africa is hardest hit" by AIDS, Mosojane said. "The way we contract for sex is different from how others do it."

Polygamy once was common in the region, and in some parts still is; Swaziland's king has 13 wives. In generations past, even Batswana with just one spouse rarely expected monogamy. Husbands spent months herding cattle while their wives, staying elsewhere, tended crops, Mosojane said. On his return, a husband was not to be quizzed about his activities while he was away. He also was supposed to spend his first night back in an uncle's house, giving his wife time to send off boyfriends.

In Setswana, the national language, "the word 'fidelity' does not even exist," Mosojane said.

The few checks that traditional villages had on sexual behavior dwindled during the development frenzy after 1967, when diamonds were discovered. Batswana increasingly moved to cities for school or work. Plentiful television sets delivered a flood of

DOJ_NMG_0138917

Western images, including racy soap operas and music videos featuring lightly clad women vying for the attention of wealthy, bejeweled men.

Francistown, with nearby mines, military camps and border posts overflowing with desperate refugees, changed faster than most cities. Amid the bustling malls, there was soon an unsettling concentration of young adults because so many people ages 35 to 50 had already died of AIDS complications, residents say.

Faruk Maunge, 36, a high school counselor whose dreadlocks, goatee and rectangular glasses give him a cosmopolitan air, noticed the changes when he returned from stays abroad. "They are just a lost bunch," he said. "They are very, very reckless."

Maunge said that rent, clothing, even cellphone airtime became part of implicit sexual exchanges. Men and women maintained two, three, even four regular partners. The toll was clear from the snapshots he kept in a green plastic first-aid box.

"This one is gone," Maunge said, pointing to a faded picture of a woman in a red top who was nibbling her fingernails. Moving deeper into the pile, he continued: "This one is gone, Mooketsi. And this one is gone, Themba. This one is gone, too, this one on the far left. This one is positive."

With a hint of frustration, Maunge said of one man, "He's sleeping around again." Maunge also grew irritated at a picture showing a friend with AIDS who seemed to father a child -- he was awaiting his fourth -- with every girlfriend.

Maunge said he once was reckless, too, having sex with three women in a week, sometimes without condoms. But after watching the disease kill more than 20 of his friends, he settled down with a new girlfriend and stayed faithful, he said.

"Praise God, I've been lucky," Maunge said. "It's like you have 10 bullets going through you and none hits you."The Missing Message

On a hospital wall here, not far from the AIDS clinic that Khumalo visited with his friend, the painted image of a condom shimmers like a comic-book superhero. Giant, colorful block letters declare, "CONDOMISE AND STAY ALIVE!!"

In cramped black script below, it adds, "Abstain first."

Yet rarely seen among Botswana's AIDS prevention messages is one that has worked in other African countries: Multiple sex partners kill. Dubbed "Zero Grazing" by Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni, this approach dominated in East Africa, where several countries curbed HIV rates.

Fidelity campaigns never caught on in Botswana. Instead, the country focused on remedies favored by Western AIDS experts schooled in the epidemics of America's gay community or Thailand's brothels, where condom use became so routine it slowed the spread of HIV.

These experts brought not just ideas but money, and soon billboards in Botswana touted condoms. Schoolchildren sang about them. Cadres of young women demonstrated how to roll them on. The anti-AIDS partnership between the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation and drugmaker Merck budgeted $13.5 million for condom promotion -- 25 times the amount dedicated to curbing dangerous sexual behavior.

But soaring rates of condom use have not brought down high HIV rates. Instead, they rose together, until both were among the highest in Africa.

The focus on condoms endured even after the arrival of internationally heralded "ABC" programs, named for their prescription of "Abstain, Be Faithful and Condomize." The middle concept -- fidelity -- often got lost.

The few posters advocating it in Francistown are old and torn; ads for condoms and abstinence are far more prominent. A 2004 government study measured the result: Three-quarters of Batswana surveyed knew that condoms could stop the spread of HIV. Half knew that abstinence would. Yet only one in five knew that fidelity to a single, uninfected partner prevented spreading the disease.

Another U.N. Classic (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Whenever the United Nations weighs in on human rights, our thoughts invariably turn to Lewis Carroll. A recent contretemps between U.S. diplomats and the U.N. bureaucracy takes us through the Turtle Bay looking glass again.

On the occasion of the annual meeting of the U.N.'s Commission on the Status of Women, the American delegation decided to organize a panel on the subject of "State-Sanctioned Mass Rape in Burma and Sudan." After years of reporting by human-rights organizations about atrocities committed by government forces against women in both countries, that sounds like a reasonable topic to discuss.

DOJ_NMG_0138918

Enter U.N. bureaucrat Sylvie Cohen of the Division for the Advancement of Women. Ms. Cohen refused to list the panel discussion on the U.N.'s Web site because it "would be perceived as offensive to named member states." Besides, "the name of one member state concerned is not mentioned in accordance with its official country name." That name is "Myanmar," which is what the military junta that seized power in Burma renamed the country in 1988. The Burmese democracy movement of Aung San Suu Kyi continues to call it by its rightful name, and we'll stick with her over the junta.

Even more amazing is that a U.N. organization that purports to look out for the interests of women seems more concerned about defending the sensibilities of the governments who harbor and support their rapists. Come to think of it, this isn't a Lewis Carroll episode at all. At the U.N., it's routine.

DOJ_NMG_0138919

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Australian Detainee Is Charged Under '06 Law (WP) 4
U.S. Charges Australian Detainee With Supporting Terrorism (MCT) 5
U.S. Files Charges Against Australian Citizen (AP) 6

Homeland Response:

Bush Acknowledges Gulf Coast Troubles (AP) 6
Bush Notes Frustration In Gulf Coast Recovery (NYT) 7
On Visit To Gulf Coast, Bush Hears Frustrations About Pace Of Storm Aid (WP) 8
Bush Checks In On Gulf Coast, Hears His Critics 'Loud And Clear' (LAT) 9
Bush Renews Commitment To Helping Recovery (TP) 10
Bush Visits New Orleans' Charter School (AP) 12
Bush Leaves Coast (BSH) 13
Gulf Coast's Halting Recovery Leaves Much To Be Done (USAT) 13
Experts: U.S. Unprepared For Nuclear Terror Attack (MCT) 14
Hundreds Of Incidents Reported Of Smuggling Of Nuclear Materials (MCT) 16
Punishment To Fit The Nuclear Crime (WP) 16
Civil Air Patrol Revives Role As Eyes Of Skies (WT) 17
Homeland Security Delays Federal IDs, Proposes Rules (WT) .. 18
Cost And Privacy Concerns Cited In New Rules For Driver's Licenses (WP) 19
Federal Requirement For Tamper-Proof Licenses Will Raise Fees For Drivers By 2013 (NYT) 19
FEDERAL DIARY: Hoyer Makes Good On Health-Care Promise (WP) 20
Ground Zero Victims (opinion) (NYT) 21

War News:

House Democrats Set To Retreat From Effort To Cap Troop Levels (WSJ) 22
Democrats Split Over Iraq War Funding (CSM) 23
Democrats Want Troops Out If Goals Unmet (AP) 24
Some Lawmakers Want To Fund Civilian Projects Through War Bill (WP) 25
Fed's Bernanke Wins Praise For Reply To Sliding Markets (WSJ) 25
Senate Democrats Vow To Confront Bush On Iraq But Are Still Working Out The Details (NYT) 26
GOP Regroups To Foil War Plans Of Democrats (WT) 27
Panetta Dismayed By Party's War Debate (WT) 28
Vice President Says U.S. Troop Withdrawal From Iraq Could Worsen War In Afghanistan, Elsewhere (WP/AP) 29
Baghdad Sees Day With Little Bloodshed (USAT/AP) 30
Pentagon Stays Cautious But Sees Progress In Iraq (AFP) 30
Iraq's Displaced Trickle Home (LAT) 31
'Surge' Needs Up To 7,000 More Troops (USAT) 33
7 At A Baghdad Wedding Are Killed By A Car Bomb (NYT) 33
Iraqi Troops, Tribesmen Kill 50 Suspected Insurgents (WP) 34
New Signs Of US-Syria Thaw As Senior Official Sets Visit (AFP) 35
Vietnamese Refugees Identify With Iraqis (USAT) 35
How Much Embassy Is Too Much? (WP) 36
Turkey Late To Wish Talabani Well (WT) 37
Pakistan Captures Former Taliban Official (LAT) 38
Pressed By U.S., Pakistan Seizes A Taliban Chief (NYT) 38
An Uneasy Alliance (WSJ) 39
Report: National Guard Unprepared For Domestic Missions (MCT) 40
Panel Slams Treatment Of Guard, Reserves (AP) 41
Shortages Threaten Guard's Capability (WP) 42
The Silence That Kills (NYT) 43

DOJ:

Sources: GOP Lawmakers Tried To Influence Federal Investigation (MCT) 44
Wilson, Domenici Won't Answer Questions About U.S. Attorney's Firing (ALBTRIB) 45
House Democrats Vote To Subpoena Fired U.S. Attorneys (AP) 47
House Panel Subpoenas Fired U.S. Attorneys (WP) 47
House Panel Subpoenas 4 Prosecutors Of 8 Ousted (NYT) 48
House Panel Subpoenas Ousted U.S. Attorneys (LAT) 49
Democrats Demanding Fired U.S. Prosecutors Testify (Update1) (BLOOM) 50
U.S. Attorney Leaves Office With No Word On Successor (LVS) 51
Bogden Questions Reason For Ouster (LVRJ) 52
Reddit Ashcroft Cancels Pizza Party For Ex-Colleagues (USNEWS) 53

Corporate Scandals:

Gonzales: 'Protecting Integrity Of Business' A Top Priority (SDDT) 54
13 Charged In Big Insider Trading Scam (WP) 55

Feds Charge 13 With Inside Trading (USAT) ... 56
13 Accused Of Trading As Insiders (NYT) ... 57
A 'Brazen' Insider Scheme Revealed (WSJ) ... 58
US Charges 13 With Insider Trading (FT) ... 60
Investigators Say They've Uncovered $15-million Insider-trading Plot (LAT) ... 60
Two Lawyers, 11 Others Indicted For Roles In Insider Trading (LAW) ... 61
US Busts Wall St. Insider Trading 'Ring' That Pocketed Millions (AFP) ... 62
Judge Rejects SEC Suit Against Former Citigroup Execs (LAW) 63
Omnicom Ex-Executive May Aid In Suit (WSJ) ... 64
Once Again, Nortel Says It Must Restate Its Financial Results (NYT) ... 65
Executives At Brokerage Leave Amid Investigation (BSUN) ... 66
Democrats Unveil Bill For CEO Pay Vote (FT) ... 67

Criminal Law:

Libby Verdict Said To Be Unlikely This Week (NYT) ... 68
Jurors In Libby Case Allowed To Leave Deliberations Early (WP) 68
Libby Jury Seems To Be Settling In (LAT/AP) ... 69
Study Draft Decries Execution Appeals Process (USAT) ... 69
Inmate Asks For Immediate Execution (AP) ... 70
State, Feds Vow To Chase Predators (KENPOST) ... 70
U.S. Man Accused In Double Kidnapping Charged With Child Pornography (AP) ... 71
Hired Truck Figure's Son Prison-bound (CHIT) ... 71
Former Developer Of Wisconsin Casino Indicted (CHIT) ... 71
11 Youths Arrested In Gang Stabbings (WP) ... 72
Trial Opens In Case Of Convicted Sex Offender Accused In Murder Of 9-Year-Old Florida Girl (NYT) ... 73
Exclusive | Gang Tied To Killing Of Toddler (TSSC) ... 74
Baltimore Man Indicted In Alleged 'Ponzi' Scheme (AP) ... 76
Feds: Man Bilked 900, Including Katrina Victims, In Ponzi Scheme (BALTOEX) ... 77
Probes Exposing Trenton Tradition (PHI) ... 77
U.S. Attorney Says Corruption Fight Goes On (AP) ... 78
Alleged Madam Threatens To Sell List Of 10,000 Clients (WP) . 79
Escort Business Owner Indicted (WT) ... 80
2 Consecutive Life Sentences In Murder Of Racing Icon, Wife (LAT) ... 81

Civil Rights:

Local Officials Have Not Heard From FBI About Civil Rights Cases (MONNST) ... 82
EDITORIAL: Focusing On Cold Cases (NOTP) ... 83
Bending Toward Justice, Finally (BN) ... 83
Navy Chaplain Is Discharged (NYT) ... 84
Bush Administration's Quiet Campaign Against Religious Bias (TENN) ... 84

Antitrust:

EU Threatens Microsoft With New Fines (WSJ) ... 85
Brussels Threatens Microsoft With Further Antitrust Fines (FT) . 86
EU Threatens New Fines Against Microsoft For Not Abiding By Antitrust Ruling (AP) ... 86
Brussels Needs More Time To Rule On Sony BMG (FT) ... 87
Icahn's Move On Motorola Lifts Stock (FT) ... 88
China Builds Commerce Codes (WSJ) ... 88
Legal Makeover To Underpin China's Market-Driven Economy (WSJ) ... 89
Political Energies (WSJ) ... 91
XM-Sirius Merger Provides Little Airtime For Antitrust Issues (DEAL) ... 91
FTC Clears Carlyle's Philosophy Buy (AP) ... 92
FTC Clears Purchase Of Mirant Plants (AP) ... 92
FCC Sides With Cable Phone Firms (USAT) ... 92
FCC Grants Internet Phone Access (WP/BLOOM) ... 93
Oracle Adds Business-Intelligence Firm Hyperion (WSJ) ... 93
Oracle To Buy Hyperion Solutions In $3.3 Billion Deal (USAT) .. 94
$8.6 Billion Acquisition Of Qantas OK'd (AP) ... 95
Qantas Buy-out Plan Clears Hurdle (FT) ... 95

Environment:

Md. To Investigate Dumping On Site In Rural Montgomery (WP) 96
The Climate-Change Precipice (WP) ... 97
Uncle Sam's Greenhouse Gases (WSJ) ... 98

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds Target Gang Gun Connection (CHIT) ... 98
Officials Break Up Gunrunning Operation (JCL) ... 100
Weapons Crackdown Nets Feds 19 Arrests (AP) ... 100
Feds Charge 19 In Mississippi Gun Pipeline (CHIST) ... 100
19 Arrested In Gun-running Ring (WLS) ... 101
FBI Bust Up Mid-South "gunrunning Operation" (WMC) ... 102
Gun Trafficking Leads To Arrests (DMISS) ... 102
U.S. Marshals Official Accused Of Misspending Security Funds (USAT) ... 103
Office Specified Where Marshals Money Was To Go (USAT) .. 103
Subject Of Explosives Probe Left Homeless, Lawyer Says (MINNST) ... 104
Task Force To Pursue Local Gangs (WT) ... 105
Meet The FBI's 'Best Undercover Agent' (NYSUN) ... 106
4 West Suburban Men Are Held In U.S. Drug-trafficking Probe (CHIT) ... 107
A Wider Front In Doping Battle (WP) ... 108
Killing Highlights Risk Of Selling Marijuana, Even Legally (NYT) 109
US Cites Failure Of Countries In Drug Fight (AP) ... 111
Mexico Prevails As Drug War Ally (WT) ... 111
Report on Poppy (HT) ... 112
Afghan Opium Output Reaches Record; Drug Trade Aids Taliban (BLOOM) ... 113
US: Venezuelan Situation Favors Illicit Drug Traffic (EU) ... 114
Report Looks At Cocaine Trade (USAT) ... 114
Report Slams Venezuela For Drug Trafficking (MCT) ... 114
Mail Bomb Suspect Eludes, Baffles Cops (FREEP/AP) ... 116
Man Takes Plea Bargain In Bomb Case (MR) ... 116

Immigration:

Bipartisan Opinions Sought On Immigration (WT) ... 116
The Path To Citizenship (NYT) ... 117
Colorado's Immigration Policy Backfires (LAT) ... 118

DOJ_NMG_0138921

Tax:

SEC Scrutinises Google's Tax Methods (FT) 118

Congress-Administration:

Army Fires Commander Of Walter Reed (WP) 119
Chief Of Walter Reed Hospital Fired Over Troop Treatment (LAT) 120
Army Removes Chief Of Walter Reed Hospital (USAT/AP)..... 121
General Is Fired Over Conditions At Walter Reed (NYT)..... 121
Head Of US Military Hospital Dismissed (FT)..... 123
Freshman Senator Takes Lead On Hot Controversy (MCT)..... 123
Not 'A Good-News Story' (WP)..... 125
Rice Names Critic Of Iraq Policy To Counselor's Post (WP)..... 125
House Eases Rules On Union Organizing (AP) 126
House Vote On Organizing Workers First Of Many Labor Battles (WSJ) 127
House Passes Bill That Helps Unions Organize (NYT)..... 128
House Bill Would Aid Union Organization (USAT) 128
Bill Easing Organization Of Unions Passes House (WP)..... 129
House Backs Bill To Ease Unionizing (WT)..... 129
House OKs Bill Making It Easier To Form A Union (LAT) 130
Checkmate (WSJ)..... 132
Bush Picks Executive As Consumer Watchdog (LAT)..... 133
Kerry Getting Some Payback For Swift Boat Campaign Of '04 (NYT) 134
A Tug Of War On Presidential Papers' Release (WP) 134
Cheney Rallies His Base With A Fiery Speech (WT) 135
Conservatives Irate At Current Crop Of Presidential Candidates (BOS) 135
Bush Brings Fundraising Gold For GOP (LAT) 136
Poll Shows Bush Is Losing Support Of Republicans (NYT) 137
Music Of The Spheres (WP)..... 137

Other News:

A Steadier Day For Stock Markets, But A Sense Of Unease Lingers (NYT)..... 138
Stocks Take 34-Point Dip After Early Plunge (WSJ)..... 140
Investors May Need To Keep Dow Tumble In Perspective (USAT) 140
Stock Market Settles Down After Another Sharp Sell-Off (WP) 141
Manufacturing Shows Some Vigor (WSJ) 142
Paulson Sees 'healthy' Outlook For US (FT)..... 143
Clouds Added To Many Economic Forecasts (WP)..... 144
Greenspan Now Says Economic Slowdown Isn't 'Probable' (WSJ) 145
Greenspan Is Still Able To Move Markets (NYT)..... 146
The Big Meltdown (NYT)..... 147
Most Support U.S. Guarantee Of Health Care (NYT) 148
McCain And Obama In Deal On Public Financing (NYT)..... 149
McCain Ups The Ante Over Campaign Finance (POL)..... 150
McCain May Opt Out Of Financing System (EX) 151
Analysis: High Hurdles Set Before McCain (AP) 152
Senators Regret Remarks On Troops (NYT) 153
McCain Apologizes For Gaffe On Troops (WT)..... 153
Anyone But McCain, Santorum Says (POL)..... 154
FEC Rules On Presidential Campaign Funding (CHIT) 155
Panel Upholds Obama Funding Request (FT) 156
Obama Ruling Could Prove Moot, Backfire (POL) 156
Saving The System (WP)..... 157
At Site Of '65 March, An '08 Collision (WP)..... 158
Bill Clinton To Join Wife In Alabama (AP)..... 159
A New Twist To An Intriguing Family History (BSUN)..... 159
Romney Assails Rivals On National Issues (AP) 161
Giuliani Leads In Spartanburg County Straw Poll (CCT)..... 162
Selective School Choice (WSJ) 162
Washington: Impeachment Resolution Urged (NYT) 163
Latest Reports On Iran And North Korea Show A Newfound Caution Among Analysts (NYT)..... 163
Analysis: U.S. Intel On Nukes In Doubt (AP)..... 165
Problems At The Parks? But How? (WP)..... 166
A Suddenly Convenient Truth (NYT) 167
Another Intelligence Twist (WP)..... 168
Uranium Do-Over (WSJ)..... 168
Come Clean On North Korea (LAT)..... 169
N. Korea Reasserts Pledge To Denuclearize (WP/AP)..... 170
N. Korea Again Pledges To End Nuke Program (WT/AP) 170
U.S., North Korea Soften Their Stances (WSJ)..... 171
Macao Signals Release Of Funds (FT) 172
U.S. Claims On North Korea Come Under Scrutiny (MCT)..... 172
Progress Made On Possible Iran Sanctions (AP)..... 174
China Urges Iran To Return To Nuke Talks (AP)..... 174
Iran And Saudis Plan Summit Talks On Crises (NYT) 175
Iran's President To Visit Saudi Arabia (AP) 176
Democrats Move To Require Approval Before Any Strike On Iran (MCT)..... 177
Inside The Beltway (WT)..... 178
Report Slams Venezuela For Drug Trafficking (MCT)..... 179
Report Looks At Cocaine Trade (USAT) 180
Embassy Row (WT)..... 180
U.S. Wants Missile Radar In Caucasus (AP) 181
Tymoshenko Seeks Early Elections (WT) 181
US Deputy Secretary Of State Starts Asia Tour (AFP) 182
China Expands Sub Fleet (WT)..... 183
Beijing Likens Cheney Criticism To Nosy Neighbor (WT) 184
A Cry To Limit Chinese Imports Rings At Paper Mill (NYT) 185
U.S., Brazil Plan Ethanol Partnership (USAT)..... 187
Report: Pakistan Nabs Key Taliban Insurgent (USAT)..... 188
Continental Divide: U.S. Stirs Debate Over Africa Bank (WSJ) 188
Speeding HIV's Deadly Spread (WP)..... 190
Another U.N. Classic (WSJ)..... 192

DOJ_NMG_0138922

TERRORISM NEWS:

Australian Detainee Is Charged Under '06 Law (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Pentagon officials announced yesterday that David M. Hicks, an Australian detainee in U.S. custody for more than five years, will face two counts of providing material support for terrorism, the first time anyone has been charged under the U.S. law passed last year governing military trials for some foreign terrorism suspects.

The case against Hicks marks the first use of rules established by the Military Commissions Act of 2006, enacted when Republicans controlled Congress and after the U.S. Supreme Court struck down earlier rules for the military trials.

Some Democrats, with their party now in control of Congress, have been outspoken about wanting to revamp the Military Commissions Act to provide suspects with more rights and to eliminate the use of evidence obtained through coercion. Sens. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) have introduced legislation that would restore the rights of detainees such as Hicks to challenge their detentions via habeas corpus petitions. A federal appeals court in Washington recently ruled that such challenges are prohibited.

The filing of charges could also prompt Hicks's attorneys to initiate a legal challenge of the law. Defense attorneys for a group of foreign nationals at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, including Hicks, have filed lawsuits stating that the law's provisions are unconstitutional, but they recently lost at the appellate level.

The detainees' lawyers said they plan to file a petition Monday for an expedited Supreme Court hearing. Another Guantanamo detainee, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, filed a petition with the Supreme Court this week alleging that the Military Commissions Act is unconstitutional.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who has long supported the Military Commissions Act, said yesterday that he believes that Hicks will receive a fair trial and that if he is found guilty, the U.S. judicial system will properly review the commissions process as part of an automatic appeal.

"After four years of starts and stops, I am pleased to see this trial is going forward," Graham said. "Mr. Hicks deserves his day in court."

A defense official familiar with the military commissions said yesterday that the department expects legal challenges but will go ahead with a mandated arraignment of Hicks within 30 days.

Australian officials have protested the length of Hicks's captivity without trial and have been pressing the United States to try him swiftly and send him back to Australia to serve any sentence. Prime Minister John Howard said he raised the issue with Vice President Cheney when Cheney visited Australia last week.

U.S. officials said last year that they would be willing to transfer Hicks to Australia after he faces a military commission, and the entreaties by a close ally could have spurred U.S. officials to move his case forward.

Hicks, 31, a former kangaroo skinner, is among 10 Guantanamo detainees who were designated to face military commissions in 2004, before legal challenges stopped the process. He is not accused of crimes related to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States or of having attacked U.S. troops or anyone else.

"The first thing out of the chute has nothing to do with 9/11, and I think that raises a lot of questions," said Jumana Musa of Amnesty International. "Is this a practice military commission?"

Susan J. Crawford, the convening authority for the military commissions, referred two charges of providing support to terrorist groups against Hicks but did not find probable cause for a charge of attempted murder levied against him by military prosecutors.

According to charging documents, Hicks spent 1999 through 2001 working and training with extremist groups in the Balkans, Pakistan and Afghanistan before joining up with al-Qaeda. Military prosecutors wrote that Hicks provided information to his captors that linked him to conversations with Osama bin Laden and to several training camps in Afghanistan.

Hicks allegedly "collected intelligence on the American Embassy" in Kabul in 2001, and after the Sept. 11 attacks he went to Kandahar, Afghanistan, where he received an AK-47 rifle and guarded a tank as U.S. forces began their bombing campaign, according to charging documents.

Military prosecutors allege that Hicks later traveled to Kunduz, Afghanistan, and joined al-Qaeda, the Taliban and others "on the frontline outside the city for two hours" before trying to escape to Pakistan in a taxi.

Also yesterday, officials transferred five more detainees out of the Guantanamo Bay detention facility, sending two to Afghanistan and three to Tajikistan. That raises the total released or transferred to about 390. Another 385 remain.

DOJ_NMG_0138923

U.S. Charges Australian Detainee With Supporting Terrorism (MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

The Pentagon on Thursday formally accused an Australian citizen being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, with a single charge of providing material support for terrorism, setting the stage for the first military trial of a terrorism suspect under legislation that Congress passed last year.

The charge alleges that David Hicks, 31, a onetime Outback cowboy and kangaroo skinner, was in league with al-Qaida at the time of the U.S. invasion in 2001, had met with al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and had joined Taliban and al-Qaida supporters who were fighting U.S.-allied forces outside Kunduz, Afghanistan, during combat Nov. 9, 2001.

Hicks fled the fighting with bullets flying overhead as U.S.-allied tanks roared through trenches, the charges claim, and was captured as he was attempting to flee to Pakistan.

Under new procedures, which Congress approved after the Supreme Court ruled that an earlier Pentagon trial scheme was illegal, Hicks must be arraigned within 30 days. His trial must be within 90 days after that, meaning his case will go before a military commission by July.

It would be the first U.S. war-crimes trial since World War II.

The decision to charge Hicks only with supporting al-Qaida was something of a surprise. Prosecutors initially also had charged him with attempted murder, alleging that he had directed "small arms fire, explosives or other means and methods with the intent to kill diverse persons."

But that charge was crossed out on the official charge sheet by Susan J. Crawford, a former chief of the military appeals-court system whom Defense Secretary Robert Gates recently put in charge of the commission's process.

The Pentagon offered no explanation why the charge was dropped, merely releasing the original charge sheets with a bold pen stroke across the attempted murder section, accompanied by Crawford's handwritten initials and Thursday's date.

Hicks' defense attorney, Marine Maj. Dan Mori, slammed the prosecution, charging that Hicks had been held for five years at Guantanamo on "made-up offenses."

"David has been charged with only one offense: material support of terrorism," Mori said. "Such a charge has never existed in the laws of war."

Other international law experts also questioned the charge.

"If he's not in a foreign army, not in a uniform, simply a guy who has shown up with an AK-47 and starts taking potshots at us, he's not a foreign combatant. He's a common criminal. You don't try him in a military commission," said Michael Byers, a professor of international law at the University of British Columbia in Canada.

Byers, who has taught at law schools in the United States, Israel and South Africa, said the Bush administration sought to create a third kind of justice for alleged al-Qaida terrorists that didn't exist under international law or existing U.S. military or civilian law.

"If you were a prisoner of war who had violated the laws of war, then you could be charged with a war crime," he said. "And if you were a civilian who had attempted to kill someone you could be charged with murder; and this middle category simply didn't exist."

Hicks is among the best-known captives at the remote U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba, in part because his five-year detention without trial has stirred controversy in human rights circles in his homeland, a staunch war-on-terrorism ally of the Bush administration.

The eight-page charge sheet casts him as an illegitimate warrior trying to repel the 2001 U.S. invasion that toppled the Taliban and routed al-Qaida in reprisal for the 9-11 attacks.

It describes the Christian-born Hicks as a globe-trotting convert to Islam who fought as a member of the Kosovo Liberation Army in the Balkans before traveling to Pakistan in 1999, where he joined a terrorist organization known as the Army of the Righteous or Army of the Pure.

It says he traveled to Afghanistan in 2001, where he attended al-Qaida training camps, stayed in a residence that also housed shoe-bomber Richard Reid and met al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden, to whom he complained about a lack of English-language training materials.

At one point during the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, the charge sheet alleges, Hicks was issued an AK-47 rifle and he guarded a tank.

Later, near Kunduz, he allegedly spent two hours on the front line before it collapsed and was forced to flee. During the retreat, Hicks saw "bullets flying and (U.S. ally) Northern Alliance tanks coming over the trenches." Also present at that battle was American John Walker Lindh, who's now in a U.S. prison.

DOJ_NMG_0138924

Hicks has been at remote Guantanamo since the prison camp was established in January 2002, in a crude compound called Camp X-Ray.

The Pentagon offered no explanation on why it charged Hicks first.

The chief prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, last month recommended charges against three captives: Hicks, Canadian Omar Khadr, 20, and Yemeni Salim Hamdan, 36, bin Laden's onetime driver in Kandahar, Afghanistan.

It was Hamdan's Navy defense lawyer who successfully challenged the first war-crimes court format all the way to the Supreme Court.

U.S. Files Charges Against Australian Citizen (AP)

By Anne Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 2, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The United States has filed charges against David Hicks, an Australian citizen suspected of aiding the Taliban in Afghanistan and the first terrorism-war era detainee to be charged by the Defense Department under new rules for military commissions.

The decision was made even though officials of Australia already had asked the United States not to bring such charges. Australia has been a steadfast ally to the Bush administration in fighting terrorism.

Hicks is a former kangaroo skinner captured in Afghanistan in December 2001. He has been held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for more than five years without trial.

According to government officials and documents, the Defense Department will announce that Hicks is being charged with "providing material support for terrorism." Hicks would be have a trial in a special military tribunal, established in a law that Congress passed last year, rather than a civilian court. Opponents have vowed to challenge the constitutionality of the military tribunal proceedings.

An earlier formulation of such military tribunals was declared unconstitutional last year by the Supreme Court.

Hicks' legal status has been a sore spot for Australia. Last month, nearly half the members of Australia's Parliament signed a letter to the U.S. Congress appealing for help repatriating him.

The topic was also discussed this month in a meeting between Vice President Dick Cheney and Australian Prime Minister John Howard. Under growing public pressure, and with elections due later this year, Howard has begun pushing U.S. officials to deal with Hicks' case more quickly.

Last year, the Supreme Court said that the court system in place at the time for these detainees was illegal and violated international agreements on the treatment of military prisoners.

In the fall, Congress passed a law that outlined the rules for trying terrorism suspects; the system is intended to protect classified information and provides detainees with fewer rights than civilian or military courts.

According to a Pentagon official, who asked not to be identified because the announcement had not been made, the military is expected to file charges soon against another nine detainees.

Once formal charges are filed, a timetable requires preliminary hearings within 30 days and the start of a jury trial within 120 days at Guantanamo Bay, where nearly 400 men are held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Acknowledges Gulf Coast Troubles (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, March 2, 2007

President Bush on Thursday acknowledged the deep frustration of Hurricane Katrina victims and said the federal government shares the blame for the slow recovery of the Gulf Coast.

He gave residents of the battered region a message: "The federal government still knows you exist."

In stops across coastal Mississippi and Louisiana, Bush defended the federal allotment of $110 billion in relief aid. Of that total, less than half has been spent.

"If it is stuck because of unnecessary bureaucracy, our responsibility at the federal, state and local level is to unstick it," Bush said at Samuel J. Green Charter School, which recovered from flooding.

In his first visit to the region in six months, Bush sought to fight the perception that those whose lives were devastated by the August 2005 storm had fallen off his agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0138925

The Bush administration's initial response to the most destructive natural disaster in U.S. history was widely seen as a failure.

And the president is still dogged by criticism. Democratic lawmakers are pushing for more action.

"I committed to the people of this part of the world and the Gulf Coast that the federal government would fund recovery — and stay committed to the recovery," Bush said during his 14th trip to the region. It was his first visit since the one-year anniversary of the storm.

Much of New Orleans outside the tourist areas remains in shambles. Violent crime has soared and health care is limited. Many residents are thinking of getting out for good.

On the outskirts of the French Quarter, Bush had lunch at Li'l Dizzy's Cafe with Louisiana officials. Sitting next to him was New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who has been outspoken in demanding a better federal response. Bush later lauded Nagin as a strong-willed leader.

Exasperated officials from the region said it was telling that Katrina did not get a mention in Bush's State of the Union speech in January.

"If you don't get New Orleans straight, the United States will never be the same," said Wayne Baquet, who owns the cafe where Bush ate. It was flooded and looted during Katrina.

Baquet said he worried the nation no longer was paying attention to New Orleans. "Everybody ought to be on the bandwagon trying to get New Orleans back," he said. "Everybody."

In Washington, some Democrats criticized Bush for not intervening more often.

"Long-term recovery for the Gulf Coast requires a whole lot more than 18 months of empty promises," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee. "Businesses that were once the heart of the Gulf Coast economy are now hanging on by a thread."

Kerry said legislation offering tax breaks to encourage businesses to build or expand in areas hit by hurricane was a good first step. But, he said, the government's disaster loan program needs to be overhauled, fixing problems that have prevented businesses from getting timely financial assistance.

At the charter school, Bush delighted math and science students by popping into their classes. They didn't mind the interruption and raced to his side for group photos.

Bush began his trip in Mississippi by touring five homes in a Long Beach neighborhood. He gave an American flag to Ernie and Cheryl Woodward, who rebuilt their home with the help of a federal grant.

"People's lives are improving, and there is hope," he said.

Bush got a friendly reception as he walked from house to house in the southern Mississippi neighborhood.

"Staying busy?" he asked a construction crew. One of the workers told him the crew was still working on the same block of the neighborhood a year and a half after the storm.

The federal official overseeing recovery efforts said Katrina's damage was so vast that it was hard to estimate when the recovery will be completed. Of $110 billion in relief aid that Congress has approved, $86 billion has been committed to projects, and $53 billion has been spent.

"We all have a sense of urgency," Don Powell, Bush's coordinator for the Gulf Coast recovery, told reporters on Air Force One.

"But I think it's important to put it in perspective about the size of the storm, and how overwhelming this storm was," Powell said. "I think there's been some good progress."

Bush Notes Frustration In Gulf Coast Recovery (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, March 1 — President Bush acknowledged on Thursday that many Gulf Coast residents remained frustrated with the slowness of rebuilding after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, but said, “Times are changing for the better.”

On a trip inspecting new housing rising from the rubble in Mississippi and Louisiana, Mr. Bush visited homeowners, met local officials and promised to speed the recovery of areas flooded 18 months ago by the hurricanes.

It was Mr. Bush’s 14th trip to the Gulf Coast since Hurricane Katrina made landfall on Aug. 29, 2005.

At his first stop in New Orleans, Mr. Bush had lunch with state and local officials at Li’l Dizzy’s Café on the outskirts of the French Quarter. In brief remarks before the meal, Mr. Bush noted concerns about the rebuilding delays.

“I fully understand that there are frustrations, and I want to know the frustrations,” he said. “To the extent we can help, we’ll help.”

DOJ_NMG_0138926

Earlier in Long Beach, Miss., near Gulfport and Biloxi, Mr. Bush joined Gov. Haley Barbour in a walking tour of houses that had been rebuilt with help from the federal government under the Community Development Block Grant program.

Though some members of Congress from both parties have said the federal government should do more to accelerate the recovery, Mr. Bush said he was impressed and inspired by the progress he saw.

But at a meeting with local officials in Biloxi, he said: "I fully understand that there's still work to be done. There's a continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times."

Wayne M. Baquet, owner of Li'l Dizzy's restaurant, said: "It's great that the president came to New Orleans. It's great that he's addressing the problems here. We may have 10,000 people living in trailers. That's ridiculous."

Business is good, said Mr. Baquet, brother of Dean Baquet, who was recently named Washington bureau chief of The New York Times.

"We need the middle class back," Mr. Baquet said. "We lost a lot of our middle class."

On his first visit after the storm in 2005, the president recalled, he saw "piles of rubble, literally debris stacked upon debris."

Mr. Bush said he had always had faith that he would see houses being built on the storm-battered coast.

"The federal government's role has been to write checks," he said, and the role of state officials is "to expedite the federal money to the local folks."

Mr. Bush said: "I told the people that I would work with Congress to write a $110 billion check for the people of Louisiana and Mississippi, and that check has been written. Now it's incumbent upon us to get the money into people's hands."

State and local officials, particularly in Louisiana, have been criticized for not transferring federal rebuilding money into the hands of homeowners more quickly.

Sometimes, Mr. Bush said, "it's hard to see progress when you're living close to the scene." But as a visitor, he said, he detects a resurgence, a renewal, because "the spirit of the people down here is strong."

Mississippians said their recovery had been hindered by the high cost of insurance for residential and commercial structures and by the need to raise buildings onto piers or stilts to comply with federal construction standards in flood zones.

Some elected officials saw Mr. Bush's trip as an effort to make amends for the fact that he said nothing about the recovery in his State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

"It was a glaring omission," said Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, who stayed in Washington for Senate business. "Much of the vast devastation left by Katrina and Rita remains, and the job of recovery is far from finished."

One purpose of the trip, Mr. Bush said, was "to tell the people here in the Gulf Coast that we still think about them in Washington." Another purpose, he said, was to show taxpayers "what their money has done to help revitalize" the region.

Nellie Partridge, 84, was sitting on her porch in Long Beach when Mr. Bush arrived. "There's no telling who's going to show up," Mr. Bush said as he arrived with Mr. Barbour.

Ms. Partridge hugged the president and told him that he was "one of my favorite people."

Mr. Bush said Washington had "obligated," or made available for specific purposes, $86 billion of the $110 billion but that just $53 billion had been spent.

"There is money in the pipeline," Mr. Bush said. "If it is stuck because of unnecessary bureaucracies, our responsibility at the federal, state and local level is to unstick it."

Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator of Gulf Coast rebuilding, was asked about the pace. "We all have a sense of urgency," Mr. Powell said. He noted progress like children in school, "help wanted" signs and open hotels and restaurants.

On Visit To Gulf Coast, Bush Hears Frustrations About Pace Of Storm Aid (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, March 1 -- In his first visit to the Gulf Coast in six months, President Bush said Thursday that he heard "loud and clear" the growing complaints in the region that the federal response to Hurricane Katrina has become ensnared in red tape.

But in a trip designed to highlight the progress made in the 18 months since the hurricane devastated New Orleans and the Mississippi coast, the president insisted that "people's lives are improving and there is hope."

As billions of federal dollars have sat in state accounts untapped in part because of complex federal rules, Louisiana officials in particular have become vocal about what they called the Bush administration's wavering interest in the rebuilding process. The frustration came to a boil when Bush did not mention Katrina during his State of the Union address, prompting Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) to observe that the "the pains of the hurricane are yesterday's news in Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0138927

After a meeting with state and local officials in Biloxi, Miss., Thursday, Bush said he had listened as the officials described their "continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times. It's important for me to hear that."

In Washington, House Democrats renewed their own criticism of the administration. They promised to move legislation -- which has not been endorsed by Bush -- to forgive some federal loans to disaster-wracked communities while easing matching fund requirements tied to some federal aid.

"Hurricane Katrina was a natural disaster, compounded by a man-made disaster. It is now 18 months past time to get our response right," said a statement signed by Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (Md.) and Majority Whip James E. Clyburn (S.C.).

Bush's trip, his 14th since Katrina, was a continuation of his attempts to undo the political damage caused by the storm, which proved to be a pivotal event in his presidency. The federal government's bungled response to the disaster undermined the administration's claim to competence and helped propel Bush's approval ratings downward.

In the days after Katrina hit, thousands of residents in New Orleans were forced to rooftops and to fetid, ill-equipped shelters to escape the rising floodwaters, even as federal disaster officials insisted things were under control.

A little more than two weeks after Katrina made its landfall on Aug. 29, 2005, Bush stood in historic Jackson Square and promised to rebuild this shattered city and the rest of the Gulf Coast with "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen."

Things have since moved at a frustratingly slow pace -- particularly in the New Orleans area -- despite $110 billion in federal money set aside for storm recovery and the president's repeated visits.

The federal government has overseen the repair of 220 miles of levees and floodwalls, and is working to make the storm-protection system stronger than it was before Katrina, a project that should be completed in 2010.

However, only 45 percent of the pre-Katrina population of New Orleans has returned to the city, which, while slowly improving, remains a shadow of its former self: only 40 percent of the food establishments, 30 percent of the child care centers and 17 percent of the buses are back in business, according to a January report by the Brookings Institution. The Louisiana-run Road Home program, which provides rebuilding grants to homeowners who had inadequate storm insurance, has sent checks to 2,718 hurricane victims as of Wednesday, despite having received more than 110,000 applications and having federal funding of more than $7.5 billion in the bank.

Officials said the pace of the program is now increasing. "We are seeing at the pinnacle of the program where things are now starting to happen more quickly," said Gentry Brann, communications director for ICF International, the Virginia-based firm hired to administer the program.

Local residents have also complained about a shortage of low-income housing, as the Bush administration has been reluctant to rebuild the city's decrepit and previously crime-ridden public housing projects, instead favoring lower-density, mixed-income housing.

Before meeting with Louisiana officials at a New Orleans restaurant today, Bush again vowed to see through the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast until the job is done. "I committed to the people of this part of the world and the Gulf Coast that the federal government would fund the recovery and stay committed to the recovery," he said.

Federal and state officials have blamed one another for the problems with the crucial program. Federal officials point out that it was set up by the state and that the federal money is in place to be given to storm victims. State and program officials, meanwhile, blame complex federal regulations aimed at preventing fraud for much of the delay.

"It needs to speed up. Things are moving too slow," said Donald E. Powell, the president's Gulf Coast recovery coordinator. Still, given the sheer size of the recovery effort, he said, "expectations need to be realistic. This was a terrible, terrible storm. It is going to take some time."

Bush Checks In On Gulf Coast, Hears His Critics 'Loud And Clear' (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — Stung by criticism that he and his administration had neglected the hurricane-tattered Gulf Coast, President Bush on Thursday made his first visit to the region in six months, proclaiming, "This is a hopeful day."

Bush, standing in a muddy lot near new homes in Long Beach, Miss., said: "Part of the reason I've come down is to tell people here in the Gulf Coast that we still think about them in Washington…. Times are changing for the better, and people's lives are improving. And there is hope."

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, which hit Aug. 29, 2005, the administration was criticized for its slow response. Reports issued by Congress, interest groups and even the White House said delays hindered rescue and recovery efforts in New Orleans and elsewhere on the Gulf Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0138928

In January, Bush was criticized for not mentioning the devastation in his State of the Union address.

House Democratic leaders said in a statement ahead of Bush's Gulf Coast visit: "Hurricane Katrina was a natural disaster, compounded by a man-made disaster. It is now 18 months past time to get our response right."

Administration officials said the criticism was misdirected.

"I think there's been lots of progress over the last 18 months," said Don Powell, the administration's Gulf Coast recovery coordinator. "Children are in school. 'Help wanted' signs are up. The port is 100% back. Restaurants are open."

He added: "Is there more to be done? Absolutely."

Bush has made 14 trips to the region since the hurricane. Most were in the first two months after the disaster, in which damage estimates reached $100 billion or more. He last visited the area in August, to mark the storm's anniversary.

On Thursday, Bush made four stops in Mississippi and Louisiana. At the Samuel J. Green Charter School in New Orleans, he visited third- and fifth-grade students and posed for photos.

He called the school "a bright spot," a sign that life was returning to normal in the city.

"I'm here to herald success — success for today and, equally important, success for the future of this important city," Bush told a crowd in the cafeteria, where the high-water mark from flooding was visible on the walls.

Administration officials said more than 50 of New Orleans' public schools had reopened, serving about 28,000 students.

Critics said that was fewer than half of the 128 schools and 60,000-plus students in the city's two public school systems before Hurricane Katrina.

Gaining access to the $110 billion in federal money set aside for hurricane relief and recovery is a persistent point of tension between the administration and regional officials. Powell said $53 billion had been spent so far.

He said that it was the responsibility of local officials to "draw down" the funds earmarked for them, and that the administration was committed to removing any red tape.

"We're doing everything we can to speed that process," Powell said.

But Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said the administration had refused to remove a requirement that local governments provide a 10% match to receive federal funds — a figure seen as prohibitive for communities whose tax base was wiped out.

At a news conference in Washington, Landrieu said the 10% requirement had been waived for other disasters, including Hurricane Andrew in Florida in 1992 and the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in New York.

"The president can move the recovery of the Gulf Coast forward by a giant leap with a simple stroke of his pen," said Landrieu, who turned down an invitation to accompany Bush on Thursday. "I call upon the president to use his authority to do the right thing…. If he won't, I will push hard to get it done legislatively."

Bush pledged to officials on the Gulf Coast that Washington was listening and would respond.

"One of the things I've heard loud and clear is that there's a continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times," Bush said after meeting with officials in Biloxi, Miss.

Later, over lunch at Li'l Dizzy's, a New Orleans cafe that was flooded and looted after the storm, he told New Orleans officials that he would look into the possibility of waiving the 10% match for recovery assistance.

Bush Renews Commitment To Helping Recovery (TP)

By Steve Ritea

The Times Picayune, March 2, 2007

Standing in the once-flooded basement of one of New Orleans' 31 charter schools, President Bush on Thursday reiterated his commitment to help the storm-ravaged city rebuild and "break through" bureaucratic "logjams" to allow more of the federally dedicated $110 billion can begin flowing into the Gulf Coast.

With only $53 billion spent thus far, "part of the day today we talked about if the money is out the door in Washington, where is it and how come it hasn't been out farther?" he said. "And that's one of the things we're going to continue to work on, to make sure that obligated money ends up in somebody's pocket, so it helps."

In his 12th visit to the Gulf Coast since the 2005 hurricanes, Bush also took time to herald the city's innovative approach to reforming its long-failing public school system, particularly with its use of charters, public schools subject to state standards and oversight, but governed by individual boards that are given the freedom to take innovate approaches to education.

"Charter schools, to me, say innovation, individuality," he said. Even though Hurricane Katrina "did terrible devastation ... it gave a great chance for renewal. And one of the areas where renewal is most evident is in the school system of New Orleans."

Bush did not announce any plans to waive a state and local match currently required for federal aid, despite a prediction from several Louisiana officials that he would.

DOJ_NMG_0138929

After spending the morning in coastal Mississippi, Air Force One touched down at Armstrong International Airport in Kenner at approximately 12:30 p.m., after wind and rain forced his staff to abandon their original plan to fly him one state over by helicopter. The president stayed in New Orleans until about 5 p.m.

The presidential motorcade closed off Interstate 10, snaking into the city's Treme neighborhood and Lil' Dizzy's Cafe, where he and a host of local dignitaries lunch on Trout Baquet, Shrimp Grillades with Grits and the Seventh Ward Pork Chop.

Bush was joined by parish presidents from across the region, Mayor Ray Nagin, Sen. David Vitter, Rep. Bill Jefferson and Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, among others. Gov. Kathleen Blanco was returning from Germany, where she had been lobbying for a steel manufacturing plant in Louisiana.

"I fully understand that there are frustrations, and I want to know the frustrations," Bush said after sitting down at a table there. "To the extent we can help, we'll help."

City Council President Oliver Thomas, who attended the lunch, said the president "was more than receptive ... He was on point with all the issues we're dealing with."

Vitter said he and other officials spent part of the meal lobbying Bush to waive state and local matches currently required for federal aid money.

Historically, FEMA has asked state governments to pay at least 10 percent of the cost of rebuilding most public property, in an effort to establish a local stake in recovery, although the Bush administration immediately agreed to waive that requirement in New York after the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

Vitter said he's encouraged by Thursday's meeting with the President and hopes it could soon be waived for Louisiana, noting: "I think between the president and Congress, there's an excellent chance."

Nagin agreed, but was slightly less optimistic.

"I think they're seriously considering it," the mayor said. "He didn't make any commitments, but he's a good listener and hopefully it'll work out in the end."

After lunch, the president arrived at Samuel J. Green Charter School in Uptown, a block away from a group of fewer than 100 protesters waiving anti-Bush signs. At the school, he visited a fifth-grade math class and a third-grade science class. Bush complimented students on their "sharp-looking uniforms," consisting of navy polo shirts and trousers, and posed for pictures with students.

In both cases, the throng of reporters and photographers classrooms outnumbered the students.

Speaking before an audience of mostly education officials in the school's cafeteria, Bush said he'd "come back to New Orleans...to remind people that the federal government still knows you exist, still knows you have issues and wants to work with your leadership to address those issues."

The president's speech touched briefly on housing, infrastructure and crime, although the latter "really is a local responsibility," but "to the extent that we can help, we will."

Bush also promised to make the levees that failed during Katrina "stronger than ever," noting "we're making progress there," but "there's still more work to be done."

A good chunk of his speech, however, focused on education.

Bush remained upbeat on the subject, pointing out successes he perceived in the city's charter schools, but made no reference to the struggles in the state-run Recovery District, which has grappled with a lack of basic supplies, including books, at the start of the year and more recently a wait-list that stalled some 300 students for several weeks before they could be placed in classrooms.

Bush in fact recognized Recovery District Superintendent Robin Jarvis and Gaylen Picard, the wife of former state Superintendent of Education Cecil Picard, who died Feb. 15 after a long battle with Lou Gehrig's Disease.

A little more than two months after Katrina, the state Legislature voted to sweep 107 New Orleans Public Schools that were performing below the state average into the state-run Recovery District, leaving just 21 with the local system.

Today, 56 public schools are open in the city, educating about 28,000 students.

"I like a system that is willing to challenge the status quo when the status quo is failing," he said. "And one of the reasons I've come to this school is that it represents a group of citizens, including your principal and your parents and the teachers and the citizens, who said, 'We're tired of mediocrity in the school system.' It is not acceptable to have children trapped in schools that will not teach and will not change."

The President referred to about $450 million in federal funding allocated for city schools, urging local officials "to use some of the unspent money to recruit and attract teachers."

He praised Louisiana's accountability program, a component that dovetails with the federal No Child Left Behind program his administration helped pass.

Bush also acknowledged the city's Catholic schools, which "were quick to start up after the storm."

DOJ_NMG_0138930

In closing, the President likened the city's spirit to the banner season of the New Orleans Saints, which advanced to the conference championship in the team's history this past season.

"Here's a team that a lot of people didn't give much hope for ... when the season started," he said. "And it rose...(to) become a national story ... The same thing is going to happen to the city."

Bush Visits New Orleans' Charter School (AP)

By Becky Bohrer

AP, March 2, 2007

NEW ORLEANS - Calling it a bright spot in a city still going through difficult times 18 months after Hurricane Katrina, President Bush visited one of the city's 31 charter schools during a trip to New Orleans, praising local efforts to change a school system that was struggling even before the storm.

"I like a system that is willing to challenge the status quo when the status quo is failing," Bush told a receptive audience of about 150 people, including education and elected officials, at Samuel J. Green Charter School.

"I'm here to herald success," Bush said.

Critics, including teachers' union leaders, believe charters are not the way to go, saying the charter model is unproven for providing solid academic results and has created a two-tier public education system here. Advocates counter that charters, which are privately run but receive public dollars, offer parents choice, are built around accountability and are in New Orleans to stay.

Before Katrina, there were more than 120 schools in the city's public school system, which was plagued by low student test scores, neglected buildings and financial mismanagement. The state took over a handful of schools it deemed "academically unacceptable." But, after Katrina flooded 80 percent of New Orleans and shut down the city, including all schools, the state accelerated the takeover.

Now, 56 schools are open. The local school board still runs five of the best-performing schools. Twenty are run by the state and 31 by private charter groups sanctioned by state or local school authorities.

New Orleans is set to add nine charter schools for the 2007-08 term, bringing the total to 40. The city had seven charter schools authorized by the state before Katrina, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Education said.

Darryl Kilbert, superintendent of public schools in New Orleans, said Thursday he is not opposed to any education system that offers parents' choice. But, he said traditional public schools and charters should have equal accountability requirements and responsibilities. "It is too new for anything to be evaluated," Kilbert said of the charter system.

Bush's dedication to charter schools has been evident since Katrina. Charter schools in Louisiana received about $45 million from two grants given by the Bush's Department of Education after the 2005 hurricanes, to help schools reopen, and quickly, as charters, a department spokeswoman said Thursday. Most of the money from each grant went to New Orleans, she said.

On Thursday, Bush, who had earlier met with state and local officials to discuss the rate of recovery and storm-related bureaucracy, praised Green Charter School as a sign of what's working in the city. The school opened days before Katrina hit in 2005, and reopened five months later, its auditorium painted blue and green to represent the devastating floodwaters and hope for the future, principal Tony Recasner said. It now has about 350 students in grades K-8.

While charter school advocates hailed Bush's visit as a vote of confidence in the city's still-new charter system, union leader Brenda Mitchell saw it as an attack on public education and the continuation of what she described as a failed federal response to helping New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

"It's not fine here. You shouldn't pit one against the other and shouldn't come in and glorify one over the other," she said. "There isn't evidence."

A federal study released last year found fourth graders in traditional schools did better in math and reading than students in charters though a federal Education Department official at the time downplayed it as a snapshot.

Mitchell said charters have seemingly created a competition between schools and parents trying to enroll their kids in classes.

Meg Casper, a spokeswoman at the state Department of Education, said charters must pass a "rigorous" screening process and deliver results. But she said this year will be considered a baseline for student testing in all the city's public schools. Testing is set to take place in the next few weeks.

City schools, particularly those run by the state's Recovery School District, have faced significant challenges over the last year, in trying to reopen safe schools for students who continue to register for classes and in hiring enough teachers. RSD says it continues to register up to 300 students a week.

RSD, which unlike the locally-run schools and some charters, has an open enrollment policy. It it looking at opening several more schools this term and says it could open at least a dozen more schools come fall.

DOJ_NMG_0138931

Bush urged local officials to put some of the federal education aid they've received toward recruiting teachers. House Democrats, including U.S. Reps. Charlie Melancon and William Jefferson of Louisiana, have signed onto legislation to provide about $250 million over five years to help bring teachers to New Orleans and help Gulf Coast colleges and universities recover from Katrina.

Bush Leaves Coast (BSH)

By Tom Wilemon

Biloxi Sun Herald, March 2, 2007

BILOXI - Air Force One departed the Mississippi Coast at 12:24 p.m. as President Bush headed to New Orleans following visits with residents of a Long Beach neighborhood and a meeting with elected officials in Biloxi.

" I fully understand there's still work to be done, that even though progress has been made, this storm was so devastating that we have still got to stay focused on the task, and that we've got to work with the Governor and the local officials, the supervisors and the mayors, to continue to help address their needs," Bush said after the meeting with elected officials at Biloxi City Hall. "And of the things I've heard loud and clear is that there's a continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times. And therefore, it's important for me to hear that, and my friend, Don Powell, to hear that so that we can come and do what the people expect us to do, which is to respond to the needs of people in Mississippi."

Earlier, the President visited with people in a Long Beach neighborhood who have rebuilt or are rebuilding their homes with federal grant and loan money. Bush said he had come to the Coast to let people know Washington had not forgotten about them and for the U.S. taxpayers to see what their tax money had done to help areas that had been virtually wiped out.

"My most vivid recollection is the piles of rubble, literally debris stacked upon piles of debris," Bush said. "I had faith that I would come back to a house but I had trouble visualizing it."

He visited several homes in the area.

"One of the things people like to say is, 'Welcome to my home,'" he said. "It has a special ring to it here on the Gulf Coast."

It was the President's 14th visit to the Coast since the hurricane. Biloxi Mayor A.J. Holloway gave Bush a gag gift of appreciation: a personalized car tag that read "Bush 43."

"You've been to the Katrina zone 14 times in 18 months," Holloway said. "It's not that we don't like seeing you, but you've been here so many times. It's about time you had one of these. Don't leave home without it."

For more on the President's visit, check back at sunherald.com throughout the day and read the Sun Herald on Friday.

Gulf Coast's Halting Recovery Leaves Much To Be Done (USAT)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

In his first trip to the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast in six months, President Bush told residents Thursday he understood their frustrations with the glacial pace of recovery since Hurricane Katrina. What the president doesn't seem to grasp is how much his administration can do to ease that frustration.

Bush has committed $86 billion to the devastated area and visited 14 times since Katrina. Certainly there has been progress, and Bush visited some symbols of that Thursday — the rebuilt home of 84-year-old Nellie Partridge in Long Beach, Miss., and the Samuel J. Green charter school in New Orleans.

But throughout the region, and particularly in New Orleans, the lingering devastation is massive. Just about half of New Orleans' pre-Katrina population of 455,000 hasn't returned; as many as a third of residents are thinking of leaving within the next two years, according to a University of New Orleans survey. Of the nearly 109,000 Louisiana homeowners who have applied for rebuilding grants, fewer than 2,700 have received them. In Mississippi, homeowners are facing an insurance crisis that makes recovery nearly impossible.

Much of this is a state or local responsibility. But there's more Washington can do, beyond writing checks and rebuilding the Army Corps of Engineers' levees that failed:

·Louisiana has asked the federal government to waive a requirement that local governments put up 10% of the cost of rebuilding public projects. While the requirement is reasonable, many localities are broke, according to the Louisiana Recovery Authority. Further, the 10% mandate has turned the process into a bureaucratic quagmire. Bush could quickly waive it, or at least work with local officials on a backup plan they've advanced to cut through the red tape.

·The Federal Emergency Management Agency, slow to respond to Katrina in the first place, has been slow to produce new flood maps for coastal communities hit by the storm. That leaves residents uncertain about where and how to rebuild. FEMA now promises the maps will be out this summer, nearly two years after Katrina struck. Bush should be pushing the agency to do better.

DOJ_NMG_0138932

Beyond these concrete actions, the president could energize the rebuilding effort simply by putting it back in the national spotlight. Bush inexplicably failed to mention Katrina in his nationally televised State of the Union address last month. His visit Thursday brought a planeload of reporters to the Gulf Coast. Returning with the frequency he did in the first year after the disaster could boost tourism and help recruit more of the volunteers whose work has been essential to the recovery.

Eighteen months ago, when the wounds of Katrina were still fresh, Bush stood in New Orleans' historic Jackson Square and promised to "do what it takes (and) stay as long as it takes, to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives."

If that pledge is to be fulfilled, the president will have to do more of what he did Thursday and a lot more in Washington.

Experts: U.S. Unprepared For Nuclear Terror Attack (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Although the Bush administration has warned repeatedly about the threat of a terrorist nuclear attack and spent more than $300 billion to protect the homeland, the government remains ill-prepared to respond to a nuclear catastrophe.

Experts and government documents suggest that, absent a major preparedness push, the U.S. response to a mushroom cloud could be worse than the debacle after Hurricane Katrina, possibly contributing to civil disorder and costing thousands of lives.

"The United States is unprepared to mitigate the consequences of a nuclear attack," Pentagon analyst John Brinkerhoff concluded in a July 31, 2005, draft of a confidential memo to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "We were unable to find any group or office with a coherent approach to this very important aspect of homeland security. ...

"This is a bad situation. The threat of a nuclear attack is real, and action is needed now to learn how to deal with one."

Col. Jill Morgenthaler, Illinois' director of homeland security, said there's a "disconnect" between President Bush's and Vice President Dick Cheney's nuclear threat talk and the administration's actions.

"I don't see money being focused on actual response and mitigation to a nuclear threat," she said.

Interviews by McClatchy Newspapers with more than 15 radiation and emergency preparedness experts and a review of internal documents revealed:

The government has yet to launch an educational program, akin to the Cold War-era civil defense campaign promoting fallout shelters, to teach Americans how to shield themselves from radiation, especially from the fallout plume, which could deposit deadly particles up to 100 miles from ground zero.

Analysts estimate that as many as 300,000 emergency workers would be needed after a nuclear attack, but predict that the radiation would scare many of them away from the disaster site.

Hospital emergency rooms wouldn't be able to handle the surge of people who were irradiated or the many more who feared they were.

Medical teams would have to improvise to treat what could be tens of thousands of burn victims because most cities have only one or two available burn-unit beds. Cham Dallas, director of the University of Georgia's Center for Mass Destruction Defense, called the predicament "the worst link in our health care wall."

Several drugs are in development and one is especially promising, but the government hasn't acquired any significant new medicine to counteract radiation's devastating effects on victims' blood-forming bone marrow.

Over the last three years, several federal agencies have taken some steps in nuclear disaster planning. The Department of Health and Human Services has drawn up "playbooks" for a range of attack scenarios and created a Web site to instruct emergency responders in treating radiation victims.

The Energy Department's Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory is geared to use real-time weather data, within minutes of a bombing, to create a computer model that charts the likely path of a radioactive fallout plume so that the government can warn affected people to take shelter or evacuate. The government also has modeled likely effects in blast zones.

Capt. Ann Knebel, the U.S. Public Health Service's deputy preparedness chief, said her agency is using the models to understand how many people in different zones would suffer from blast injuries, burns or radiation sickness "and to begin to match our resources to the types of injuries."

No matter how great the government's response, a nuclear bomb's toll would be staggering.

The government's National Planning Scenario, which isn't public, projects that a relatively small, improvised 10-kiloton bomb could kill hundreds of thousands of people in a medium-sized city and cause hundreds of billions of dollars in economic losses.

The document, last updated in April 2005, projects that a bomb denoted at ground level in Washington, D.C., would kill as many as 204,600 people, including many government officials, and would injure or sicken 90,800. Another 24,580 victims would die of radiation-related cancer in ensuing years. Radioactive debris would contaminate a 3,000-square-mile area, requiring years-long cleanup, it said.

DOJ_NMG_0138933

Brinkerhoff, author of the confidential memo for the Joint Chiefs, estimated that nearly 300,000 National Guardsmen, military reservists and civil emergency personnel would be needed to rescue, decontaminate, process and manage the 1.5 million evacuees.

The job would include cordoning off the blast zone and manning a 200-mile perimeter around the fallout area to process and decontaminate victims, to turn others away from the danger and to maintain order. Brinkerhoff estimated that the military would need to provide 140,000 of the 300,000 responders, but doubted that the Pentagon would have that many. And the Public Health Service's Knebel cited studies suggesting that the "fear factor" would reduce civil emergency responders by more than 30 percent.

Planning for an attack seems to evoke a sense of resignation among some officials.

"We are concerned about the catastrophic threats and are trying to improve our abilities for disasters," said Gerald Parker, a deputy assistant secretary in Health and Human Services' new Office of Preparedness and Response. "But you have to look at what's pragmatic as well."

Dr. Andrew Garrett of Columbia University's National Center for Disaster Preparedness, put it this way: "People are just very intimidated to take on the problem" because "there may not be apparent solutions right now."

The U.S. intelligence community considers it a "fairly remote" possibility that terrorists will obtain weapons-grade plutonium or highly enriched uranium, which is more accessible, to build a nuclear weapon, said a senior intelligence official who requested anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information. The official said intelligence agencies worry mainly about a makeshift, radioactive "dirty bomb" that would kill at most a few hundred people, contaminate part of a city and spread panic.

But concerns about a larger nuclear attack are increasing at a time when North Korea is testing atomic weapons and Iran is believed to be pursuing them. Al-Qaida's worldwide network of terrorists also reportedly has been reconstituted.

The 9/11 Commission's 2004 report rated a nuclear bombing as the most consequential threat facing the nation.

"We called for a maximum effort against the threat," Lee Hamilton, the panel's vice chairman, told McClatchy Newspapers. "My impression is that we've got a long ways to go. ... I just think it would overwhelm us."

Dr. Ira Helfand, a Massachusetts emergency care doctor who co-authored a report on nuclear preparedness last year by the Physicians for Social Responsibility, chided the administration for trying "to create a climate of fear rather than to identify a problem and address it." The doctors' group found the government "dangerously unprepared" for a nuclear attack.

Government officials say they have drafted playbooks for every sort of radioactive attack, from a "dirty bomb" to a large, sophisticated device.

But radiation experts and government memos emphasize the chaos that a bigger bomb could create. Emergency responders could face power outages, leaking gas lines, buckled bridges and tunnels, disrupted communications from the blast's electromagnetic pulse and streets clogged by vehicle crashes because motorists could be blinded by the bright flash accompanying detonation.

No equipment exists to shield rescue teams from radiation, and survivors would face similar risks if they tried to walk to safety.

Defense analyst Brinkerhoff proposed having troops gradually tighten the ring around the blast zone as the radiation diminished, but warned that the government lacks the hundreds of radiation meters needed to ensure that they wouldn't endanger themselves. He said those making rescue forays would need dosimeters to monitor their exposure.

Emergency teams would have no quick test to determine the extent of survivors' radiation exposure. They would have to rely on tests for white blood cell declines or quiz people about their whereabouts during the blast and whether they had vomited.

For those with potentially lethal acute radiation sickness, only limited medication is available, said Richard Hatchett, who's overseeing nearly $100 million in research on radiation countermeasures for the National Institute of Allergies and Infectious Diseases.

The Department of Health and Human Services might commit to a limited purchase of one promising drug as early as this month. But currently federal health officials plan to fly victims of acute radiation sickness to hospitals across the country for bone marrow transplants.

The National Planning Scenario expressed concern that uninformed survivors of an attack could be lethally exposed to radiation because they failed to seek shelter, preferably in a sealed basement, for three to four days while radioactive debris decayed. Another big problem: Only a small percentage of Americans store bottled water, canned food and other essentials for an ordeal in a shelter.

Helfand said it would be too late to help most people near the blast, but that advance education could save many people in the path of the fallout.

DOJ_NMG_0138934

Education is critical, he said, because attempting to evacuate could "put you on a crowded freeway where you'll be stuck in traffic and get the maximum radiation exposure."

California's emergency services chief, Henry Renteria, said it might be time "to re-establish an urban area radiation shelter program."

Brinkerhoff wrote that people could build their own radiation-proof shelters if the government engaged in "large-scale civil defense planning" and gave them meters and dosimeters to monitor the radiation.

Since there hasn't been "any enthusiasm to address this kind of preparedness," Brinkerhoff concluded, the only choice for most people would be to flee.

Hundreds Of Incidents Reported Of Smuggling Of Nuclear Materials (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - The number of experts who believe that terrorists could obtain the apparatus for a nuclear bomb is impressive and growing.

The 9/11 Commission described in 2004 the relative ease with which terrorists could conceal the needed weapons-grade plutonium or highly enriched uranium, which it said would be "about the size of a grapefruit or an orange."

Since 2001, law enforcement officials have developed training exercises on how terrorists might smuggle eight components for an improvised 10-kiloton bomb into the United States and then detonate it near the White House.

Experts in and out of the government worry that the most likely source of nuclear material is Russia and the former Soviet bloc nations, where stocks of weapons-grade plutonium and uranium are stored at loosely guarded sites.

And some people are trying to get their hands on them.

The International Atomic Energy Agency reports 976 incidents of illicit trafficking of nuclear and radioactive materials since 1993 - with 149 of them last year alone. In 2006, a man in the former Soviet republic of Georgia was arrested for allegedly trying to sell highly enriched uranium to terrorists.

In a recent interview, Lee Hamilton, who was vice chairman of the 9/11 Commission, said the United States must do more. He suggested spending $3 billion to $4 billion on securing nuclear material in the former Soviet Union. Currently, U.S. officials spend about $1 billion a year.

Joe Cirincione, author of "Bomb Scare: The History and Future of Nuclear Weapons," said some radioactive materials in former eastern bloc nations are "guarded by little more than a chain-linked fence, a padlock and a guard that works during the day."

He said he considers it a certainty that, "if we just keep doing what we're doing, a terrorist group will get a nuclear weapon or the materials for a nuclear weapon and use it sometime in the next 10 years."

"You just can't keep tempting fate like this," he said.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his agency have sought nearly $3 billion to buy sophisticated radiological detectors. They're placing the detectors at U.S. borders to scan incoming cargo. Eventually, the detectors will be positioned around major cities, but the newest generation of equipment won't be ready for a couple of years.

Punishment To Fit The Nuclear Crime (WP)

By Anne-Marie Slaughter And Thomas Wright

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A joint sting operation by the CIA and officials from the Republic of Georgia foiled an attempt by a Russian man to sell nuclear-bomb-grade uranium on the black market last summer. This event, only made public in January, was the latest in a series of alarming incidents that remind us of the severity of the threat posed by nuclear terrorism.

To build a nuclear weapon, terrorists must acquire materials from a state. National governments are unlikely to cooperate with terrorists because they fear retaliation from the victim of such an attack and its allies, but rogue scientists, generals or other individuals can work with criminal networks to deliver nuclear weapons to the highest bidder. To counter this danger, we should make the illegal transfer of nuclear materials a crime against humanity triable by international tribunals and by national courts in every country.

Current efforts to close down the nuclear black market have an Achilles' heel -- certain states will not cooperate and will even protect nuclear criminals. For instance, A.Q. Khan, Pakistan's "father of the bomb," lives comfortably under house arrest; U.S. officials have not been allowed even to interrogate him. Pakistan's government is too frightened of a domestic backlash to act harshly against a national hero. Globally, of the dozens suspected of involvement in his network, only three have been successfully prosecuted.

DOJ_NMG_0138935

During the Cold War, the United States used deterrence to avert Armageddon; the Soviet Union understood that aggression, even of a conventional nature, would carry too high a price. This old wisdom offers new hope; the United States should actively deter individuals who trade in nuclear materials by making the costs of such behavior unacceptably high.

Making nuclear transfer a crime against humanity captures the enormity of the offense and would dramatically increase the cost of getting caught. Nuclear transfer threatens the lives of millions of people. It merits a place in infamy alongside genocide and other evils. Creating a nuclear transfer taboo would strip away feigned protestations of innocence and illusions of a victimless crime. It would stigmatize black-market financiers and other facilitators of nuclear transfers as the ultimate merchants of death.

In addition to highlighting the dangers of this action, making nuclear transfer a crime against humanity would greatly expand opportunities for prosecution, denying national governments the ability to shelter these criminals.

The International Criminal Court has jurisdiction over crimes against humanity. The inclusion of nuclear transfer as such a crime could be confirmed at the next review conference, in 2009. The ICC could then indict and prosecute those suspected of such acts. Even if the United States cannot bring itself to join the ICC, it could work with allies to empower the ICC to act, just as the Bush administration has done on Darfur.

Similarly, as a matter of international law, crimes against humanity are subject to universal jurisdiction. That means that any nation, including the United States, could prosecute nuclear traders anywhere in the world. National governments can pass statutes confirming such jurisdiction in their courts.

Finally, the U.N. Security Council could pass a Chapter VII resolution urging a prosecutor to investigate these cases or even establish a special tribunal to prosecute those suspected of nuclear transfer. A tribunal could be a fallback if efforts to incorporate nuclear transfer into the ICC charter were unsuccessful.

This initiative would make international law work as a tool of American national security strategy rather than as a constraint on it. Failing states would no longer provide safe haven for rogue individuals. The potential costs of nuclear transfer for criminal networks would clearly exceed its potential rewards. It would be multilateralism and international law at its best: hard-edged tools to further American and global interests.

Most important, it is the only way to overcome a real problem. The status quo -- trusting nondemocratic states to safeguard U.S. security interests by cracking down on their criminal networks -- has failed. The convention on genocide was signed after the Holocaust. This time, we should not wait until after the fact to act.

Anne-Marie Slaughter is dean of Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and a co-director of the Princeton Project on National Security. Thomas Wright is senior researcher for the Princeton Project on National Security.

Civil Air Patrol Revives Role As Eyes Of Skies (WT)

By Audrey Hudson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

The Civil Air Patrol guarded the U.S. shoreline from Maine to Texas against German U-boats during World War II, and now the all-volunteer force is playing a vital role in the war against terrorism.

The 56,000-member-strong organization is participating in a growing number of homeland security missions, conducting aerial reconnaissance of military ships and other offshore activity, protecting sensitive and critical infrastructure from terrorist attacks, and assisting the U.S. Border Patrol.

"We were the eyes of the home skies when we started 65 years ago to spot German submarines and rescue downed pilots, and now we are going back to our roots as the eyes of the home skies," said Col. Kay Joslin Walling, commander of the Middle East Region of the Civil Air Patrol, which includes the District, Maryland and Virginia.

The volunteers of the Air Force auxiliary in Washington protect the country by acting as the enemy during monthly "Falcon Virgo" exercises over the nation's capital, where they perform a high-tech game of hide-and-seek with armed Air Force jets.

"As the National Capital Wing's planes closed in on restricted areas, ground forces tracked them with radar, and surface-to-air missile operators locked them in their radar sights," the Civil Air Patrol (CAP) reported to Congress on its 65 years of operations.

"Air Force F-16 fighter jets intercepted the mock enemies and escorted them out of the restricted airspace," the report said.

The organization will celebrate its 65th anniversary this week with Capitol Hill lawmakers.

When World War II ended, CAP focused on search-and-rescue missions, and disaster relief in cases of floods, tornadoes, hurricanes, snowstorms and fires. The patrol also fights the illegal drug trade and last year netted $1 billion in seizures. In their new role in the war on terrorism, pilots use state-of-the-art equipment and a fleet of airplanes to participate in regular patrols and terrorist-event exercises.

DOJ_NMG_0138936

Since the inception of the Homeland Security Department, CAP has provided surveillance for the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, the Kentucky Derby and other major events.

Using satellite digital imaging systems, Cessna airplanes relay reconnaissance photographs in real time to emergency or disaster centers. They were crucial in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in 2005 and the attacks on the World Trade Center in 2001.

The New York Wing was the first aircraft in the air over ground zero after September 11, shooting aerial images of the damage the next day to determine how rescue workers could traverse the scene.

White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend presided over an exercise last weekend to test the government's response to bombing scenarios. Capt. Dan Proffen used his day off to patrol critical infrastructure along the Chesapeake Bay.

"Nothing should be able to slip past me," Capt. Proffen said as he piloted a Cessna Skylane equipped with a Garmin G-1000 glass cockpit and computerized controls.

"This plane will fly itself," said Col. Jerry Weiss, commander of the Maryland Wing.

"It wows the people sitting in the emergency operations center, when the pictures appear in real time. We can watch as evacuations unfold," Col. Weiss said. "It's situational awareness for people sitting in a room with no windows."

CAP officials call the effort a bargain for the government: less than $400 to fly a Cessna 182 for four hours, compared with $1,800 for one hour to operate a Black Hawk helicopter.

"All of us have real jobs; we don't get paid for this, which is why we are so financially cost-efficient," Col. Walling said.

Capt. Proffen joined the CAP-operated cadet program at age 17. Eight years later, he continues to volunteer his time flying weekly patrols and uses his vacation time from Johns Hopkins University's Applied Physics Laboratory, where he works as an engineer, to serve as a flight instructor for new cadets.

After takeoff from the Bay Bridge Airport on the Eastern Shore, Capt. Proffen headed north toward a plume of black smoke, which upon closer inspection appeared to be a field-clearing effort on a stretch of land surrounded by the frozen Bay waters.

Flying a loop around a Susquehanna River dam to check the structure's integrity, Capt. Proffen made his way back down the Bay for a final survey of the Bay Bridge yet avoided Aberdeen Proving Ground.

"We don't fly through there," Col. Walling later explained. "They shoot off some big guns over there."

Homeland Security Delays Federal IDs, Proposes Rules (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

The Bush administration will delay implementation of a new law to federalize driver's licenses, bowing to pressure from federal and state lawmakers who say next year's deadline can't be met.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday announced the delay and released 162 pages of proposed regulations to guide the national identification system.

"These standards correct glaring vulnerabilities exploited by some of the September 11 hijackers who used fraudulently obtained driver's licenses to board the airplanes in their attack against America," Mr. Chertoff said.

"Raising the security standards on driver's licenses establishes another layer of protection to prevent terrorists from obtaining and using fake documents to plan or carry out an attack," Mr. Chertoff said.

The deadline will be extended from May 2008 until December 2009, and up to 20 percent of state homeland security grants can be used to implement the program.

Congress mandated the identification cards in the 2005 Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act for Defense, the Global War on Terror, and Tsunami Relief Act.

New identification cards and driver's licenses will be required to pass airline screening or enter federal buildings and nuclear plants.

The cards will include the holder's name, date of birth, sex, an identification number other than a Social Security number, a facial digital photograph, an address and a signature. The cards must contain physical security features that can be read by a computer.

The proposed regulations reflect legislation pushed by Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and ranking member of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, Mr. Chertoff said.

Miss Collins said she is "grateful that Secretary Chertoff has listened to the concerns of so many state leaders and my colleagues on this important issue."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and ranking member of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, called the delay reasonable but said the new ID standards remain an urgent national security priority.

DOJ_NMG_0138937

"Weaknesses in driver's licenses are still being exploited every day by illegal immigrants, identity thieves and terrorists," Mr. Davis said.

Mr. Chertoff said the standards will protect against identity theft and the use of fraudulent documents, and that background checks will be required of all division of motor vehicle employees.

The regulations say the federal government will not be given greater access to personal information and that no national database is created "because it leaves the decision of how to conduct the exchanges in the hands of the states."

Some privacy advocates are concerned that the database of personal information will be used without limits or standards.

"The Real ID system may be decentralized, but if it is widely accessible, for purposes other that administering the driver's license system, it could turn into a massive tracking system," said Sophia Cope, a fellow with the Center for Democracy and Technology.

Cost And Privacy Concerns Cited In New Rules For Driver's Licenses (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A law enacted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to secure U.S. driver's licenses will cost $23.1 billion over 10 years, require motorists born after 1935 to present birth certificates or passports, and add $28 to the cost of issuing each license, officials said yesterday.

Long-awaited rules to implement the law, known as Real ID, did not quell criticism from states, privacy advocates and libertarian groups. They said it represents an unfunded mandate and creates a national ID-card system that will increase the consequences of identity theft.

The 162-page draft regulations "confirm the worst suspicions" of opponents, said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.). He said Congress should repeal the law and reopen talks with states, technology experts and civil liberties groups rather than risk years of legal challenges.

The 2005 act overhauls how state ID cards and driver's licenses must be awarded and produced to combat forgery and fraud, while standardizing their data so they can be shared across state and federal databases.

The plan would delay from May 2008 to the end of 2009 the deadline for states to begin compliance, but all 245 million U.S. driver's licenses must comply by May 2013 to be used for federal purposes such as boarding aircraft.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that technology will ease, not increase, privacy threats, and that the federal government will not keep a central database of personal information.

"Is it a reasonable amount of money that people should pay to prevent people from getting on airplanes or getting in buildings and killing Americans?" Chertoff asked. "I think most people would say . . . that's $20 well spent."

Associations representing the nation's governors, state legislatures and motor vehicle administrators complained that costs continue to grow, that the 2013 deadline is unreasonable and that more changes are needed.

Opponents from the American Civil Liberties Union, the Cato Institute and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights said the rules leave many questions to be answered in a 60-day comment period.

The rules do not propose to encrypt personal data stored in bar codes on licenses, for instance, leaving it accessible to commercial data brokers. Nor do they spell out how systems linking government databases will be built or who will own them. "They can't fix a law that is so fundamentally flawed," Cato official Tim Harper said.

Chertoff said states can spend up to $100 million this year and $37 million next year from U.S. homeland security grants to offset their $14.6 billion share of the tab. State officials say they had other plans for the money.

Seven former U.S. security officials and Sept. 11 commission staffers, led by panel member John F. Lehman Jr., said the United States should pay $1 billion in "up-front costs."

Federal Requirement For Tamper-Proof Licenses Will Raise Fees For Drivers By 2013 (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — Nearly 240 million Americans and legal residents will have to spend an estimated $20 more for a standardized and tamper-proof driver's license by 2013 to comply with a proposed new federal rule issued Thursday.

Congress imposed the mandate for the new licenses in 2005, agreeing with the 9/11 Commission that terrorists' access to fake licenses or state-issued identification cards made the 2001 plot easier to carry out.

But until now, the Department of Homeland Security had not issued rules governing the licenses' security features or the documentation that will be required to get one. It also had not estimated the costs — about $14.6 billion to states and about $7.8 billion to individuals — of setting up the system called Real ID over the next decade.

DOJ_NMG_0138938

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, trying to address concerns raised by the states, said the department would allow those having trouble meeting the original May 2008 deadline to delay the start of the program until the end of 2009.

But all states will still be required to replace all existing drivers' licenses by 2013 — even those not up for renewal — if they want their licenses to be accepted as identification at airports or federal buildings.

"This is going to cost money — security does cost money," Mr. Chertoff said Thursday. "But it is money well spent."

To help the states get started, Mr. Chertoff offered up to $100 million in federal grants this year, although the money would come from antiterrorism funds already promised to the states. So far, only $40 million in federal aid has been provided for the program.

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, who had advocated delaying the start of the program, praised the revisions.

"The department has finally recognized that it simply was unfair to impose this burden on the states," Ms. Collins said Thursday on the Senate floor.

But the plan received largely negative reviews from state officials and civil liberties experts.

"We have always known this law would be a nightmare for motorists and taxpayers, and President Bush's rules have just confirmed that nightmare," Gov. James E. Doyle of Wisconsin said in a statement Thursday, predicting "higher fees, longer lines, fewer D.M.V. centers, and a major headache when you go to renew your license."

The National Governors Association said the federal aid Mr. Chertoff offered, representing about 10 percent of the cost in the first year and an unknown amount in future years, was woefully inadequate.

"It is a drop in a bucket," said David Quam, the association's director of federal relations, who estimated that the extra cost per person could reach $40. The cost of licenses now ranges from as much $85 in New York to as little as $4 in North Carolina, according to the AAA.

Representatives from the American Civil Liberties Union said the new identification cards would leave the nation less secure. That is because Homeland Security said in the proposed rule issued Thursday that it did not intend to require the encryption of biographic data contained in a machine-readable strip on the license.

"You will create greater security vulnerabilities for sophisticated terrorists than the ones we are closing," said Timothy Sparapani, legislative counsel at the A.C.L.U.

Applicants will have to prove their address, date of birth and legal status in the United States with valid government-issued documents. Exceptions will be granted to people born before 1935 and in certain other cases, like people who were victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Before states can issue a new license, they will need to electronically confirm that the applicant's documentation is accurate. That will require states or the federal government to create electronic databases of birth certificates, immigration records and other documents — a task that could be difficult to complete in time, some state officials said Thursday.

Mr. Chertoff said the proposed rule, which is on track to become final in several months, would give states the option to make it illegal for merchants to automatically collect biographic data from the licenses.

States will also be permitted to issue a different type of license for people who cannot confirm they are in the United States legally. But these would not be valid as a form of federal identification.

Several states including Maine and Montana, angry over the high cost of the program and concerns about privacy, are considering or have voted on legislation calling for the repeal of the law. Jim Guest, a Missouri state legislator helping coordinate the repeal effort in more than 30 states, said the revolt would continue.

"All of our concerns are still there," Mr. Guest said.

FEDERAL DIARY: Hoyer Makes Good On Health-Care Promise (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The House majority leader delivered on a promise yesterday.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) introduced a bill that would increase the government's contribution toward federal employee health-care premiums -- as he had pledged he would to two unions earlier this week.

Under the proposal, the government would pay 80 percent of the cost of premiums in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, saving the average federal worker about $500 annually. Currently, the government picks up 72 percent of premium costs.

"This legislation will help take the bite out of rising health care costs and make it easier for federal employees to afford quality health care for themselves and their families," Hoyer said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0138939

The rate of premium growth in the federal employee program has slowed in recent years, dropping from an average increase of 12.7 percent in 2002 to an average 6.4 percent in 2006. The Office of Personnel Management, which administers the program, used financial reserves in the program to hold this year's average premium increase to 1.8 percent.

Still, a number of insurance plans in the federal program raised their premiums by more than the average 1.8 percent increase. Premiums for health maintenance organizations, for example, rose by 6.3 percent, and some Washington area federal HMOs raised their rates higher.

More than half of the federal program's enrollees, or 2.27 million people, are covered by Blue Cross Blue Shield. This year, the annual share of premiums paid by a federal employee who chose Blue Cross standard coverage will be $1,489 for individual coverage and $3,492 for family coverage.

In introducing the bill, Hoyer said that Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) has joined as the chief co-sponsor.

Hoyer has tried to lower health-care costs for federal employees and retirees in past years and promised unions, which held their annual legislative conferences this week, that he would renew his efforts. The introduction of the bill yesterday was welcomed by John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, and Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union.

The prospects for Hoyer's proposal are uncertain, in part because Congress is under pressure to reduce the federal deficit and rein in spending. His proposal also runs counter to a Bush administration plan, announced last month, that would reduce the government's contribution to health-care premiums for new retirees with less than 10 years of federal service.On the Front Burner

"Welcome to the hot seat."

That's how Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, greeted Paul A. Schneider, who joined the Department of Homeland Security as undersecretary for management two months ago. Schneider came to the Hill yesterday to testify before the subcommittee on management, investigations and oversight.

Committee members expressed concern about morale of employees at Homeland Security, noting that the department got rock-bottom scores in important job-satisfaction, leadership and management areas in a survey conducted by the Office of Personnel Management.

Schneider said the department plans to launch focus groups in the next 60 days to explore workforce issues and find solutions. The survey suggested that too many employees do not feel they are being recognized for their hard work and that communication between supervisors and employees needs to be improved, he said.

Efforts to reduce reliance on contractors also are underway, he told the panel, chaired by Rep. Chris Carney (D-Pa.). Starting this year, Schneider said the department is focusing "on developing a mature acquisition workforce through targeted recruiting and advanced training programs."Talk Shows

Veronica Villalobos, senior attorney in the office of federal operations at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, will be the guest on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Deidre A. Lee, director of management and chief acquisition officer at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Ground Zero Victims (opinion) (NYT)

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Mayor Michael Bloomberg has finally joined the urgent campaign to get Washington to care for the responders who helped New Yorkers after the Sept. 11 attacks. Many responders — and people who studied, lived or worked around the World Trade Center — are seriously ill, and Mr. Bloomberg can play an important role in making the federal government take responsibility for them.

Mr. Bloomberg was once skeptical about what is being called ground zero disease. But he is now campaigning to get Washington to pay $150 million a year for three health centers that already treat police officers, firefighters and others made sick by the attacks. The money is badly needed to improve care in these underfinanced, overworked centers.

There should also be a fund to compensate those who have been made sick, modeled on the Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund. There are some private fund-raising efforts under way, including one by The New York Times Company Foundation, but the big money will have to come from the federal government. One source could be the $1 billion that Congress set aside to cover lawsuits against the city and its contractors.

Mr. Bloomberg is prepared to make it available, but only if Congress passes a law to protect the city and its contractors from negligence suits by the victims. It should do so. The victims will get more money, and sooner, from a compensation fund than if they have to pursue individual lawsuits and pay attorneys' fees.

DOJ_NMG_0138940

The entire nation was attacked on Sept. 11, not just New York. Congress and the Bush administration should be prepared to come up with the additional funds, and the legislative fixes, that are needed to compensate the victims.

WAR NEWS:

House Democrats Set To Retreat From Effort To Cap Troop Levels (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Iraq war is proving a humbling experience not just for President Bush, but also for those in Congress who want to end it.

Plagued by internal divisions, House Democrats have largely abandoned efforts to cap the increase in U.S. troop levels for Iraq and will focus instead on highlighting the war's strain on the military and competing U.S. interests in Afghanistan.

The major battleground is a wartime spending request which the administration is still adjusting and which has blossomed into a major test for the Democrats charged with drafting the legislation.

The House Appropriations Committee may add as much as $1 billion to Mr. Bush's request to beef up U.S. operations in Afghanistan and shift additional funds to rural-development programs. More than $2 billion would be set aside to improve the readiness of strategic military reserves in the U.S., and provisions would be added to curb the frequent practice of stretching personnel in Iraq by extending combat tours for units already deployed.

But the White House is given discretion to bypass any such restrictions that it finds burdensome, and President Bush will have a relatively free hand to add the more than 21,500 soldiers and Marines he wants by the end of May.

Rep. John Murtha, one of the bill's chief managers, had pushed a tougher line that could have capped the buildup at one to two brigades below Mr. Bush's target. But given divisions in his party, the Pennsylvania Democrat was forced to retreat for fear of jeopardizing the larger package.

The sometimes stormy back-and-forth, which has played out since Mr. Murtha announced his proposals in early January, has been a humbling lesson for him and other Democrats in just how difficult it is for Congress to achieve the unity needed to challenge a president's war powers. Similar debates over Vietnam, a larger war with many more casualties, stretched for years. And while Iraq helped to mobilize voters for Democrats in the November elections, helping them win control of Congress, delivering on their promise of change is proving difficult.

"For seven weeks Democrats have been all over the block," said House Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio. "They have no strategy to stop the war. They have no strategy to win the war. They are the majority here on Capitol Hill. It's time for them to grow up and make a decision."

Last night, the Appropriations leadership was still struggling to pull together the bill, which will include the administration's $93.4 billion defense request, as well as $6 billion for State Department and foreign-aid accounts, and $3.4 billion disaster assistance at home.

The war debate, by so fracturing the House, makes this a much more difficult challenge for Democrats still finding their legs as the majority. Complicating the task is the fluid situation on the ground in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the fact that the Pentagon appears to have underestimated its needs for support personnel and Mine Resistant Ambush Protected armored vehicles. Further, there may also be adjustments to Pakistan economic assistance following President Cheney's visit there this week.

An administration official said last evening that there may be "slight adjustments" within its requests. But the Pentagon has discussed much larger needs approaching $5 billion.

Appropriations Chairman David Obey is under pressure to add billions more for domestic priorities, including farm aid and child health programs. But to protect himself from critics on the right, the Wisconsin Democrat has set the goal that every dollar for these needs will be more than matched by additional funds for defense and homeland security.

This has opened the door to both more military spending and additional funds for homeland-security priorities that have received less attention in the past. These include rail- and transit-security measures, explosive-detection devices and tighter inspections of air cargo carried on passenger planes.

Mr. Obey is pressing still for language that would bar major U.S. military action against Iran without prior authorization from Congress. But the more serious policy battle -- and dilemma for Democrats -- has been how far lawmakers should go in trying to cap or restrain the new commitment of U.S. troops in Iraq.

The new forces ordered by Mr. Bush are intended to quell sectarian violence in Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods in Baghdad and strengthen Marine forces against the continued al Qaeda presence in Anbar province. But the Army is so short of combat-ready units, it will take until May to complete the "surge" of five brigades, creating an awkward situation for both the military and Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0138941

Coming in the middle of a fiscal year, it was highly unlikely Congress could roll back the president's decision even if it had the political will to limit funding for the surge.

In testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee this week, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Mr. Bush could use his "food and forage" powers to continue the mission even if Congress were to limit funds. "It is my belief that given the mission he has the food and forage responsibilities and authority to resource as he needs...to accomplish the mission," Gen. Pace said.

Democrats Split Over Iraq War Funding (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON

After starting the 110th Congress with a big antiwar mandate, Democrats are scrambling to find a way forward on an issue that is driving wedges deep into their new majority.

At issue is how aggressively Democrats can challenge President Bush's war policy without alienating so many of their own caucus members that they lose key votes.

The next test will be how the House handles Mr. Bush's $93.4 billion war-funding request, which comes before the Appropriations Committee next week.

"It's a work in progress," says Rep. Ike Skelton (D) of Missouri, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, commenting on behind-the-scenes talks this week to find a consensus within the Democratic caucus on the war.

Early in the week, House Democrats balked at a proposal by Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, who chairs the Defense subcommittee on that panel, to use the war-funding request to rein in Bush's options as commander in chief.

Mr. Murtha's plan, announced on an antiwar website, proposed that the funds be used on the condition that the Pentagon meets standards of readiness and training for troops to be deployed to Iraq.

After a fractious caucus meeting on Tuesday, House leaders backed off the Murtha proposal, but opened new rifts with liberals in their caucus who favor stronger moves to get US forces out of Iraq.

"The American people are going to have a great deal of difficulty with Democrats who say they oppose the war, yet vote to fund it," says Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D) of Ohio, who is also a presidential candidate.

A longtime, staunch supporter of the military, Murtha has emerged as a lightening rod in an intense intraparty debate over how to end US involvement in Iraq.

On the one hand, the 44-member Blue Dog Coalition, which is made up of fiscal conservatives, opposes moves that would either deprive US troops of funding they need or appear to micromanage the war.

"There's a growing consensus for setting standards for our troops to be well trained, well equipped, and well rested, but to also give the president waivers," in case such guidelines cannot be met, says Rep. Chet Edwards (D) of Texas, who chairs the subcommittee on military quality of life and veterans' affairs.

Such waivers would require Bush to "take responsibility for troops not being well trained," and would make any lapses in training or equipment more visible to the public. But the waiver policy still allows Bush to send reinforcements to "bring home a battalion that's worn out. Without such flexibility, it would be micromanaging," he adds.

On the other hand, the 71-member Congressional Progressive Caucus (CPC), the largest group of Democrats in the House, is calling for a "fully funded" withdrawal of US forces from Iraq within six months.

"I'm telling them point blank that the only money I'll support is fully supporting the withdrawal of every last soldier and contractor in Iraq," says Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D) of California, who chairs the CPC. "There's going to be a respectable showing of members against the [defense] supplemental [spending bill], unless it is clearly to support our troops, while bringing them home."

A lawmaker at the heart of next week's firestorm over funding, Rep. David Obey (D) of Wisconsin, who chairs the full House Appropriations Committee, notes that Congress struggled for years to find consensus over how to end the war in Vietnam. "Between 1970 and 1972, we had 31 different approaches, before we got a vote that had teeth," he says.

Moreover, the focus on Democrats is misplaced, he adds. The war will end "when enough Republicans go down to the White House and say, 'Mr. President, it has to end,' " he says.

On the Senate side, the Appropriations Committee that will pick up this bill after it clears the House is chaired by Sen. Robert Byrd, one of the strongest and earliest critics of the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0138942

"The Congress has consistently supported our men and our women in uniform, Congress will continue to support our troops and their families," he said at that panel's first hearing on supplemental war funding Feb. 27. But he added that "Congress is not a rubberstamp or presidential lapdog, obedient and unquestioning."

Meanwhile, Senate Democrats are as deeply divided as their House counterparts over the best approach to respond to Bush's call for a surge of 21,500 troops in Iraq.

After Senate Republicans blocked votes on a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop buildup earlier this month, Democrats have been working to draft a binding resolution, which may include the repeal of the 2002 authorization to use force in Iraq.

"Quiet conversations are going on behind the scenes addressing the concerns raised by some in the caucus," says Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate majority leader Harry Reid.

Senate Republican and Democratic leaders also say they are close to agreement on debating Bush's proposal for a "surge." "This time, it looks as if we will be able to offer amendments," including one that commits the Senate to fully funding the war, says Don Stewart, a spokesman for GOP leader Mitch McConnell.

Democrats Want Troops Out If Goals Unmet (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, March 2, 2007

House Democratic leaders have coalesced around legislation that would require troops to come home from Iraq within six months if that country's leaders fail to meet promises to help reduce violence there, party officials said Thursday.

The plan would retain a Democratic proposal prohibiting the deployment to Iraq of troops with insufficient rest or training or who already have served there for more than a year. Under the plan, such troops could only be sent to Iraq if President Bush waives those standards and reports to Congress each time.

The proposal is the latest attempt by Democrats to resolve deep divisions within the party on how far to go to scale back U.S. involvement in Iraq. Rep. James Moran said the latest version has the support of party leadership and said he believes it is final and has the best chance at attracting broad support.

"We're going to report out" a war spending bill "that's responsive to the will of the voters last November and brings our troops home as soon and safely as possible," Moran, D-Va., said in an interview Thursday.

Moran, a member of the House committee that oversees military spending, said the plan was discussed in a closed-door meeting of committee Democrats on Thursday.

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., declined to confirm the details and or say whether Pelosi backs the plan. But he said: "We have said we want to make sure our troops have all the training and equipment they need and that the Iraqi government must meet the benchmarks President Bush endorsed."

Bush said the Iraqis had promised to meet certain goals when he offered to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. For example, the Iraqis pledged to spend more money on reconstruction and reach a political agreement to share the nation's oil resources.

If the Iraqis fail to live up to their promises, some troops could be left behind under the Democrats' plan to train Iraqi troops or conduct counterterrorism missions, Moran said.

Bush requested $93.4 billion for this year's military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Moran said that as of Thursday, the proposal was on track to add an extra $1 billion to step up efforts in Afghanistan. Money also would be added to improve health care for veterans and help wounded active-duty troops, as well as provide relief for hurricane victims.

The legislation also would require Bush to seek congressional approval for any military operations in Iran.

The Senate, meanwhile, could begin floor debate on Iraq as early as next week. Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., and Carl Levin, D-Mich., have proposed a resolution that would call for combat troops to come home by March 2008.

As Democrats finalized their spending plan for this year, White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten told Senate Republican leaders that the administration will need additional funding to pay for the influx of troops to Iraq.

The Pentagon initially estimated the 21,500 troops would cost $5.6 billion through Oct. 1. But 6,000 more personnel will be needed to provide support to the combat units, according to GOP aides.

The administration also might amend its funding request in order to provide more money for Afghanistan.

The White House is expected to offer to trim other parts of the 2007 war spending request such as the controversial V-22 tilt-rotor aircraft to offset the money needed. Bolten did not offer a specific figure for the support troops, the aides said.

Also on Thursday, an influential Senate Democrat floated the idea of cutting $20 billion from Bush's request for military operations next year in Iraq and Afghanistan, only to be swiftly overridden by his colleagues.

DOJ_NMG_0138943

The trial balloon floated by Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad would have trimmed Bush's $142 billion war budget for 2008 by about one-seventh in keeping with cost estimates by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office.

Conrad's idea would have applied to the next budget year beginning Oct. 1 — a separate issue from the debate over Bush's $100 billion request for immediate supplemental war funding.

But it raised concerns among Democrats sensitive to any accusations of shorting funding for troops in battle.

"Our caucus feels strongly that we should go with the president's numbers" on 2008 war costs, Conrad said.

Some Lawmakers Want To Fund Civilian Projects Through War Bill (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

As House Democrats wrangle over details of a $100 billion war spending bill -- including whether restrictions should be placed on troops sent to Iraq -- some members want to add significant money for agricultural relief, Hurricane Katrina reconstruction and other nonmilitary projects.

Rep. Collin C. Peterson (D-Minn.), who chairs the Agriculture Committee, said yesterday that rural states hit hard by floods, droughts and snowstorms in the past two years need $4 billion in emergency farm relief. And attaching the request to the war bill is the best way to insure they get it, he said.

Members from Gulf states want funds for improving levees in areas devastated by Katrina. And lawmakers from across the country say their states need federal help to cover deficits in a children's health insurance program.

As of yesterday, Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), who chairs the House Appropriations Committee, had agreed to add about $3 billion to the war bill to help close military bases and relocate troops as part of the Base Realignment and Closure process. And he approved an additional $750 million for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a joint federal and state program that provides health care for six million poor children.

Obey has not agreed to the farm-relief request, according to Democratic aides familiar with the discussions. But Peterson made it clear that conservative Democrats and some Republicans from farming communities would be inclined to support the war bill if it included disaster aid. "A lot of these guys are farm guys," Peterson said. "Disaster relief is important to them."

Even though the details of the bill are still in flux, Republicans lost no time yesterday attacking Democrats for fattening the already hefty war bill. "Our focus ought to be on supporting our troops in harm's way, not in porking up this bill with everyone's latest ideas of how we ought to be spending the taxpayers' money," said Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the minority leader.

The bill is a response to President Bush's request for $100 billion in supplemental funds to pay for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan for the rest of the fiscal year. Democratic aides said the details of the bill are likely to be finalized and released next week and will be debated by the Appropriations Committee sometime within the next two weeks, before it is sent to the House floor for a vote. Although it is highly likely that the bill will be approved by the committee, the outcome on the floor is more difficult to predict.

Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), the Democrats' most celebrated war critic and chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on defense, is trying to use the bill as a vehicle for exerting congressional control over Iraq policy. Murtha wants to include language that says troops must meet certain readiness and equipment standards before they can be deployed. Some liberal Democrats oppose any legislation that would further fund the war. Some senior Democrats want to include a provision that would allow the president to dispatch troops that do not meet readiness standards, as long as he formally notifies Congress that he is doing so.

Republicans and some conservative Democrats have said that they will oppose such restrictions, even if it means voting against a bill that is fundamentally designed to pay for the war. "We will not support a bill that inhibits the president's ability to win this war in Iraq," Boehner said.

Fed's Bernanke Wins Praise For Reply To Sliding Markets (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

BERNANKE WINS praise for response to market volatility.

Lawmakers in both parties welcome Fed chief's reassuring midweek testimony, which followed market-rattling commentary from predecessor Greenspan. Rep. Jim Cooper praises Bernanke for a "steady hand" at the central bank.

Treasury's Paulson, on the job less than a year, spoke by phone with Bush but offered little publicly to calm investor jitters. In a speech yesterday, two days after market's plunge, Paulson struck upbeat notes and urged "a broad view of the economy."

Congressional aides say market drop that began in Asia will raise pressure on Paulson, who visits China next week, to get results on yuan.

DEMOCRATS JOCKEY for attention from black voters.

DOJ_NMG_0138944

At civil-rights commemorations this weekend in Selma, Ala., Sens. Obama and Clinton will speak at separate churches blocks apart. One organizer frets they may distract the spotlight from Georgia Rep. John Lewis, beaten by state troopers during 1965 march across Edmund Pettus Bridge.

Democratic campaigns increase scrutiny of potential Gore entry after former vice president's Oscar win. The coverage Gore would attract, a strategist for one contender reasons, "robs most candidates' ability to push a positive message" for two to three weeks, and require intensive "care and feeding" of political insiders and donors.

REPUBLICANS AIM to force Democrats into tough health-care choices.

As health-funding debate accelerates, Senate Republicans seek to resist spending increases by limiting "S-Chip" child-health program money on low-income children, not adults. Democratic-leaning states such as Illinois that cover adults under the program bristle at the idea.

Bush asked Congress for $4.8 billion in new money over five years, just over half of what Congressional Budget Office says is needed to maintain programs at current enrollment rate. Maverick Republican Sen. Smith of Oregon, facing re-election next year, draws intraparty fire for seeking funds from higher cigarette taxes.

Though Bush rebuffed governors' funding pleas, "Many states are rearing to go in covering more uninsured children," Urban Institute's Stan Dorn says.

ENDORSEMENT? Though Gore now basks in liberals' praise, neoconservative author Robert Kagan insists Gore might have ousted Saddam Hussein himself had Florida votes been counted differently. "It's entirely possible that [Gore] also might have gone to war in Iraq," Kagan tells C-SPAN in interview to air Sunday night, "because he was one of the leading hawks...in the Clinton administration." A Gore spokeswoman couldn't be reached, but Gore warned six months before war began that attacking Iraq would squander America's goodwill and distract from the war on terrorism.

COLLISION COURSE: Democratic Sen. Schumer and Republican Sen. Domenici propose guaranteed diabetes screening and treatment under Medicaid. Though Schumer says preventive steps could save $30 billion over 10 years, their legislation faces administration pressure to restrain Medicaid spending.

PLAN B: Divided over how to confront Bush on Iraq troops levels, House Democrats highlight issue with broader appeal: accountability for billions in federal spending on Katrina and other issues they contend are rife with mismanagement and abuse. A House Republican Leadership aide argues that such initiatives mask Democrats' desires for higher spending: "Republicans are trying to turn off the faucet on the front end, whereas Democrats keep looking for a bigger hose."

DAMAGE CONTROL: Bush administration seeks more help for workers hurt by trade. Labor Secretary Chao leads an interagency effort, consulting quietly with trade-friendly Democrats on Capitol Hill. Senate Finance Chairman Baucus, backing aid for service as well as manufacturing workers, calls more "trade adjustment assistance" essential for extending presidential trade-negotiating authority.

DEMOCRATS STEP UP calls for predatory-lending curbs.

Soaring default rates on subprime mortgages and signs that some less risky borrowers are struggling with payments spur hearings in Rep. Frank's financial-services committee. Legislation is expected later.

Senate banking chairman Dodd pushes Bernanke and big-city mayors to strengthen borrower protections; bank regulators prepare new guidance on subprime lending. Freddie Mac vows to stop purchasing particularly risky subprime loans as consumer advocates complain that millions of vulnerable borrowers are facing foreclosure.

Despite swelling controversy, lenders defend subprime lending for having boosted home ownership among minorities and low-income families.

MINOR MEMOS: At "All Things Ethical" conference in Las Vegas by Campaigns and Elections magazine, topics include "The Ethics of Deception" and "Is Negative the New Positive?"...Among those following each story closely, Pew Research Center survey finds 64% approval for press coverage of Anna Nicole Smith exceeds positive marks for journalists on Iraq war or 2008 presidential campaign.

Senate Democrats Vow To Confront Bush On Iraq But Are Still Working Out The Details (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — Senate Democrats tried Thursday to bridge their political differences over how to confront President Bush on Iraq even as they acknowledged that agreement on an approach remained out of reach.

“We have not gotten our arms around how the caucus is going to move forward,” Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, said as Democrats searched for a plan that would satisfy antiwar lawmakers, keep the party’s centrists on board and win over some Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0138945

The leadership had been preparing to move forward this week with a proposal that would have essentially repealed the 2002 resolution granting Mr. Bush the power to invade Iraq and imposed new restrictions on how American troops could be used there.

But the plan put off some Democrats, because it said explicitly that "the president is authorized to use the armed forces of the United States in Iraq" for the purposes of protecting American forces and bases, training Iraqi soldiers and policemen, conducting operations against terrorists and protecting Iraq's borders.

Critics of the war, particularly those who opposed the 2002 authorization, worried that this approach would effectively put them on record as sanctioning almost any use Mr. Bush and his commanders might make of the troops, giving Democrats shared responsibility for a war that most of them now oppose and several have rejected all along.

"It's still George Bush's war," said Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, "but we run the risk of gaining some ownership of it if we don't make it absolutely clear that we are the party that wants to get out of there."

Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat, said he believed that the party's leaders were close to reaching a new consensus, but he cautioned that any legislation would have to be precisely written.

"I haven't given up," he said. "I really think we can carefully word this and come up with strong support in our caucus. But I am one of the 23 who voted against the war, and I want to read this very carefully to make sure I am not authorizing the war at this point."

Democrats sought to smooth over the problems by drafting another proposal, which began circulating Thursday. That version made it clear that the intent was to narrow the initial authority for the war and placed new emphasis on the phased redeployment of troops. It also put stricter limits on the United States role in protecting Iraq's borders and said the conflict required a political rather than a military solution.

Mr. Reid said the Democrats were determined to move legislatively on the war after finishing work on a domestic security measure.

Senate Democrats were somewhat defensive about their internal divisions, which have left them open to criticism that unlike the House of Representatives, they have yet to weigh in with a strong vote on the war even though public dissatisfaction with it contributed to their election gains in November.

"We've only been in the majority for six weeks," said Senator Patty Murray of Washington, another member of the leadership, adding that there had been dozens of committee hearings about what to do. "We are working our way for how to do it right," she said, "and that's a lot better than we've done in the last three to four years."

Mr. Reid sought to play down any party divisions, saying Democrats were united behind the broad idea that the "war in Iraq is going wrong." He noted that 49 senators, nearly all of them Democrats, sought unsuccessfully last month to force a vote on a proposal opposing the administration's troop buildup in Iraq but were thwarted procedurally by Republicans.

Even as the Democrats searched for a policy solution, the political sensitivity over trying to restrict war spending was brought into sharp focus on Thursday.

Senator Kent Conrad, Democrat of North Dakota and chairman of the Budget Committee, raised the idea of cutting $20 billion from the president's $145 billion request for next year for Iraq and Afghanistan. But he quickly dropped that idea after fellow Democrats insisted on keeping the president's number in the nonbinding budget framework that is the first step toward bills financing all of the government's programs, not just the war.

Democrats in the House and the Senate say that even with popular sentiment against the war, trying to agree on how to influence its course is proving much more difficult than some had anticipated.

In the Senate, a working group of nine Democratic senators and their senior aides have been meeting privately throughout the week, trying to resolve their disagreements on how to limit the president's war authority.

"It's tricky finding the right formula where you can express the reservations about what's going on without interrupting legitimate military activities that are being conducted because we're there," said Senator Jim Webb, a Virginia Democrat who was elected last fall. "That's the debate right now."

GOP Regroups To Foil War Plans Of Democrats (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Republicans in Congress -- including most who have defected from President Bush's plan to send reinforcements to Iraq -- have closed ranks and are prepared to thwart the Democrats' continued efforts to undermine the war strategy.

Most of the 17 House Republicans who voted for a resolution against the troop-surge plan -- which was about half the number predicted by Democrats -- now oppose moves to cut war funding or attach conditions to appropriations bills that would hamstring the war effort.

DOJ_NMG_0138946

All but one of the seven Senate Republicans that backed the anti-surge resolution in their chamber say they will not support any funding cuts. The one other dissident Republican -- Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska -- declined to comment on the issue.

"I don't think we should micromanage the war or tie the president's hands," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, a Virginia Republican who last month voted with Democrats to pass a nonbinding resolution disapproving of Mr. Bush's plan to deploy 21,500 more troops.

"The question of the surge was one of policy [and] an opportunity for me to express my frustration with the policy," Mr. Davis said. "But when it comes to conducting the war, that is the president's authority. ... We have to close ranks behind him and allow this [plan] to work."

Rep. Phil English of Pennsylvania, another Republican now supporting the president after helping pass the nonbinding resolution, called the Democrats' proposals "a direct body blow to U.S. troops."

Democrats have struggled to appease their anti-war support base while not exposing themselves to criticism for endangering troops in the field. Their leaders have continued to block proposals from some of their rank and file to cut off war funding, which is Congress' chief weapon and would end U.S. involvement in Iraq.

The leadership, nevertheless, remains determined to block the president's war plan with moves somewhat shy of pulling the funding plug.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, intends to put forward a plan to either curb funding or presidential war powers later this month.

"We are prepared to give the troops everything they need," Reid spokesman Jim Manley said. "The goal is to redeploy the troops and bring as many home as soon as possible."

House Democrats are considering putting conditions on the war funding, such as requiring the president to certify that troops meet stringent readiness standards before deployment, that would make it difficult if not impossible to deploy reinforcements.

A series of ideas to incrementally restrict funding have failed to gain traction, including a proposal last week by Rep. John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat leading the anti-war push.

Mr. Murtha, chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee, wants to effectively stop the surge in midstream by amending the war-funding bill to limit troops to one-year stints in Iraq with at least one year at home between deployments. The troops also would have to be certified as fully trained and equipped before being deployed.

"If they want to cut the funding, they ought to have the courage to stand up and do it forthright," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican.

"So let's quit hiding in the shadow of the tree, trying to decide what [the Democrats'] strategy is," he said. "They have no strategy to stop the war. They have no strategy to win the war."

Panetta Dismayed By Party's War Debate (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

A senior Democratic adviser said yesterday he is disappointed and dismayed by the efforts of House and Senate Democrats to change administration policies in Iraq, predicting they would lead to further division and stalemate in Congress on the war.

"If you stand back, the whole debate has been pretty frustrating. The bigger problem is that [Democratic leaders'] proposals are not going anywhere, such as some revised authority for the war," said Leon Panetta, a key Democratic member of the Iraq Study Group whose proposals to stabilize Iraq were largely dismissed by President Bush.

"But those efforts are doomed. Either they are going to be blocked in Congress or vetoed by the president, or both. The end result is that it will make us more divided and impotent on war policy," President Clinton's former White House chief of staff said in an interview with The Washington Times.

Mr. Panetta's blunt complaints about how his party has bungled the war debate underscores a partywide discomfort among many Democrats that their leaders have failed to craft a politically viable compromise that can draw some bipartisan support.

Instead of recent Democratic leadership proposals that would set strict requirements for troop readiness training and deployment, Mr. Panetta wants his party to set performance benchmarks for the Iraqi government, as suggested by the study group.

"The issue shouldn't be about the troops or fighting over what we do there. The issue ought to be over what the Iraqis do. That's where we ought to be focusing our pressure by saying with one voice to the Iraqis, this is what you ought to accomplish. They said they would implement a whole series of political reforms and have yet to do that," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0138947

"Why can't they come up with a proposal to put more pressure on the Iraqis to hold them to these benchmarks," he said.

But other Democratic advisers aren't willing to give up on the possibility that Mr. Bush's troop surge may be able to reduce the violence in Baghdad and stabilize the country. They think the Democrats should give the administration six months before attempting to impose funding cuts or other sanctions against the war.

"A lot of [the Democrats'] efforts have been pointless," said Michael O'Hanlon, a senior foreign policy analyst at the Brookings Institution who advises Democrats on national security issues.

"So I think, rather than monkeying around [with anti-war legislation], they should wait until the fall and basically say, whether you like Bush's handling of the war or not, at least recognize it is reasonable that it could work and give it six more months," Mr. O'Hanlon said.

That view, though, appears to have little support among Democrats in Congress who have been trying to come up with legislation that can unite anti-war liberals who want to force a pullout and more moderate members who want other alternatives.

Despite the Democrats' midterm election victory, largely because of growing opposition to the war, Mr. O'Hanlon said. "I don't think the American public endorsed a Democratic alternative on Iraq. They became frustrated with Bush on his strategy and wanted that strategy challenged."

Vice President Says U.S. Troop Withdrawal From Iraq Could Worsen War In Afghanistan, Elsewhere (WP/AP)

By Tom Raum

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney said Thursday night that a too-soon withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq could send victorious militants spreading out, with some flocking to Afghanistan to fight alongside a regrouping Taliban. He demanded that the Democratic-controlled Congress support President Bush's military buildup "on time and in full."

Speaking before a receptive audience of conservatives, the vice president -- just back from a trip that included unannounced stops in Afghanistan and Pakistan -- sharply criticized efforts by some Democrats to restrict funds for additional troops or to place restrictions on their deployment.

While noting that the House had already passed a nonbinding resolution voicing opposition to Bush's Iraq policy, Cheney said that "very soon both houses of Congress will have to vote on a piece of legislation that is binding." The legislation would, among other things, help pay for the additional 21,500 troops Bush is sending to Iraq.

"I sincerely hope the discussion this time will be about winning in Iraq, not about posturing on Capitol Hill. Anyone can say they support the troops, and we should take them at their word. But the proof will come when it's time to provide the money and the support," Cheney said. "We expect the House and the Senate to meet those needs on time and in full."

The vice president spoke at an annual dinner of the Conservative Political Action Conference. The audience included conservative activists, leaders and policymakers.

Cheney mentioned his just-ended visits to Afghanistan and Pakistan. In Afghanistan, a bombing at the gate of the military base where the vice president was staying killed 23 people, including two Americans. The Taliban claimed the attack was aimed at Cheney, but officials said it posed no real threat to him.

During his visit to Pakistan, Cheney expressed concern to President Gen. Pervez Musharraf over al-Qaida's regrouping inside Pakistan's tribal regions and an expected Taliban spring offensive in neighboring Afghanistan.

"If our coalition withdrew before Iraqis could defend themselves, radical factions would battle for dominance. The violence would likely spread throughout the country and be very difficult to contain. Having tasted victory in Iraq, the (militants) would look for new missions. Many would head for Afghanistan to fight alongside the Taliban," Cheney said.

He said others would head for capitals across the Middle East and work to undermine moderate governments. "Still others would find their targets and victims in other countries on other continents. Such chaos and mounting danger does not have to occur. It is, however, the enemy's objective," Cheney said.

"In these circumstances, it's worth reminding ourselves that, like it or not, the enemy we face in the war on terror has made Iraq the primary front in that war," he added. Then, to laughter and applause, Cheney said, "To use a popular phrase, this is an inconvenient truth."

It was a play on the Academy Award-winning environmental documentary featuring former Vice President Al Gore, "An Inconvenient Truth."

"If you support the war on terror, then it only makes sense to support it where the terrorists are fighting us," Cheney said.

Cheney also recited a litany of conservative themes and goals, invoking the memory of Ronald Reagan and calling on Congress to "make all tax cuts permanent" that were enacted in Bush's first term.

DOJ_NMG_0138948

"You've come to Washington at a very eventful time, with a new Congress at work and some very consequential debates under way," Cheney said.

"With a divided government, and strong feelings on both sides of the aisle, getting things done is a bit more of a challenge than it was before. But the American people expect results and the president and I are committed to working with Congress for the good of the country. What we will not do is abandon the conservative principles we ran on in 2000 and 2004."

Baghdad Sees Day With Little Bloodshed (USAT/AP)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD — Baghdad experienced one of its least violent days in months Thursday when there were two reported bombings and one fatality.

The relative lull in violence came in the third week of a U.S.-Iraqi plan to improve security in Baghdad. President Bush has ordered an increase of 17,500 U.S. troops in the capital to conduct house-to-house searches and help disarm sectarian militias.

A U.S. military report said Monday that the number of roadside bombs was down 20% since the security initiative began in mid-February and sectarian murders were at their lowest levels in a year.

The day was not completely calm. A bomb exploded on a minibus carrying employees of the capital's provincial council, killing one person and injuring four in an eastern neighborhood.

A roadside bomb exploded alongside the convoy of Jalal Eddin al-Sagheer, a prominent Shiite cleric whose ties to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki have made him the target of past assassination attempts. The imam was not injured, but several bodyguards were wounded.

Al-Sagheer said his convoy was blasted in a Sunni area of southwest Baghdad en route from the airport.

"They targeted me again," he said but declined to blame any specific group. Al-Sagheer has had close calls in the past, which he said were linked to his denunciations of Sunni insurgents and foreign jihadists such as al-Qaeda in Iraq.

There was artillery fire in Baghdad after nightfall. In recent days, U.S. gunners have pummeled areas of south Baghdad suspected of being a staging ground for car bombings and other attacks.

U.S. and Iraqi forces discussed an agreement to expand the security sweep into the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City. Such a move would test the willingness of the powerful Mahdi Army militia to grant its American foes access to all parts of Baghdad under its control.

Sadr City leaders and a U.S.-Iraqi military delegation studied plans to establish an "operational base" in the district, said Rahim al-Daraji, one of the two mayors of Sadr City. "We discussed ways to coordinate … and define the movements of these troops," he said.

Also Thursday:

·In the Sunni militant stronghold of Fallujah, 40 miles west of Baghdad, a bomb-rigged car exploded near a convoy heading to a police officer's wedding. At least five people were killed and 10 injured, police Lt. Wessam Mohammad said. The bride and groom were not harmed.

·In his first interview since he was hospitalized Sunday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said he was in good health and would return to his country but gave no date.

"I enjoy good health, despite the rumors you've heard," Talabani, 73, told Associated Press Television News at the King Hussein Medical Center, a hospital in the Jordanian capital of Amman.

Talabani collapsed Sunday in northern Iraq, suffering from exhaustion and dehydration caused by lung and sinus infections. He was flown to Jordan for treatment later the same day.

Pentagon Stays Cautious But Sees Progress In Iraq (AFP)

AFP, March 2, 2007

Three weeks after the launch of the new US strategy in Iraq, Pentagon officials were cautious Thursday saying early signs were good, but that it was too soon to make concrete conclusions.

"I would say, just looking at the reports from the people on the ground ... I think their assessment would be, 'It's too early to draw any conclusions,' because this is still in the early stages," Pentagon number two Gordon England said.

But the deputy defense secretary acknowledged at a Senate committee hearing on the 2008 budget that there had been reports of fewer sectarian killings in the country.

Admiral Edmund Giambastiani, the deputy chief-of-staff, stressed that the US administration was not prepared to make definite conclusions on "just a week or two of statistics to indicate an overall trend."

"However, we do see sectarian killings are down right now. And that's substantial. And we hope that that trend continues. But it's not really a trend yet," he told the committee.

DOJ_NMG_0138949

Giambastiani said he had talked to Lieutenant General David Petraeus the commander of US forces in Iraq on Wednesday "and he relayed that the sectarian killings are down."

"One other potential bright spot -- potential, I mention -- is that the sectarian migration from Baghdad, for example, and throughout the country, is also down."

The US Army announced on February 7 that the US-Iraq security plan unveiled in January by President George W. Bush was being fully implemented.

Under the plan, Bush, the commander-in-chief of US forces, is deploying some 21,500 extra US combat troops to Iraq to quell the violence in Baghdad and Anbar province.

Iraq's Displaced Trickle Home (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD — At a time of epic displacement, Fuad Khamis has done something extraordinary: He has moved back home.

"When I arrived, I was overwhelmed and frightened at the same time," says Khamis, a Sunni Arab taxi driver from Baghdad's religiously mixed Sadiya neighborhood.

His house was damaged and there wasn't a piece of furniture left. But the father of five says his Shiite neighbors have welcomed him back with hugs and kisses.

Encouraged by a major security clampdown that began Feb. 13, and reassurances from his neighbors, Khamis is one of the first to test Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's recent pledge to reverse the tide of sectarian "cleansing" sweeping Baghdad and move tens of thousands of people back home.

Launched after years of unchecked violence between Sunni Arabs and Shiites, the program faces major hurdles, including a dearth of confidence among many of the city's residents in the government's ability to secure their neighborhoods.

"I believe in miracles and fairy tales, but not in the government's intention or ability to move the displaced back into their homes," says Hussein Azaidi, a Shiite Muslim with years of poverty etched on his face who now finds shelter in an abandoned school in Baghdad's teeming Sadr City area.

Even if the government can convince families that their old neighborhoods are safe, there is no guarantee they can regain their homes. Many residences have been looted or torched, others commandeered by gunmen or occupied by families fleeing violence elsewhere.

U.S. reservations

Maliki has taken a tough line, labeling as terrorists everyone living in homes that were taken by force and informing parliament they would be arrested.

But the U.S. military, which is to contribute 17,500 troops to the Baghdad crackdown, says its forces won't help the government evict squatters. U.S. officials believe it is a recipe for further abuses.

"It's a no-win situation," says Col. Douglass S. Heckman, senior U.S. advisor to the 9th Iraqi Army Division in east Baghdad.

Acknowledging the complications, Iraq's Cabinet on Thursday gave occupants an extra two weeks to vacate the homes of the displaced or obtain written permission to remain.

Maliki's government does not have the means to carry out a major resettlement program. Abdul Samad Sultan, minister of migration and displacement, expects many families will go home on their own once they see it is safe. They are being offered about $200 to help with the cost of the move. Apart from that, Sultan can only offer to issue badges allowing their return to contested areas and ask their erstwhile neighbors to write letters welcoming them back.

"I think that the Iraqi people have big hearts and can forgive the past," Sultan says. "They have seen the results of violence."

As many as 1,000 families have trickled back to areas such as Madaen, Shaab and Mahmoudiya, the Migration Ministry says. But they are a small portion of the total number of displaced.

Across Iraq, as many as 540,000 people have fled their homes since February 2006, when the bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra unleashed waves of sectarian killing, according to a recent report by the Santa Monica-based International Medical Corps. About 80% of the displaced are from the greater Baghdad area, the group says.

The government's resettlement plan hinges on the ability of the U.S.-backed army and police to clear out sectarian gunmen and maintain a presence so the criminals do not return, as they have in the past. But many residents say they feel safer under the protection of their sects' militias than the government.

DOJ_NMG_0138950

Azaidi lived most of his life in Balad Ruz, a religiously mixed town northeast of Baghdad. When he sent his son to the market one afternoon, Sunni Arab gunmen snatched the youth, beat him to a bloody mess and sent him home with a message: Leave within three days or suffer the consequences.

The next morning, Azaidi moved his family to Sadr City, the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr and his powerful Al Mahdi militia.

It was Sadr's representatives who found Azaidi a place to stay and helped him collect his monthly food ration.

But Sunnis accuse the same movement of driving them out of Sadr City and many formerly mixed districts. Hoping to avoid a showdown, Sadr officials have endorsed the security crackdown and invited Sunnis to return to Sadr City — an offer few show any sign of accepting.

Warning under the door

Each wave of displacement has fueled the next as gunmen in one neighborhood force out members of the rival sect to make room for their co-religionists fleeing other districts.

Sabah Hassan, a Sunni police officer, ignored the first warning to leave the religiously mixed Amal neighborhood, which was slipped under his door last year, tucked into an envelope with a bullet. But when two of his brothers were abducted, he fled, leaving furniture, identification documents and a lifetime of memories behind.

The next day, Hassan sent his mother back to the house to collect a few belongings. But members of the local Sadr bureau had already moved in a displaced Shiite family, he said, and painted a warning on the wall: "Not to be rented or sold."

In some neighborhoods, families have asked neighbors to keep an eye on their homes, or rented them out to members of the dominant sect in their area.

For months, Hussain Mansour held out as fellow Sunnis fled the whispered warnings, threatening letters, cruising gunmen and bullet-riddled bodies that appeared overnight in his mostly Shiite neighborhood of Kadhimiya.

A year ago, gunmen burst into the home of Mansour's devout brother and shot him in the face in front of his family. Last summer, his uncle was gunned down as he carried groceries home. When Mansour went to the local Al Mahdi militiamen to ask for protection, he said most of them laughed.

"They were making fun of me, telling me they would skin me alive," he said. "I have never been so afraid."

Finally, a Shiite neighbor came to Mansour with a proposal. The man's relatives lived in a Sunni part of Baghdad and had received an anonymous letter demanding that they leave. Why not swap houses?

Mansour, a sad-eyed shopkeeper whom friends had called "the last of the Mohicans," didn't think twice. But he is miserable with the arrangement.

His new home is smaller, the furniture is old, and the roof leaks. But it's not just his house that he misses. "It's my memories, my childhood, it's where I grew up," he says. "No one wants to bury his good memories."

If Maliki's plan works, Mansour says, he will be the first to move back. But he holds out little hope.

The plan targets only Baghdad residents forced from their homes since the Samarra bombing — a small fraction of the total affected by decades of displacement stretching back to the darkest days of Saddam Hussein's rule.

About 1.8 million of Iraq's 26 million people have been internally displaced, and about 2 million others have fled to nearby countries, according to the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, which calls the exodus the largest movement of people in the Middle East since the creation of Israel in 1948.

Many still waiting

Iraq's government has had little success untangling previous rounds of displacement. Thousands of ethnic Kurds still live in squalid camps around the oil-rich city of Kirkuk, waiting for authorities to resolve property disputes dating back to their relocation under Hussein's policy of "Arabization," introduced in the 1970s.

In the mostly Shiite south, Sunni Arabs face mounting pressure from paramilitary groups such as Al Mahdi and the rival Badr Brigade.

Many have fled to Sunni-dominated cities in the center and north of Iraq but have struggled to adjust.

Humanitarian workers suggest that it would be more realistic to help the displaced find homes and jobs in their new communities than to try to send them home.

But, says Rafiq Tschannen, the International Organization for Migration's chief for Iraq, "nobody has the courage to admit that it is likely to be permanent."

Khamis, the taxi driver, is keeping his options open.

"Pain filled my heart," he says, the day he left Sadiya after receiving a threatening letter. Now U.S. and Iraqi forces patrol the neighborhood.

If they stay, so will Khamis. Otherwise, he says, he will leave Iraq for good.

DOJ_NMG_0138951

'Surge' Needs Up To 7,000 More Troops (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's planned increase of U.S. forces in Iraq will require as many as 28,500 troops, Pentagon officials told a Senate committee Thursday.

Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England also told the Senate Budget Committee that it will be clear within months whether the so-called surge in forces has succeeded in helping secure Iraq.

"By this summer we would have a much better indication in terms of the success of the program," England said. "And so at that time we would adjust however is appropriate to do so."

In January, Bush said he would send 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq. England said 6,000 to 7,000 support troops will be needed to back up the larger combat force.

England's estimate differed from a Congressional Budget Office (CBO) estimate last month that as many as 28,000 extra troops would be needed to support the increase.

Requests already have been granted for 2,400 support troops, said Adm. Edmund Giambastiani, vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He said there are additional requests for 4,000 more.

Existing logistics bases, many of them in and around Baghdad, will limit the number of new support troops needed, Giambastiani said.

There are about 10,000 soldiers in Iraq now associated with the troop increase, according to Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman. In all, there are about 140,000 U.S. troops now in Iraq.

The increase in troops is expected to peak in May, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Pentagon officials stressed that the additional troops will be properly equipped. Army Brig. Gen. Charles Anderson, director of force modernization, said in a briefing this week that they will have the body and vehicle armor they need.

Giambastiani also said the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan had affected the military's ability to deal with threats from other countries but not its ability to win a conflict.

"What will happen is there will be some added risk with regard to the time it takes us to be victorious or to win," he said. "And, potentially, you'll have some additional casualties. But let there be no mistake: We can get our job done if another crisis comes about."

Meanwhile, top members of the Senate Budget Committee scoffed at Pentagon estimates that the troop increase would cost $5.6 billion. By contrast, the CBO estimated the cost of sustaining 35,000 troops there, and determined it could be as much as $20 billion.

"Put me down as a skeptic on the $5.6 billion," said Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad, D-N.D.

"It's obvious the $5.6 billion is a number that's not accurate," added Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., the panel's top Republican.

7 At A Baghdad Wedding Are Killed By A Car Bomb (NYT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 1 — A car bomb that was apparently aimed at a policeman's wedding party in Falluja, west of Baghdad, killed seven guests on Thursday and wounded six, the local police said.

The attack appeared to be part of a mounting battle in western Iraq between insurgents with ties to Al Qaeda and other local and tribal groups, local residents said.

The bomb exploded in the late afternoon as the wedding party was gathering at the home of the groom, a policeman. Neither the bride nor the groom was wounded, but those killed were friends and relatives of the couple, said Abu Khalid, a cousin of the groom.

"Extremists are targeting the police, especially after the police increased arrests and pressure on members of armed groups in the last two weeks," he said, noting that there had been bombings in two nearby towns, including one at a mosque in Habbaniya that killed more than 30 people.

Falluja, in the Sunni-dominated Anbar Province about 35 miles west of Baghdad, has been a violent place since shortly after the American invasion in 2003. In 2004, it became an informal headquarters for the anti-American insurgency. After a lengthy United States military campaign emptied much of the city later that year, it was briefly quiet.

Violence has been increasing there in the past several months, with attacks by insurgents against local residents who want the gunmen to leave the area and counterattacks by local and tribal groups.

DOJ_NMG_0138952

A similar fight was under way on Thursday in Amiriyat al Falluja, a community just to the south, where insurgents whom residents described as being allied with Al Qaeda attacked. Two groups that have had ties to insurgents, the Islamic Party Fighters and forces of the 20th Revolution brigade, counterattacked in support of the local residents, apparently having turned against those insurgents because of their links to Al Qaeda.

The United States military also announced that a marine was killed by enemy fire on Wednesday in Anbar Province.

In Baghdad, where a new security plan is in its third week, the daylight hours were relatively quiet, with one civilian killed by an explosive device. Around 9:30 p.m., there was a battery of large explosions and a period of quiet and then more explosions, but there was only sketchy information about their origin.

The Ministry of Defense said that the blasts had come from the area of an American base in southern Baghdad and that they appeared to have been American attacks against insurgent strongholds in a violent Sunni neighborhood called Dora.

The Iraqi government announced Thursday that it had arrested 83 militants and rounded up 55 other suspects in the previous 24 hours. Troops also seized weapons and explosives, the government said.

In Baquba, north of Baghdad, the police found the bodies of nine people, some of whom had been shot. It was not clear how the others had died. In Mahaweel, about 40 miles south of Baghdad, a bomb exploded in a busy market, killing seven people, the local police said.

Before dawn on Thursday, an OH-58 Kiowa helicopter, generally used for reconnaissance, was forced to make a hard landing south of Kirkuk, the military said. The two soldiers on board were injured, but the injuries were not life threatening, the military said.

A military spokesman said a preliminary investigation found that the helicopter's problems were caused by mechanical failure, not hostile fire. In recent weeks, ground fire has downed at least eight helicopters.

Iraqi Troops, Tribesmen Kill 50 Suspected Insurgents (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 1 -- Iraqi security forces backed by Sunni tribesmen killed dozens of suspected Sunni insurgents over several hours of fighting Wednesday in a village in western Iraq, Iraqi police officials said Thursday.

The fighting was unusually fierce for an Iraqi-led operation and was also notable because of the collaboration of tribesmen in volatile Anbar province. In recent months, the U.S. military has aligned itself with dozens of tribal sheiks who are collaborating in an effort to drive the Sunni insurgent group Al-Qaeda in Iraq from the vast desert territory.

The clashes on Wednesday began about 1 p.m. when insurgents attacked a village near Fallujah, about 35 miles west of Baghdad, and ended about six hours later when Iraqi soldiers, police and the tribal fighters killed 50 suspected insurgents and captured 80 others, according to Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry. Khalaf declined to say how many Iraqi security personnel were killed or injured.

"This is part of the Interior Ministry strategy to support the Baghdad security plan in targeting terrorism in the areas surrounding Baghdad," he said. "The tribes in this area refused to join al-Qaeda."

Two U.S. Marines died in apparently unrelated fighting in Anbar on Wednesday, the military said. The Marines' name were not released.

In Baghdad, a U.S. military commander said American and Iraqi forces would launch "full-scale operations" inside the expansive Shiite district of Sadr City, according to [a] news agency. U.S. forces do not maintain a visible, full-time presence in the militia stronghold but have increasingly used targeted raids to capture leaders of the Mahdi Army, the thousands-strong band of gunmen led by anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The district is highly sensitive politically, both because Sadr is a supporter of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and because the Mahdi Army, which fought U.S. forces in two major battles in 2004, has the capability of amassing a formidable force.

"We have conducted special operations in Sadr City for some months, but this will be the first time we will launch full-scale operations there and the first time we will have a permanent presence there," Col. Billy Don Farris, commander of the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade, told [a news agency].

"We are going to go to every building and every house and incrementally clear the area," he said.

A U.S. military spokeswoman in Iraq, Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, declined to comment about future operations.

A spokesman for Sadr, Abdul Razak al-Nadawi, said the Mahdi Army would not react with force to U.S. operations because Sadr has asked his followers to "calm down and to show self-control against what is done by the occupation."

As the Baghdad security plan entered its third week, an additional 3,100 U.S. soldiers from the 4th Brigade, 1st Infantry Division, based at Fort Riley in Kansas, arrived in the capital, bringing the total number of new U.S. troops to nearly 6,000. President Bush is sending 21,500 troops to Iraq in an attempt to stem rampant sectarian fighting.

DOJ_NMG_0138953

Also Thursday, two U.S. military pilots were injured when an Army OH-58 Kiowa helicopter endured a so-called hard landing south of Kirkuk, in northern Iraq. The military said the helicopter did not appear to have been shot down and instead landed because of mechanical problems.

A resident of a nearby village said he heard a loud crash about 1 a.m. and saw the helicopter on the ground later that morning. The damaged helicopter was taken by truck to the main U.S. air base in Kirkuk.

New Signs Of US-Syria Thaw As Senior Official Sets Visit (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, March 2, 2007

Washington announced Thursday that it was sending a high-ranking official to Syria for the first time in two years, a move seen as a fresh sign of a possible thaw between Washington and Damascus.

Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey will travel to Damascus "in coming weeks" as part of a regional tour dealing with "humanitarian issues related to Iraqi refugees," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

Seeking to play down the diplomatic significance of the trip, McCormack said Sauerbrey would be "paired" on the tour with a representative of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). "It's not a bilateral mission," he said.

But he said Sauerbrey, who handles refugee and migration affairs at the State Department, would be authorized to meet with her Syrian counterparts to discuss the refugee issue.

She will also visit Jordan and possibly other countries in the region, he said.

Sauerbrey will be the highest ranking US official to visit Syria since early 2005, when Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage travelled to Damascus.

The United States withdrew its ambassador from Syria after Syrian authorities were implicated in the February 2005 assassination in Beirut of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri.

The administration of President George W. Bush has since refused high-level contacts with Syria, which it accuses of backing anti-US insurgents in neighboring Iraq and supporting efforts by the Lebanese Islamic movement Hezbollah to topple the pro-Western government of Lebanon.

But in a sudden policy shift, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced this week that she and other US officials would join their Syrian and Iranian counterparts in coming weeks at conferences on Iraq's future.

McCormack has refused to rule out bilateral contacts with Syrian and Iranian officials on the sidelines of those meetings, leaving the door ajar for what would amount to a major switch in Bush's policy of shunning what he considers rogue regimes.

The government had already lifted its diplomatic boycott on North Korea, holding bilateral meetings in recent weeks which helped produce a breakthrough six-nation deal two weeks ago under which Pyongyang agreed to the phased abandonment of its nuclear program in exchange for aid and recognition.

Senior officials from the two governments will begin direct negotiations in New York next week on normalizing relations as part of that agreement.

McCormack and other government spokesmen insisted this week that Washington is not ready for such a rapprochement with either Syria or Iran, saying any bilateral contacts in coming weeks would deal only with Iraq-related issues.

They explicitly ruled out any direct talks on Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program or Syrian desires to regain influence in Lebanon, a country it occupied until mass protests forced it to withdraw its troops after Hariri's slaying.

He said Sauerbrey's talks would focus solely on the crisis created by some two million Iraqis who have fled the sectarian bloodshed in their country, 600,000 of them to Syria and another 600,000 to Jordan.

Criticized earlier this year for its response to the refugee crisis fueled by its 2003 invasion of Iraq, Washington announced a series of measures last month, including boosting aid to the UNHCR and taking in 7,000 Iraqi asylum seekers.

Sauerbrey's mission in Syria will be to follow up on those plans, McCormack said.

"There's a point of mutual interest here," he said.

"They have an interest in dealing with the problem of refugee flows into Syria and the humanitarian situation there. We have an interest in seeing that the humanitarian situation is addressed," he said.

"On that point, certainly we want to work together."

Vietnamese Refugees Identify With Iraqis (USAT)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

My parents arrived in the United States as political refugees from an unpopular war. As part of the first wave of South Vietnamese refugees fleeing their country after the fall of Saigon, they had little choice in the transpacific move. To remain in Vietnam meant risking poverty, political persecution and possibly death. America was their opportunity to rebuild their lives, but they knew better than to think it would be easy.

DOJ_NMG_0138954

Many Americans who wanted to forget about the war saw the Vietnamese refugees as painful reminders of the lives the country lost. A 1975 poll found that only 36% of Americans favored Vietnamese immigration. For my parents, still reeling from the end of the war and the separation from their families, this sentiment reminded them their struggles were not over. Their accents gave them away. When asking for help, they got responses such as: "Can't you speak proper English?" "You are not welcome here."

My parents are the first to point out how rarely these incidents occurred, though the ugly words stick in their memories decades later. What they prefer to remember instead are the Americans who did welcome them; the church volunteers and government employees who taught them English, signed them up for driving lessons, prepared them for job interviews. They helped create an environment where Vietnamese-American communities could grow, a place my family now considers home. My parents saw their generosity and patience as the very best of America.

These are qualities necessary to help a new generation of refugees emerging from our most recent war. With the Iraqi refugees count nearing 2 million, according to United Nations reports, and the U.S. government's recent plans to welcome 7,000 refugees for resettlement, a new community of Iraqi-Americans is inevitable. How Americans plan to respond to them and facilitate their resettlement is crucial. Certainly the culture shock will be immense, as it was for Vietnamese refugees. Iraqi refugees will not only have to deal with a new language and customs, but also the fear of anti-Iraqi sentiment. Considering the role U.S. foreign policy has had on Iraqis' lives and displacement, it is the government's responsibility to offer them the resources to salvage their community.

A new exhibit on the Vietnamese immigration experience recently opened at the Smithsonian in Washington, chronicling how far the Vietnamese-American community has come in 30 years. It is living proof that some good can come from a terrible war. America can help Iraqi refugees create a similar future.

Aimee Phan is author of We Should Never Meet and an assistant professor of English at Washington State University in Pullman, Wash.

How Much Embassy Is Too Much? (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Mention the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad to Lawrence Eagleburger and he explodes.

"I defy anyone to tell me how you can use that many people. It is nuts . . . it's insane and it's counterproductive . . . and it won't work," says the Republican former secretary of state and member of the Iraq Study Group. "I've been around the State Department long enough to know you can't run an outfit like that."

The nerve center of Iraq reconstruction efforts, housed in an ornate former Saddam Hussein palace with soaring ceilings and its own espresso bar, the embassy in Baghdad is one of the largest foreign missions ever operated by the State Department. Its complexity and expense, some say, hampers reconstruction efforts and drains cash from diplomatic efforts worldwide.

According to a State Department count, about 1,000 federal employees report to the U.S. Embassy in Iraq, not including hundreds of private contractors. State Department personnel are assigned to roughly half the slots in Baghdad, and the rest are reserved for an array of agencies, including about 90 from the Justice Department, 20 from the Department of Homeland Security, and four each from the Commerce Department and the Transportation Department. They are needed, officials say, to rebuild transit and mail services, to assist small businesses, to advise politicians and peasants.

The mission's closely guarded budget is a source of controversy at State, and across the federal government. At $923 million for the 2006 fiscal year, the budget was 20 times that of the Beijing embassy's that year, according to the State Department. More than two-thirds of the money pays for security. Salaries for about 600 staff from other federal agencies are not included in that figure, nor are some expenses.

"Maintaining an oversized mega-embassy in Baghdad is draining personnel and resources away from every other U.S. embassy around the world, and all for what?" said a senior State Department official, who spoke anonymously because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Travel outside the Green Zone requires a security entourage and involves weeks of organization. The embassy is seen as a key target for violence, which, along with fear of reprisals, makes many Iraqis afraid to visit. Consequently, Americans who work there see relatively few of the people they are there to help.

"Diplomats, in order to carry out their mission, need to be able to get out regularly and move about freely to cultivate professional relationships with a broad cross-section of contacts in local government and society," said Steve Kashkett, State

DOJ_NMG_0138955

Department vice president for the American Foreign Service Association, the department's labor union and professional association. "If security conditions prevent them from doing so, it raises legitimate questions about the usefulness of a heavily staffed embassy."

"Just because we can't travel as freely as in a European capital doesn't mean we can't do our job," said a State Department official who declined to be named because he wasn't authorized to speak for the record.

The teeming embassy masks a desperate need for civilians to aid the reconstruction effort. To lure more, federal employees are offered 70 percent more than their base salaries for Iraq service, plus overtime, or special premiums for working long hours, according to the Office of Personnel Management. It is possible for senior employees to earn more than the secretary of state, who makes $186,600 a year. Kashkett said 1,700 diplomats have stepped up for Iraq service since 2003 -- about 20 percent of those eligible to go. The State Department has discussed drafting personnel.

The blunt view, from Eagleburger: "We're throwing people and money at something without estimating what the culture demands. It's hubris."

Turkey Late To Wish Talabani Well (WT)

By Nicholas Birch

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

ISTANBUL -- Messages of good will have been flooding in since Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, an ethnic Kurd, was hospitalized in Jordan on Sunday. But a get-well wish from Turkey, one of Iraq's large neighbors, did not come until yesterday.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan called Mr. Talabani to convey his get-well wishes, an aide to Mr. Erdogan said.

"They had a brief conversation. Mr. Talabani said he believed that Turkey and Iraq can work together to quickly overcome their problems," the official told Agence France-Presse.

Mr. Talabani collapsed Sunday in northern Iraq from exhaustion and dehydration caused by lung and sinus infections. He was flown to Jordan for treatment later that day.

The delayed reaction from Turkey is not altogether surprising: It took Ankara nearly 70 years and over 20 Kurdish rebellions to get around to acknowledging the existence of its own Kurds. But with Iraq at a critical juncture, analysts fear its reticence limits its effectiveness as a regional power.

Washington agreed this week to participate in an international conference on Iraq, but Turkey itself remains embroiled in a bitter row about whether or not to talk to Iraq's federal Kurdish authorities.

For months, Ankara has been pressuring Washington to do something about 5,000 Turkish Kurdish separatists in northern Iraq.

Tensions between Ankara and the Iraqi Kurds have been running high over the safe haven Turkish Kurd rebels reportedly have in the autonomous Kurdish region in northern Iraq, led by Massoud Barzani.

The Turkish army last month accused Iraqi Kurds of supporting the rebels and providing them with explosives for attacks in Turkey.

Despite objections from the military, Mr. Erdogan and Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul have both said Ankara is open to dialogue with the Iraqi Kurds to mend fences and discuss ways of curbing the rebels, contrary to earlier Turkish threats of a cross-border military operation into the region.

Two weeks ago, under U.S. pressure, Turkey half-heartedly signaled its willingness to begin talking with Iraqi Kurds. It hastily beat a retreat after Yasar Buyukanit, Turkey's top general, expressed his opposition.

Iraqi Kurds deny Gen. Buyukanit's assertions they are helping the separatists. While the Iraqi Kurds may be right, analysts say there is little doubt the Iraqis see the Turkish separatists as a potential bargaining chip in their efforts to get their hands on the oil-rich city of Kirkuk at a referendum planned for later this year.

"They won't do anything until the referendum," Turkish analyst Cengiz Candar said.

Every day brings reports of new Turkish military exercises on Iraq's northern border. Turkish nationalists have been calling for the army to push down to Kirkuk to protect the Turkish-speaking Turkmen community there. A Turkish Kurdish politician said last week that Turkey's Kurds would consider an attack on Kirkuk as an attack on themselves. He was promptly arrested and charged with "inciting enmity."

Turkish commentators say much of this noise is part of a struggle for domestic control between Turkey's religious-minded government and secularists led by the military.

"They're like kids throwing stones at each other," said veteran analyst Mehmet Ali Birand. Both sides have their eyes on presidential elections expected in May. Mr. Erdogan is considering running. Deeply suspicious of him, the army is determined to stop him.

But the pushing and shoving comes at a price.

DOJ_NMG_0138956

"How can Turkey hope to lead regional efforts to find a solution on Iraq" if it recognizes neither Iraq's president, nor the internationally acknowledged leader of federal Iraqi Kurdistan, Mr. Candar said.

Pakistan Captures Former Taliban Official (LAT)

By Laura King And Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN — Pakistani authorities have arrested the former defense minister of the Taliban, the most senior insurgent leader to be seized in five years, a government official said Thursday.

The Pakistani government issued no immediate official statement about the detention of Mullah Obaidullah Akhund this week in the southern city of Quetta.

Local news reports said Akhund was detained Monday, the day U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney arrived for an unannounced visit to urge President Pervez Musharraf to take more robust steps against Islamic militants finding haven in Pakistan's tribal region bordering Afghanistan.

A U.S. intelligence official said the Pakistani government had mobilized in an effort to show that it was serious about cracking down on the Taliban and other extremist elements in the country.

"The fact that the Pakistanis captured him and are making this known — it shows that they are making a commitment, and that they want to demonstrate that they are committed and doing what they can in this area," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter.

He added that Akhund's capture was "a very significant development but it by no means marks the end of the Taliban."

The U.S. official said that Akhund, in his former Cabinet post, had access to the highest levels of the Taliban.

"As defense minister, was he knowledgeable about Taliban operations, logistics and other matters? Yes," the U.S. official said. "He was a senior official in the Taliban, not of the level of Mullah Omar but a significant figure nonetheless."

Several other Taliban figures were arrested in the Quetta raid, a Pakistani government official said on condition of anonymity.

Although Pakistan is a key ally in the U.S.-led fight against the Taliban, the cause is unpopular in many parts of the country, and the Pakistani government has been reluctant to appear too compliant with U.S. demands.

Quetta, the capital of Baluchistan province, which borders Afghanistan, has long been viewed as a staging ground for the Taliban, though the Pakistani government strenuously denies harboring the Islamic militia. Akhund is a close associate of Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar, a fugitive since 2001.

Last year, Taliban fighters staged their strongest push against allied troops in Afghanistan since being driven from power more than five years ago. More than 4,000 people, mostly militants, died in fighting there last year, and both the Taliban movement and North Atlantic Treaty Organization officials have said they expect confrontations to intensify as the winter ends.

Akhund's arrest is the most high-profile seizure of a Taliban leader inside Pakistan. A spokesman for the militia, Abdul Latif Hakimi, was arrested here in 2005.

The U.S. military has killed some senior Taliban commanders in pinpoint strikes, including Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani, who died in an allied airstrike in December in a remote area of Helmand province, just across the border from Baluchistan.

Mullah Omar, thought to still be a main leader of the insurgency, has eluded capture despite a $25-million bounty on his head.

Much of the militia's day-to-day command is thought to lie with an associate, Mullah Dadullah, who has made frequent public boasts that the Taliban this spring will make its strongest push yet against NATO-led forces.

Pressed By U.S., Pakistan Seizes A Taliban Chief (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 1 — The former Taliban defense minister was arrested in Pakistan on Monday, the day of Vice President Dick Cheney's visit, two government officials said Thursday. He is the most important Taliban member to be captured since the American-led invasion of Afghanistan in 2001.

The man, Mullah Obaidullah, was a senior leader of the Afghan insurgency, which has battled American and NATO forces with increasing intensity over the last year.

He is one of the inner core around Mullah Muhammad Omar, the Taliban leader. The leadership is believed to operate from the relative safety of Quetta, Pakistan, where Mullah Obaidullah was arrested.

DOJ_NMG_0138957

It was not clear whether he was picked up before, during or after Mr. Cheney's visit. But the timing may be significant because Mr. Cheney's mission was intended to press Pakistan to do more to crack down on members of the Taliban and Al Qaeda who use Pakistan as a sanctuary.

Pakistan has come under rising criticism from American and NATO officials for acting against the Taliban and Al Qaeda only under pressure, conducting operations or making arrests timed for high-level official visits, then backing off.

While Mullah Obaidullah's detention may be a sign of a new commiment by Pakistan to move against the Taliban leadership, the arrest also seemed to confirm Western and Afghan intelligence reports that the Taliban were using Pakistan, and particularly Quetta, to organize their insurgency.

Pakistani officials have strenuously denied that the Taliban leadership is based in Pakistan, and there was no official announcement of the detention. But two government officials confirmed the arrest.

A NATO spokesman in Afghanistan, Col. Tom Collins, said he was not aware of any arrest. American government officials in Washington confirmed the capture, but cautioned that the arrest was unlikely to deal a significant setback to the insurgents.

"He's a big fish, but nobody around here thinks this will deal a permanent blow to the operations of the Taliban," said one American government official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the arrest had not been formally announced.

Last year, NATO forces in southern Afghanistan bore the brunt of a resurgent Taliban. They have lost 85 service members since taking over command of southern Afghanistan in August, in suicide bombings, ambushes and often heavy fighting. Commanders and diplomats say it has become increasingly clear that control of the Taliban fighters traced back to Pakistan.

Over the past five months, Pakistan has come under more constant pressure for cooperation than ever, an American official in Afghanistan said recently. Democrats in Congress have raised the possibility of tying military assistance and other financial aid for Pakistan to its performance in fighting terrorism.

President Bush sent an unusually tough message to President Pervez Musharraf, timed to coincide with Mr. Cheney's visit, senior administration officials said.

Pakistani officials answer the criticism by pointing out that their own military has suffered more than any other, losing more than 600 soldiers in fighting with the militants, before the campaigns bogged down and the government reached peace deals with some tribal leaders.

Pakistani intelligence services also assisted the United States military in tracking another top Taliban official, Mullah Akhtar Muhammad Osmani, who was killed Dec. 19 in an American airstrike in southern Afghanistan.

Mullah Osmani was the Taliban's main financial official and was operating both in Pakistan and Afghanistan, and his death was considered an important blow to the insurgents, Colonel Collins said.

The former Taliban foreign minister, Mullah Wakil Ahmad Muttawakil, was detained by American forces in 2002 but was released in 2005 under a government reconciliation program. One of the Taliban's top military commanders, Mullah Fazel, remains imprisoned in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, along with the former Taliban governor of Balkh Province.

Mullah Obaidullah is originally from Panjwai district of Kandahar Province in southern Afghanistan. As recently as December, he gave an interview to [a news agency], boasting that the Taliban had gained in strength and could fight the world's strongest armies, and threatening to step up suicide attacks against foreign military personnel in Afghanistan.

He was often mentioned as being among the four most senior men of what is known as the Quetta Council, the inner circle around Mullah Omar, which is thought to have based itself in or near the city, in southwestern Pakistan.

A former Taliban spokesman, Abdul Latif Hakimi, who was himself arrested in 2005 by the police in Quetta, said Mullah Obaidullah was one of only two people who had direct access to Mullah Omar. He also said that Mullah Obaidullah had personally ordered military operations, including the killing of a foreign aid official in Kabul in March 2005.

Bomb Kills 3 Near School

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 1 — A bomb exploded Thursday in a garbage bin on a crowded shopping street in Farah, in the southwest, killing three civilians and wounding more than 54, including 10 schoolchildren, said Dr. Mohammad Qasim Bayan, the director of health in Farah Province.

The bomb exploded just after 8 a.m. at a busy intersection where laborers gather looking for work and children pass on their way to school. A police convoy was passing at the time of the explosion and the Farah city police chief, Said Aqa Saqib, said he suspected it was a remote-controlled bomb aimed at the convoy.

Chief Saqib said violence was spilling over from Helmand Province, where the Taliban seized control of much of the northern districts, and was aggravated by the government's campaign to eradicate the poppy crop.

An Uneasy Alliance (WSJ)

By Zahid Hussain

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138958

The U.S.-Pakistan partnership that came into being on Sept. 12, 2001 was a shotgun marriage and remains an uneasy alliance. Vice President Dick Cheney's surprise visit to Pakistan earlier this week underscores Washington's frustration with President Pervez Musharraf's inability to contain the activities of al Qaeda and the Taliban in the Afghan border region.

The tension is further heightened as the U.S. Congress considers a bill making aid to Pakistan conditional on more effective action against these threats. The main question is whether this tightening of the noose will produce a positive result, or just make things even more difficult for Pakistan's beleaguered leader in an election year.

Islamabad certainly isn't taking the pressure lying down: A foreign ministry spokesperson warned that Pakistan would not take any dictation from outside. On Wednesday, the outgoing U.S. Ambassador Ryan C. Crocker was told by officials that Pakistan would not allow foreign interference in its internal affairs. Many observers fear that increasing pressure on Gen. Musharraf could strengthen the hardliners in the military who are skeptical of a partnership with the U.S.

Gen. Musharraf's 2001 decision to forge an alliance with the U.S. meant taking Pakistan to war with itself. This war, which has rarely been examined in depth, has pitted the military against the militants, the present against the past, and a political partnership with America against the culture of jihadist radicalism.

The outcome of this struggle will affect not only the fate of Pakistan, but also the ideological climate of the Middle East and the security of the world. Gen. Musharraf has provided the U.S. with active support in the hunt for al Qaeda fugitives. His security forces have captured and delivered to the U.S. several of the most wanted al Qaeda leaders, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Ramzi bin al Shibh, the masterminds of the 9/11 attacks.

But Gen. Musharraf's break with the constituency that backed the Taliban has yet to come, exposing a paradox in his policy. He tried to combat al Qaeda while seeking to avoid direct confrontation with the Taliban remnants and the homegrown Islamic militants. He had to walk a fine line between a military reluctant to break entirely with its radical clients, and his status as America's key strategic partner in the region. The incestuous relationship between jihadist organizations and Pakistan's all-powerful Inter Services Intelligence -- which helped create much of the Islamic militancy and religious extremism that Gen. Musharraf is now confronted with -- has not completely broken down.

The recent spate of religious violence and the increasing number of suicide attacks are a grim reminder that the sectarian terrorist network is not only intact, but has expanded. This raises a serious question about Gen. Musharraf's efforts to combat religious extremism. A major reason for his failure to root out extremism and militancy is the lack of consistency in his policies. Pakistan's sectarian groups and jihadist organizations overlap, and are linked by similar ideological world-views and modes of operation.

Al Qaeda is now breeding a new militant threat in Pakistan. Several new terrorist cells have emerged out of the banned outfits which operate as an extension of al Qaeda. They harbor a new type of young militant coming from educated middle-class backgrounds rather than religious schools. These cells were behind many of the recent terrorist attacks in the country. A good number of these people have been trained in al Qaeda camps in the Waziristan tribal region -- which, according to U.S. intelligence agencies, is the new command center of the terrorist network. Those camps have also been used to train young Muslim radicals from Britain and other countries.

Gen. Musharraf appears to be in a no-win situation. The catastrophic failure of the Pakistan army operation that killed more than 700 Pakistani soldiers in Waziristan forced the authorities to make a truce with the militants. Gen. Musharraf justified the deal saying it would isolate the foreign fighters operating from the tribal region. NATO officials in Afghanistan disagree, saying that the activities of Taliban on the Afghanistan side had increased threefold since Islamabad signed the peace deal in North Waziristan last September.

There is a huge danger that any new military operation in Waziristan under pressure from Washington will divide the army. Over the last couple years, several midlevel army officers have been court-martialed for refusing to fight in Waziristan. But a policy of appeasement would certainly allow al Qaeda and the Taliban to expand their terrorist base. The militants have already established their rule in the North Waziristan tribal region. The situation is more worrying as their influence spreads elsewhere.

These are the fault lines from which a geopolitical earthquake could erupt, making the current situation look positively calm by comparison.

Mr. Hussain, who writes from Pakistan for The Wall Street Journal, is author of "Frontline Pakistan: The Struggle with Militant Islam" (Columbia University Press, 2007).

Report: National Guard Unprepared For Domestic Missions (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138959

WASHINGTON - Stretched thin by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the National Guard is less prepared now than it's ever been to respond to a major terrorist attack, a natural disaster or another domestic crisis, a congressionally appointed panel has found.

Because of the wars, the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves found, 88 percent of Army National Guard units and 45 percent of Air National Guard units that aren't deployed overseas have severe equipment shortages. That's reduced the Guard to its lowest readiness level ever and posed an unacceptable risk to Americans, said Arnold J. Punaro, the commission chairman and a retired Marine Corps major general.

In a report issued Thursday to Congress, the commission also faulted the Department of Homeland Security for failing to identify the domestic missions the National Guard should be expected to perform and criticized the Defense Department for not equipping the National Guard adequately for those missions.

Punaro said the Defense Department had told at least one governor, whom he didn't identify, that it could take as long as four years to replace equipment his state's National Guard units had left in Iraq.

"If major changes are not made, the Guard and Reserve, the capability to carry out their missions, will continue to deteriorate," Punaro told reporters. "And it will go down, down, down. They will be less and less ready, and we will be taking more and more risks."

The commission's 151-page report recommends 23 major changes to repair the problems. These include identifying the missions the National Guard is expected to perform at home, ensuring that the Guard gets the equipment it needs to carry out those missions, and establishing a bipartisan council of governors that would meet semi-annually and see that shortcomings are addressed.

The commission also recommended rewriting the charter for the National Guard Bureau, which co-ordinates the Guard's state and federal assignments. The proposed revisions also would give the bureau a stronger role in defense and emergency planning, enhance the rank of the bureau's chief to four-star general, and give the position a stronger advisory role with the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The commission urged a stronger National Guard role at the U.S. Northern Command, which has responsibility for defending the continental United States. It also said that the Northern Command should develop disaster response plans that account for state-level activities and include the use of National Guard and Reserve forces as first responders.

In a controversial move, the commission proposed that governors be given command over federal troops that respond to emergencies in their states.

Many of the recommendations, especially those urging greater federal and state cooperation, were aimed at avoiding the confusion that reigned after Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast in 2005.

The commission opposed giving the National Guard chief a seat on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which some lawmakers have said is necessary to ensure that the Guard gets the resources it needs. The commission said that doing so would essentially make the National Guard a separate service and harm cooperation with the active-duty military.

Lawmakers who want a stronger role for the Guard, while generally welcoming the report's findings, called some of its recommendations "tepid" and said they'd press ahead with legislation to give the National Guard a seat on the Joint Chiefs.

"The Guard deserves a place at the table when decisions at the Guard are made that affect its readiness, its missions and effectiveness," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., in a statement.

The commission was created two years ago to find solutions to long-standing problems with how the National Guard and Reserves are equipped and how they are used both at home and abroad. A comprehensive report on their findings and recommendations is due in January 2008.

ON THE WEB

The Commission report is available at: http://www.cngr.gov/press-room.asp

Panel Slams Treatment Of Guard, Reserves (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, March 2, 2007

The National Guard and Reserves don't get enough money or equipment and are left out of important planning for national emergencies, an independent panel concluded Thursday, long after the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina exposed serious stresses on the services.

The report from the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves compounds earlier criticism of the Bush administration's response to the devastating hurricane that struck the Gulf Coast in August 2005. The administration also is still struggling to better manage the reserves nearly four years into the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0138960

The 151-page report found a significant lack of communication between reserve officials and other military leaders, the Homeland Security Department and U.S. Northern Command, which is responsible for the military's defense of the U.S. homeland.

Calling those failures unacceptable, panel Chairman Arnold Punaro said in an interview that federal agencies must get past their turf battles to better protect the public.

"This is unacceptable. The American people would find it unacceptable," said Punaro, a retired Marine Corps general. "These are not problems that have just cropped up in the last two years or five years. These are issues that have been pretty much ignored and glossed over for decades."

The panel, which was created by Congress, also criticized the Pentagon for not budgeting or planning specifically for civil support missions, such as domestic disaster response, because they are viewed as extensions of wartime preparation.

"This is not a sustainable course, and their capability to do their mission will deteriorate over time if it's not changed," Punaro said. "The thought that if we are capable of doing the away game, we can do the home game, we believe is a flawed assumption."

He told reporters Thursday that if there is a chemical, biological or radiological incident, "we're going to need mass decontamination, we're going to need mass medical. ... That capability is not there in sufficient quantities to deal with those scenarios."

Members of Congress, meanwhile, criticized the commission for not going far enough in its recommendations., Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Kit Bond, R-Mo., said they will continue to push for their legislation, which gives the Guard chief budget authority and the power to buy equipment, and also makes that person a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The senators said the panel endorsed only halfway measures to solve the Guard's problems. "Their recommendations are thin soup," said Leahy.

And Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, who is the ranking Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said that while the commission recognized the challenges that face the guard, "admiring the problem isn't enough. The Commission's recommendations for the most part won't address the issues they acknowledge."

Guard and Reserve troops have been under increasing strain since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, serving in Afghanistan and Iraq while also patrolling the border with Mexico and responding to hurricanes and other natural disasters. During parts of 2005, the citizen soldiers made up nearly half of the U.S. forces in Iraq, with some facing repeated deployments.

At the same time, Guard units have struggled to get the equipment and training needed to go to war, often swapping armored trucks, radios and other equipment between the states to meet battle and disaster requirements.

In what likely will be one of its more controversial recommendations, the report said governors should be given more command authority over active duty military troops responding to local disasters. In previous situations such as Hurricane Katrina, military leaders have worked side-by-side with governors, but have maintained command of their active duty troops.

"We believe that without giving governors a greater voice, and without giving them a greater ability to bring all the assets of our government to bear, particularly in the immediate aftermath of any kind of incident, that we're putting our citizens and property and our economy at greater risk," Punaro said.

The panel outlined recommendations that would elevate the status of the Guard to become more of a partner with other military and homeland defense agencies. It would make the National Guard chief a four-star general and a direct adviser to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and his top commanders.

Shortages Threaten Guard's Capability (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Nearly 90 percent of Army National Guard units in the United States are rated "not ready" -- largely as a result of shortfalls in billions of dollars' worth of equipment -- jeopardizing their capability to respond to crises at home and abroad, according to a congressional commission that released a preliminary report yesterday on the state of U.S. military reserve forces.

The report found that heavy deployments of the National Guard and reserves since 2001 for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and for other anti-terrorism missions have deepened shortages, forced the cobbling together of units and hurt recruiting.

"We can't sustain the [National Guard and reserves] on the course we're on," said Arnold L. Punaro, chairman of the 13-member Commission on the National Guard and Reserves, established by Congress in 2005. The independent commission, made up mainly of former senior military and civilian officials appointed by both parties, is tasked to study the mission, readiness and compensation of the reserve forces.

DOJ_NMG_0138961

"The Department of Defense is not adequately equipping the National Guard for its domestic missions," the commission's report found. It faulted the Pentagon for a lack of budgeting for "civil support" in domestic emergencies, criticizing the "flawed assumption" that as long as the military is prepared to fight a major war, it is ready to respond to a disaster or emergency at home.

From Virginia and the District of Columbia to Indiana and New Mexico, National Guard units lack thousands of trucks, Humvees, generators, radios, night-vision goggles and other gear that would be critical for responding to a major disaster, terrorist attack or other domestic emergency, according to state Guard officials.

The equipment shortage extends to Gulf Coast states such as Louisiana and Mississippi -- devastated in 2005 by Hurricane Katrina -- where Guard units have only a fraction of what they would need to respond to another large-scale disaster.

The Louisiana Guard, its gear depleted by Iraq and Katrina, is short of Humvees and trucks such as high-water vehicles critical for a major evacuation. "We are really concerned about vehicles," said Lt. Col. Pete Schneider, a spokesman for the Louisiana Guard. "We would have enough for a small-scale issue . . . maybe a Category 1 tropical storm we could handle -- an event that doesn't involve massive flooding or massive search and rescue," he said. But for bigger disasters, Louisiana would need help from other states.

Mississippi lacks trucks and is relying on contractors to fill gaps in engineering vehicles, according to the state Guard's assistant adjutant general, Maj. Gen. Ike Pylant. "We will make do with what we got," he said.

In the Washington area, Guard officials worry about a catastrophic attack. In the event of "a very large . . . chemical, biological or nuclear incident in the national capital region, I would need every truck I was authorized, and we don't have that," said Col. Robert Simpson, director of the joint staff for the Virginia National Guard. "We are definitely short trucks, all wheeled vehicles," as well as radios, bulldozers and other gear, Simpson said. The state Guard could handle ordinary contingencies such as "bad winter weather," he said.

Other state Guard leaders voiced similar concerns. "What keeps me up at night is, I think I am able to surge . . . for the normal disaster, but if I needed to deploy every bit of my soldiers and airmen, I know for a fact I do not have enough equipment," said Maj. Gen. R. Martin Umbarger, head of the Indiana National Guard.

Army National Guard units in the United States have on average about half of their authorized stock of dual-use equipment, needed both for fighting wars and for domestic missions, according to a recent Government Accountability Office report. The National Guard estimates that it would require $38 billion for equipment to restore domestic Army and Air National Guard units to full readiness. The Army has budgeted $21 billion to augment Guard equipment through 2011.

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the use of U.S. military reservists has risen from about 12.7 million days of service in 2001 to an estimated 63 million days in 2006. The current increase of U.S. troops in Iraq is expected to require the call-up of as many as four National Guard combat brigades beginning early next year.

But while the 830,000-strong selected reserves make up more than a third of the total military, they receive only 3 percent of equipment funding and 8 percent of the Defense Department budget, the report said.

In 2006, Army National Guard units preparing to deploy had to borrow on average one-third of their people and 60 percent of their equipment from a dozen other units, making for a less cohesive force, the report found.

National Guard units deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan have been required to leave large quantities of gear in the combat zone. Partly as a result, 88 percent of Guard units in the United States are now so poorly equipped that they are rated "not ready," according to Guard data and the report, which cited the National Guard Bureau chief, Lt. Gen. H Steven Blum. Forty-five percent of the Air National Guard is also "not ready," according to Guard data.

The commission called for granting governors more power to handle emergencies, including allowing them to command not only National Guard forces but also federal troops responding to emergencies in their states. The commission also called for the chief of the National Guard Bureau to be elevated one rank to four-star general.

In commenting on legislation known as the National Guard Empowerment Act, the commission disagreed with a proposal to make the head of the National Guard a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in part, it said, because it would complicate the chain of command. Lawmakers backing the act criticized the recommendations as tepid.

The report also said prospects for Guard recruiting and retention remain "highly problematic," despite successes last year. Fewer former active-duty military personnel have joined the reserves over the past 10 years -- they made up 38 percent of the Army National Guard recruits last year, compared with 61 percent in 1997. Polling data for youths and their parents also show that favorable views of service in the Guard and reserves have declined since November 2001, the report said.

The commission is scheduled to issue its final report in January.

The Silence That Kills (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

DOJ_NMG_0138962

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

On Feb. 20, The A.P. reported from Afghanistan that a suicide attacker disguised as a health worker blew himself up near "a crowd of about 150 people who had gathered for a ribbon-cutting ceremony to open an emergency ward at the main government hospital in the city of Khost." A few days later, at a Baghdad college, a female Sunni suicide bomber blew herself up amid students who were ready to sit for exams, killing 40 people.

Stop and think for a moment how sick this is. Then stop for another moment and listen to the silence. The Bush team is mute. It says nothing, because it has no moral authority. No one would listen. Mr. Bush is losing a P.R. war to people who blow up emergency wards. Europeans are mute, lost in their delusion that this is all George Bush's and Tony Blair's fault.

But worst of all, Muslims, the very people whose future is being killed, are also mute. No surge can work in Iraq unless we have a "moral surge," a counternihilism strategy that delegitimizes suicide bombers. The most important restraints are cultural, societal and religious. It takes a village — but the Arab-Muslim village today is largely silent. The best are indifferent or intimidated; the worst quietly applaud the Sunnis who kill Shiites.

Nobody in the Arab world "has the guts to say that what is happening in Iraq is wrong — that killing schoolkids is wrong," said Mamoun Fandy, director of the Middle East program at the International Institute for Strategic Studies. "People somehow think that killing Iraqis is good because it will stick it to the Americans, so Arabs are undermining the American project in Iraq by killing themselves."

The world worries about highly enriched uranium, but "the real danger is highly enriched Islam," Mr. Fandy added. That is, "highly enriched Sunnism" and "highly enriched Shiism" that eats away at the Muslim state, the way Hezbollah is trying to do in Lebanon or the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt or Al Qaeda everywhere.

One result: there's no legitimate, decent, accepted source of Arab-Muslim authority today, no center of gravity "for people to anchor their souls in," Mr. Fandy said. In this welter of confusion, the suicide bombers go uncondemned or subtly extolled.

Arab nationalist media like Al Jazeera "practically tell bin Laden and his followers, 'Bravo,' " Mr. Fandy said. "The message sent to bin Laden is that 'You are doing to the West what we want done, but we can't do it.' This is the hidden message that the West is not privy to. Unless extreme pressure is applied on Muslims all over the world to come up with counter-fatwas and pronounce these men as pariahs, very little will happen in fighting terrorism."

"The battleground in the Arab world today is not in Palestine or Lebanon, but in the classrooms and newsrooms," Mr. Fandy concluded. That's where "the software programmers" reside who create symbolic images and language glorifying suicide bombers and make their depraved acts look legitimate. Only other Arab-Muslim programmers can defeat them.

Occasionally an honest voice rises, giving you a glimmer of hope that others will stand up. The MEMRI translation Web site (memri.org) just posted a poem called "When," from a Saudi author, Wajeha al-Huwaider, that was posted on Arab reform sites like www.aafaq.org.

When you cannot find a single garden in your city, but there is a mosque on every corner — you know that you are in an Arab country.

When you see people living in the past with all the trappings of modernity — do not be surprised, you are in an Arab country.

When religion has control over science — you can be sure that you are in an Arab country.

When clerics are referred to as "scholars" — don't be astonished, you are in an Arab country.

When you see the ruler transformed into a demigod who never dies or relinquishes his power, and nobody is permitted to criticize — do not be too upset, you are in an Arab country.

When you find that the large majority of people oppose freedom and find joy in slavery — do not be too distressed, you are in an Arab country.

When you hear the clerics saying that democracy is heresy, but seizing every opportunity provided by democracy to grab high positions — do not be surprised, you are in an Arab country. ...

When you discover that a woman is worth half of what a man is worth, or less — do not be surprised, you are in an Arab country. ...

When land is more important than human beings — you are in an Arab country. ...

When fear constantly lives in the eyes of the people — you can be certain you are in an Arab country."

DOJ:

Sources: GOP Lawmakers Tried To Influence Federal Investigation (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sen. Pete Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson of New Mexico pressured the U.S. attorney in their state to speed up indictments in a federal corruption investigation that involved at least one former Democratic state senator, according to two people familiar with the contacts.

The alleged involvement of the two Republican lawmakers raises questions about possible violations of House of Representatives and Senate ethics rules and could taint the criminal investigation into the award of an $82 million courthouse contract.

The two people with knowledge of the incident said Domenici and Wilson intervened in mid-October, when Wilson was in a competitive re-election campaign that she won by 875 votes out of nearly 211,000 cast.

David Iglesias, who stepped down as U.S. attorney in New Mexico on Wednesday, told McClatchy Newspapers that he believed the Bush administration fired him Dec. 7 because he resisted the pressure to rush an indictment.

According to the two individuals, Domenici and Wilson called to press Iglesias for details of the case.

Wilson was curt after Iglesias was "non-responsive" to her questions about whether an indictment would be unsealed, said the two individuals, who asked not to be identified because they feared possible political repercussions. Rumors had spread throughout the New Mexico legal community that an indictment of at least one Democrat was sealed.

Domenici, who wasn't up for re-election, called about a week and a half later and was more persistent than Wilson, the people said. When Iglesias said an indictment wouldn't be handed down until at least December, the line went dead.

So far no one has been charged.

Press aides for Domenici and Wilson wouldn't comment. Justice Department officials have denied hearing of any such interference and said they didn't fire Iglesias over it.

Iglesias said in an earlier interview that he regretted not reporting the contact to his superiors, and he said he didn't have evidence that it led to his firing.

Some Democrats are questioning whether the two lawmakers could be accused of ethics violations for inappropriate contact with an executive branch official.

Stanley Brand, a former federal prosecutor and former Democratic counsel to the House, said such interference could be a violation.

"There's a general ethical principle that members should not unduly interfere in adjudicative proceedings in front of courts or agencies," he said. "This happens to be a criminal prosecution. There would seem to be a special concern about reaching out to a U.S. attorney and asking about a pending case.

"The House and Senate have not taken much notice of these things," he said. "But they don't usually rise to this level."

The allegations also could give defense attorneys in the corruption case in New Mexico legal ammunition to attack an indictment, Brand said.

"Even if he (Iglesias) didn't submit himself to the pressure, if I'm a defense attorney, I'm going to scream bloody murder and say it looks like he did," he said.

The allegations have fueled a weeks-long controversy over whether the Bush administration forced out eight Republican-appointed U.S. attorneys because of partisan politics.

Justice Department officials have said that most of the firings were for "performance-related" issues and denied partisan political motives.

On Thursday, House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich., issued subpoenas to require Iglesias and three other ousted U.S. attorneys to testify before Congress.

The judiciary subcommittee on administrative law authorized the subpoenas by a 7-0 vote. The five Republican members of the subcommittee didn't show up for the vote.

The subpoenas require Iglesias, and former U.S. attorneys Carol Lam of San Diego, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Little Rock, Ark., and John McKay of Seattle to appear before the subcommittee next week.

"The former U.S. attorneys are alleging very serious charges against the administration and we need to hear from them," Conyers said.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is sending letters to the same four asking them to testify voluntarily on Tuesday.

In the last several weeks, other U.S. attorneys have spoken out against the administration to dispute that they were fired because of how they handled their jobs.

The administration has said that politics played a part only in the firing of Cummins. Officials said he was removed to make way for Tim Griffin, a former aide to White House political operative Karl Rove.

Wilson, Domenici Won't Answer Questions About U.S. Attorney's Firing (ALBTRIB)

Albuquerque Tribune, March 2, 2007

Congress to subpoena fired U.S. attorneys

WASHINGTON — Sen. Pete Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson aren't saying whether they contacted then-U.S. Attorney David Iglesias in the weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 elections about the pace of his corruption investigation of New Mexico Democrats.

Iglesias, whose last day on the job was Wednesday, says two members of New Mexico's congressional delegation pressured him to speed up the indictment of Democrats. Iglesias has refused to say who called him, but the three other members of the state's delegation say it wasn't them.

Domenici and Wilson, Albuquerque Republicans, have not returned phone calls from numerous news outlets asking for a response to Iglesias' allegations.

The former U.S. attorney is expected to be called before Congress to testify on his dismissal, which he says appears to have been politically motivated.

A House Judiciary subcommittee was expected to issue subpoenas this afternoon for Iglesias and three other U.S. attorneys dismissed by the Bush administration to appear at a hearing Tuesday.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers said the charge by Iglesias "is the most egregious allegation so far that the administration has allowed partisan politics to corrupt the selection and retention of U.S. attorneys."

In an interview with The Tribune on Tuesday, Iglesias said he did not know why he was ousted, but said it wasn't because of his job performance. "That only leaves one possibility," he said, "and that's politics."

He went further in an interview with McClatchy News Service, saying he believes his ouster was called for because he would not rush the indictments in a local kickback investigation.

"I believe that because I didn't `play ball,' so to speak, I was asked to resign," Iglesias said in the story published Wednesday. Iglesias said he was contacted directly by two members of Congress and "was appalled by the inappropriateness of these contacts."

At the time, Wilson was locked in a close re-election race with then-state Attorney General Patricia Madrid, whom Wilson had accused of neglecting corruption. Domenici has long been seen as Wilson's mentor in Congress.

The corruption investigation Iglesias was working on involves rumored kickbacks to powerful Democrats and other officials during the construction of Albuquerque's Metro Courthouse and several other buildings in Downtown.

A U.S. Justice Department official, Brian Roehrkasse, told McClatchy that Iglesias' claim "is flatly false."

"We had a lengthy record from which to evaluate his performance as a manager, and we made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns," Roehrkasse said.

The Justice Department was unaware Iglesias had had conversations with members of Congress until Wednesday, Roehrkasse said. According to Roehrkasse, Iglesias should have reported the contact to department officials.

Roehrkasse would not say whether any member of the New Mexico delegation recommended that Iglesias be dismissed.

But Matt Farrauto, executive director of the New Mexico Democratic Party, on Wednesday called for Wilson to answer questions about Iglesias' dismissal, and whether she played a role in it.

"It's not much of a leap to believe that Heather Wilson pressured or personally instigated pressure for an indictment," Farrauto said. "This should be investigated, and she should be held accountable."

Sen. Chuck Schumer, a New York Democrat, said on the Senate floor Wednesday that Iglesias told members of his staff on Tuesday about being contacted by the two members of Congress, and Iglesias asked to be brought to Washington "under the power of subpoena to tell his story."

Iglesias is one of eight U.S. attorneys fired in December, but until Wednesday he had not been a central figure in the controversy. Democrats had focused on the firing of Carol Lamm, who successfully prosecuted former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican, on corruption charges, and on Little Rock, Ark., U.S. Attorney H.E. Cummings, who was replaced by an associate of White House political chief Karl Rove.

"These new revelations are extremely troubling," Schumer said on the Senate floor. "They would show politics at its worst, and the long hand of the Justice Department reaching out to fire attorneys who would not do what was politically asked; at least that's a very real suspicion.

"So we must get to the bottom of this. And the only way to get to the bottom of this is to call before us the fired U.S. attorneys and hear their side of the story."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat, today announced he will send letters to Iglesias and the other fired U.S. attorneys asking them to testify voluntarily. If they won't, he said the committee could vote March 8 on whether to issue subpoenas.

The president selects U.S. attorneys, who customarily resign with a change in administrations. However, it is unusual for an administration to replace someone it nominated in the first place.

"This is serious stuff," Schumer said. "When U.S. attorneys are fired for political reasons - fired to stand in the way of justice rather than promote justice - it puts a dagger into the heart of the faith that Americans have in their government and in their system of justice."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, cited Iglesias' story Wednesday in proposing an amendment to a homeland security bill that would limit the president's ability to replace U.S. attorneys with interim appointees.

The amendment would still allow the president to fire U.S. attorneys, but states that no interim appointee could serve more than 120 days. In effect that would force the president to send the name of a permanent nominee to the Senate for confirmation.

Carl Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond, said the administration's decision to replace so many U.S. attorneys at once without a clear explanation for the moves appeared to be backfiring.

"Now it's going to be a mess," he said. "The question is, what was to be gained by doing this? There's not even two years left in the administration. What was the point?"

House Democrats Vote To Subpoena Fired U.S. Attorneys (AP)

By Jennifer Talhelm, The Associated Press

AP, March 2, 2007

A House committee is compelling four of at least eight U.S. Attorneys ousted from office in recent months to tell their stories under oath, after one prosecutor said he believes he was fired for political reasons.

Democrats on a House Judiciary subcommittee voted 7-0 Thursday to subpoena fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Seattle. No Republican members of the panel attended Thursday's meeting, which lasted less than five minutes.

The lawmakers said they are troubled that the Bush administration may be punishing prosecutors for being too effective at pursuing political corruption cases.

The House subpoenas are the first issued by the new Democratic-controlled Congress. The U.S. Attorneys are scheduled to appear at a Tuesday hearing with other witnesses, including a representative from the Justice Department.

The Senate Judiciary Committee asked the four prosecutors to testify before it the same day.

Democrats have alleged that the removals were politically motivated and point out what they say is a flaw in the antiterror USA Patriot Act that allows the president to sidestep Senate confirmation of U.S. Attorneys in some cases.

"Is this an effort to diminish the independence of the people who uphold our laws? It's very troubling to me that there seems to be this undercurrent here," said Rep. Linda Sanchez, D-Calif., chairwoman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Commercial and Administration Law.

Iglesias this week said he believes he was dismissed because he resisted pressure by two members of Congress to rush indictments before last year's election in an investigation of an alleged Democratic kickback scheme.

The Justice Department has said that any suggestion that Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment is false. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other top department officials also have defended their decisions to replace other U.S. Attorneys.

Sanchez said the conversations between Iglesias and lawmakers could represent an improper ex parte communication and violate congressional ethics laws.

Iglesias has refused to name the lawmakers who called him. He told The Associated Press on Thursday that he wouldn't give any more details until he testified. "I will identify the members if I am directly asked and they compel me to testify," he said.

House Panel Subpoenas Fired U.S. Attorneys (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Paul Kane, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Democrats issued their first major subpoenas yesterday since taking control of Congress, as a House subcommittee voted to compel testimony from four former U.S. attorneys who were part of a wave of firings by the Justice Department.

The Judiciary subcommittee on commercial and administrative law approved the subpoenas for former prosecutors in Arkansas, New Mexico, Seattle and San Diego -- all of whom will be required to appear for testimony at a hearing Tuesday. The Senate Judiciary Committee announced plans for a similar hearing on the same day.

The moves mark the latest escalation in the battle between congressional Democrats and the Justice Department over the controversial dismissals of eight U.S. attorneys, at least five of whom were presiding over public corruption probes when they were fired.

DOJ_NMG_0138966

"Are these people being removed for doing their job and for it doing it too well?" asked Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Calif.), chairwoman of the panel, who called the subpoenas "a last resort."

The controversy, which has been simmering for two months, boiled over this week after departing prosecutor David C. Iglesias of New Mexico alleged that two unnamed lawmakers had pressured him to speed up the prosecution of Democrats before the November elections. Iglesias said he believed that complaints from the lawmakers may have led to his dismissal, an allegation the Justice Department has disputed.

The state's top two Democrats, Rep. Tom Udall and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, and Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) have denied calling Iglesias. Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) and Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) have not responded to requests for comment over the past two days and deflected questions from the Associated Press about the allegations.

"I don't have any comment," Domenici said. "I have no idea what he's talking about."

Wilson referred questions "on that personnel matter" to the Justice Department.

Sanchez said any such contacts by a member of Congress would likely be in violation of House and Senate ethics rules that restrict such "ex parte communications" during ongoing criminal investigations.

Iglesias's office was conducting a probe into allegations involving construction contracts and a prominent Democratic former state senator.

At the time of the alleged phone calls, Wilson, a close ally of Domenici's, was in a tight reelection battle with then-state Attorney General Patricia Madrid. Wilson won by fewer than 2,000 votes.

Iglesias said yesterday that he will identify the lawmakers only if compelled by a subpoena.

"I fear retaliation," said Iglesias, a Republican and former military defense lawyer who served as a model for a character in the movie "A Few Good Men." "This is a small state and there are not too many employment opportunities, and I fear they will blacklist me."

At least four of the other U.S. attorneys were presiding over probes targeting Republican politicians at the time they were notified of their firing.

Although a separate House subcommittee has compelled testimony in a little-noticed drug inquiry, the prosecutors case marks the first major use of subpoena power by the new Democratic majority.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that the department has been "very forthcoming" with Congress about the dismissals and that any allegations that prosecutors were removed to interfere with investigations are "completely wrong."

Justice officials have said Iglesias and six others were fired for "performance-related" reasons and have denied that any were targeted to disrupt public corruption probes. Officials have acknowledged that an eighth prosecutor, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, was removed to make way for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Cummins and former U.S. attorney John McKay of Seattle said in interviews that they told lawmakers they will not testify unless subpoenas are issued.

"I wanted it clear that I wasn't volunteering to testify and I wasn't trying to affirmatively stir up trouble for everybody," said Cummins, who left in December. "If they would like to hear one of the few facts I have, I'm happy to tell them."

The other former prosecutor scheduled to testify, Carol S. Lam of San Diego, did not return a call seeking comment yesterday.

No Republicans showed up for the unanimous panel vote on issuing the subpoenas. The Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, Rep. Lamar Smith (Tex.), later called the session "political grandstanding."

House Panel Subpoenas 4 Prosecutors Of 8 Ousted (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — A House Judiciary subcommittee voted Thursday to issue subpoenas requiring testimony from four of the eight United States attorneys recently dismissed by the Justice Department.

The vote followed remarks this week in which one of the four, David C. Iglesias of New Mexico, said he believed that the motives for his ouster had been political. He and the three others subpoenaed — H. E. Cummins III of Arkansas, John McKay of Seattle and Carol C. Lam of San Diego — were chosen to give testimony because the circumstances of their dismissal are thought to be representative of those surrounding the removal of all eight, Congressional officials say.

The subpoenas order the four to testify at a hearing of the House subcommittee on Tuesday. The Senate Judiciary Committee has also invited dismissed prosecutors to testify that day and may consider issuing its own subpoenas if they do not. Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, a Democratic member of the committee who has led an investigation of the dismissals, said Thursday, “The U.S. attorneys will be coming, and now we will finally get to the bottom of this.”

DOJ_NMG_0138967

The House panel acted after the prosecutors privately told lawmakers that they would not testify voluntarily, not wanting to get in the middle of what has grown into a serious political embarrassment for the Justice Department, but that they would give testimony if compelled.

In floor speeches and at a hearing last month, Democrats have repeatedly attacked the dismissals as a politically motivated effort to replace independent-minded prosecutors with more pliable operatives of the Bush administration.

Several of the prosecutors had been engaged in politically sensitive cases involving Republicans, for instance Ms. Lam's continuing corruption investigation in the wake of a related guilty plea in 2005 by Representative Randy Cunningham of California.

Others had irritated Republicans in their state. Mr. McKay, for one, had decided against impaneling a grand jury to examine accusations of voter fraud in Washington State's 2004 election for governor, won by a Democrat, Christine Gregoire.

Justice Department officials have denied that any of the prosecutors, all appointed by President Bush in his first term, were removed for political reasons.

"We have been very forthcoming with members of Congress about personnel decisions related to U.S. attorneys, through hearings, multiple briefings, letters, other documents, and a D.O.J. official will again testify next week," said Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the department.

"We have never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a particular investigation, criminal prosecution or civil case," Mr. Roehrkasse added. "Any suggestion otherwise is completely wrong."

At a hearing last month, Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said most of the dismissals had been related to job performance, an assertion that brought protests from the ranks of the ousted prosecutors.

Several said they had been given no reason for their removal. Most had received favorable job evaluations from the Justice Department in formal performance assessments based on interviews with judges, law enforcement agencies and members of the office staff.

House Panel Subpoenas Ousted U.S. Attorneys (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

Four of the prosecutors who say the White House forced them out for political motives are to appear Tuesday.

WASHINGTON — A House subcommittee voted Thursday to subpoena four recently replaced U.S. attorneys as part of a widening probe into whether the Bush administration was politicizing the appointment of top prosecutors around the country.

The action marked the first major use of subpoena power by the new Democratic-controlled Congress, and begins to fulfill a pledge of the Democratic leadership to scrutinize administration policies.

The prosecutors, directed to appear at a hearing Tuesday, were among at least eight who were abruptly removed in recent months by the Justice Department. Officials have said they dismissed the lawyers primarily because of concerns over their performance, as well as policy differences over whether they were pursuing department priorities such as cases of immigration fraud and child exploitation.

But the lawyers — all appointees of President Bush — have not gone quietly. They are publicly disputing the characterization the department has offered for their departures.

The result has been a political embarrassment for the White House and the Justice Department, and an odd spectacle of Democrats giving aid and comfort to Republican appointees.

The move by a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee came a day after the former U.S. attorney in Albuquerque said he believed he was dismissed for political reasons. David Iglesias said that two members of Congress had pressured him to bring corruption charges against a Democratic official in New Mexico before the November election but that he had resisted.

Also subpoenaed was Carol Lam, former U.S. attorney in San Diego, who oversaw the bribery case against former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of Rancho Santa Fe. Lam's office brought charges against two others in that case, including a former senior CIA official, two days before she left her job last month.

The other former prosecutors subpoenaed are John McKay of Seattle and H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Little Rock, Ark. The four prosecutors were first appointed by Bush in 2001 and 2002.

The subcommittee said all four had agreed to appear, and the Justice Department said it would send a top official to the hearing.

The vote to issue the subpoenas illustrated a partisan divide: Republicans boycotted the proceeding; the seven Democrats present unanimously endorsed the move.

DOJ_NMG_0138968

"The former U.S. attorneys are alleging very serious charges against the administration, and we need to hear from them," said Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. "We want to hear their stories, and we want the administration to address the charges head-on."

Conyers said the subpoenas were to be issued Thursday night.

"We decided to issue subpoenas only as a last resort," said Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Lakewood), who chairs the commercial and administrative law subcommittee, which authorized the subpoenas and will hold the hearing. "We need to get to the bottom of whether competency in upholding the law is being sacrificed for political ideology."

Democrats also fear that the Justice Department is trying to exploit a little-noticed change in federal law that gives U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales the power to appoint interim federal prosecutors through the end of the Bush administration without Senate confirmation.

The Justice Department has said that it had no intention of bypassing the confirmation process and would submit the names of replacements to the Senate for every vacancy that occurs. But legislation has been introduced in both houses to repeal the provision, which was included in legislation last year reauthorizing the Patriot Act.

Democrats also released a Congressional Research Service report surveying the reasons that U.S. attorneys did not serve out their terms. The report studied 54 cases of prosecutors who were appointed between 1981 and 2006. The bulk left to take other official positions such as judgeships or to pursue careers in private law practice.

The report identified five cases in which attorneys were forced to resign. The dismissed included a prosecutor in Florida who was caught on videotape grabbing a Jacksonville television reporter by the throat, and another Florida prosecutor who, the report said, allegedly "bit a topless dancer on the arm during a visit to an adult club after losing a big drug case."

rick.schmitt@latimes.com

Democrats Demanding Fired U.S. Prosecutors Testify (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt And James Rowley

Bloomberg, March 2, 2007

March 1 (Bloomberg) -- Democrats in Congress intend to question several fired U.S. attorneys to determine whether the Bush administration forced them out to influence politically sensitive criminal investigations.

A House Judiciary subcommittee voted today to compel testimony from four of the prosecutors. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy also announced plans to question the lawyers, who were among eight -- all Republican appointees -- that were informed last year of their dismissals.

``This seems to be a wholesale Christmas Eve massacre," Leahy said today at a committee meeting. ``Some of them had the highest ratings of their performance but, coincidentally, they were in on some politically sensitive investigations."

The administration has said the firings were generally based on job performance, not politics. The 93 U.S. attorneys are political appointees who are confirmed by the Senate and serve at the discretion of President George W. Bush.

The prosecutors who were let go include one in San Diego who was supervising the influence peddling investigation into convicted ex-Republican Representative Randall ``Duke" Cunningham. Another in San Francisco oversaw a federal task force probing illegal backdating of stock options by company executives.

David Iglesias of New Mexico, who was also fired, recently told lawmakers he was asked to leave after receiving calls from two unnamed members of Congress inquiring about a corruption probe involving local Democrats. Iglesias told a press conference yesterday he assumed politics caused his firing.

Eager to Testify

Senator Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, said yesterday that Iglesias and other prosecutors were eager to testify.

``We have inquired of the fired U.S. attorneys," he said in remarks on the Senate floor. ``The overwhelming majority of them want to tell more but feel honor-bound not to do it, except if they were brought under the power of a subpoena."

Senators also said the job evaluations of some of the dismissed prosecutors contradicted Justice Department arguments that they were let go for poor performance.

Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, said it is ``a bit distasteful" that the Bush administration is unfairly damaging the reputation of prosecutors it had installed.

Quality Performers

Formal evaluations show that the prosecutors ``were quality performers, that they did what they were requested to do," California Democrat Dianne Feinstein said in an interview.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the agency has never removed a U.S. attorney in an effort to influence an investigation. On the Iglesias firing, Roehrkasse said the prosecutor served for more than five years and ``we made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns."

In the House, the subpoenas are the first issued since Democrats took congressional control in January. The subcommittee, headed by Representative Linda Sanchez, voted 7-0 to compel the testimony with the panel's Republicans not participating.

All four prosecutors -- Iglesias, Carol Lam, who had headed the Cunningham probe, John McKay of Seattle, and H.E. ``Bud'' Cummins of Arkansas -- will testify March 6 in front of the subcommittee, said Sanchez, a California Democrat. She said each had expressed a willingness to talk if they were subpoenaed.

Political Pressure

Democrats plan to ask them whether they were pressured on any cases, what the administration said when they were dismissed and whether they thought they were fired because of politics, Sanchez said.

``Part of the overall issue is, are the U.S. attorney positions being awarded to those that are ideologues within the president's party,'' she told reporters.

While the Justice Department said most of the prosecutors were asked to step down for unspecified performance problems, it acknowledged that Cummins was fired without cause. He was replaced on an interim basis by Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Griffin has withdrawn from consideration for the permanent position, citing the uproar over his appointment. Bush has nominated only three people to fill 13 vacant U.S. attorney positions, Democrats said today.

Democrats have also proposed legislation that would limit Attorney General Alberto Gonzales's authority to appoint temporary U.S. attorneys to 120 days. After that, they would be named by a federal judge.

The legislation, passed by the Senate Judiciary Committee, would repeal a provision of last year's USA Patriot Act renewal that gave the attorney general sole power to name interim U.S. attorneys. Democrats say the Patriot Act could let the Justice Department bypass the Senate confirmation process.

``If we don't act, any president -- Democrat or Republican - - could simply have the attorney general hand pick the prosecutor,'' Leahy said. ``You could end up politicizing prosecutions and law enforcement.''

U.S. Attorney Leaves Office With No Word On Successor (LVS)

By Sam Skolnik, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, March 2, 2007

U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden's last day in office came and went Wednesday with no word from the Justice Department about who will replace him.

Even though Bogden was told by a department official soon after he was fired from the job that his office would be given the name of a replacement by the time he left office - Wednesday at midnight - no one had called, at least as of 6 p.m.

"I've been sitting here, waiting for the call," said Bogden, the well-regarded Bush appointee who said he has spent the bulk of his last day packing up his office. "It would have been nice to have gotten some notice by now," he said during a late afternoon interview.

According to Bogden, federal statutes dictate that First Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Myhre would take over this morning as acting U.S. attorney, pending further word from Washington.

Bogden's last day as the top federal prosecutor in Nevada came as Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said she likely would be issuing subpoenas to the seven U.S. attorneys, including Bogden, who were fired by the Bush administration within the last few months.

Bogden had received positive notices and work reviews by his Justice Department bosses - as had all but one of the six other fired U.S. attorneys, according to media reports - begging the question as to why the prosecutors were fired. Justice Department officials said it was because of poor job performance, a notion vehemently rejected by the U.S. attorneys and their supporters.

In a statement Wednesday, Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., called the dismissal of Bogden and the others "unfair."

"Under his leadership, the U.S. attorney's office has prosecuted many dangerous criminals and resolved a number of important civil cases," Reid said. "Throughout his career, Dan Bogden has strived to make our communities safer, and I appreciate all the remarkable work he has done."

Tory Mazzola, a spokesman for Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., said his office was "in the process, working with the Justice Department to find a replacement" for Bogden. He referred questions regarding why no replacement had yet been named for Bogden to the Justice Department.

No one with the Justice Department's press office in Washington could be reached late Wednesday. Michael Battle, director of its Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, also could not be reached.

Bogden said he would appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee if called by Feinstein - but only reluctantly.

"If subpoenaed, you've got to go, you've got to testify," he said. "But would I be eager to testify? No."

After 16 years with the Justice Department, including the last 5 1/2 as U.S. attorney, Bogden said testifying would be a difficult thing to do "even though I don't agree with their decision" regarding his dismissal.

Speculation has been rampant regarding the motives of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and the Bush administration in the systematic purgings . Much of it has centered on politics: Democrats and other critics say they believe that the Bush White House is eager to have new prosecutors in place to steer investigations toward Democratic officials and away from Republicans.

Detractors also say the new crop of replacements, likely to include more politically minded appointees and fewer career prosecutors, are being groomed to run for congressional seats held by vulnerable Democrats.

Those theories were bolstered by a recent McClatchy Newspapers report, referred to by Feinstein on Wednesday, in which the U.S. attorney for New Mexico, David Iglesias, said two unnamed members of Congress called him in mid-October to inquire about the timing of an ongoing probe into an alleged kickback scheme.

Iglesias, according to the report, believed the congressmen were eager for an indictment to be issued on the eve of the November elections to benefit the Republican candidates.

It is unclear who, in the end, will be named to replace Bogden.

The names of several officials inside Bogden's office have been floated, including Myhre and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Kurt Schulke and Dan Schiess, as well as Nevada Chief Deputy Attorney General Conrad Hafen.

Myhre couldn't be reached for comment Wednesday. Schulke, Schiess and Hafen declined to say whether they had been in touch with Ensign's office or the Justice Department about the post. Bogden said he didn't know who was in line for his job.

Sun Washington correspondent Lisa Mascaro contributed to this report. Sam Skolnik can be reached at 474-7406 or at sam.skolnik@lasvegassun.com.

Bogden Questions Reason For Ouster (LVRJ)

By Adrienne Packer, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 2, 2007

Serves last day as U.S. attorney

Two high-ranking Department of Justice officials told outgoing U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden in December that his dismissal was unrelated to his job performance, and one of the officials indicated his firing was politically motivated, Bogden said Thursday.

"I was given an explanation that seemed to me to be political in nature, that had nothing to do with any issues with my performance or issues with the performance of my office," Bogden said.

He declined to elaborate on the discussion.

At least eight U.S. attorneys, including Bogden, 51, were abruptly removed in recent months by the Justice Department

On Feb. 6, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee and explained that the dismissals were "performance related."

"It's been difficult enough trying to accept the request that I step down; it's been a difficult time getting through it all," said Bogden, whose last day was Wednesday. "Then to hear the reason for the request to step down has something to do with some unrelated performance issues is just flat-out wrong."

Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, called Bogden on Dec. 7 and asked him to step down from the post he had held since 2001. Battle could not provide an explanation, Bogden said, prompting him to call other officials within the Justice Department.

"I said you have to give me something more; you can't just throw this bomb into my life," Bogden said.

Bogden placed a call to an upper-level official at the Justice Department. He said he sensed from that conversation that his dismissal was politically motivated. During a second call to another official, his questions were more direct.

"I said, 'Look, did this decision have anything to do with my job performance or the performance of my office?' " Bogden said, relaying a conversation with an official he declined to name. The official responded: "That did not enter into the equation."

Bogden acknowledged he will have to divulge the officials' names if he is subpoenaed to testify before a congressional committee.

Bogden was not among four of the prosecutors a House subcommittee voted Thursday to subpoena to testify next week. The House Judiciary subcommittee said all four agreed to appear, and the Justice Department said it would dispatch a top official to the hearing.

U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., has suggested political gamesmanship on the part of the Bush administration, a claim she said was bolstered by the fact that the ousted attorneys were given positive performance evaluations.

DOJ_NMG_0138971

"These reports (evaluations) only serve to fuel my concerns that the Department of Justice based its decisions to fire competent and successful U.S. attorneys because of a desire to put young politically connected lawyers from outside into these offices," Feinstein wrote in a letter to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Feinstein sponsored legislation that would require the Senate to confirm U.S. attorney appointments, restoring the process used prior to 2006. Feinstein and others have been angered by a little-noticed provision slipped into the Patriot Act last year that allows Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to appoint replacement prosecutors indefinitely.

"The problem is that this loophole in the Patriot Act allows the administration to put anybody they want into that position for an indefinite period of time," said Jon Summers, a spokesman for Reid's office. "Then you run into a situation where you have people who may not be the best fit in those jobs. There is a reason that things were set up the way they were and that was to make sure the best interest of the public was served. This loophole allows the administration to get around that."

Democrats have questioned whether the Bush administration was using the dismissals to reward political allies. McNulty conceded the Justice Department removed Arkansas prosecutor Ed Cummins without cause to make room for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

David Iglesias, the U.S. Attorney for the District of New Mexico, said this week that he was fired because he failed to rush an indictment that might have boosted the Republicans during the 2006 election.

Bogden said he was never asked to back off investigating Gov. Jim Gibbons, a Republican. The probe is examining whether Gibbons accepted unreported gifts and payments from friend and businessman Warren Trepp in exchange for his help as a member of the House Intelligence and Armed Services committees.

Bogden said the Justice Department has never pressured him on any case.

Bogden worked for the Justice Department for 16 years. In 2001, he was asked to interview for the U.S. attorney position. Bogden said he was hesitant because he knew that new administrations choose their own U.S. attorneys and he would someday be out of a job.

Besides, the Ohio native said, he had reached his dream of being a federal prosecutor.

"I knew once I stepped up and took the U.S. attorney job, I would have forgone my career at the Department of Justice," Bogden said. "I knew I'd be sitting here in a position like this someday. I just didn't think it would be today."

Battle called Bogden and informed him of his dismissal the day after Bogden returned from a four-day U.S. attorneys conference in Washington, D.C. On Dec. 6, the night before Bogden was fired, McNulty delivered a speech to the gathering of the country's chief prosecutors.

"He called us the best group of U.S. attorneys ever assembled in the history of the country," Bogden said. "It was a nice speech, very touching. Now maybe I should look at it as my eulogy."

Bogden asked the Department of Justice whether he could stay until the end of February to help the office transition into new leadership. But as Bogden finished packing his office Thursday, the Justice Department still had not named a permanent replacement or an interim U.S. attorney.

First Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Myhre is serving as acting U.S. attorney.

Bogden said he is proud of his time at the helm of the Nevada office. During his tenure, the office was understaffed by about 15 attorneys.

"We have effectively, efficiently and successfully covered all of our national and district priorities despite being understaffed and under-budgeted," Bogden said.

Bogden plans to take time off to figure out his next career move. He is concerned that the Justice Department's comments that his firing was performance-related will hurt his chances of finding a new job.

Although he savors his career with the Department of Justice, he can't help having mixed feelings about the department for which he worked for nearly two decades.

"I'm plenty bitter," Bogden said. "Here's a job that you think you are doing in an outstanding fashion and suddenly to get a call like that with little or no explanation."

The Los Angeles Times contributed to this report.

Reddit Ashcroft Cancels Pizza Party For Ex-Colleagues (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, March 2, 2007

Former Attorney General turned lobbyist John Ashcroft canceled the pizza party he was scheduled to host yesterday for the political appointees from his days heading the Justice Department.

The cancellation came after usnews.com reported that the department's ethics office had flagged the party as potentially troublesome in terms of appearance.

In an E-mail sent to the invitees, which Ashcroft's senior adviser, Juleanna Glover Weiss, provided to U.S News, Ashcroft said that he did not realize that "our sharing of a pizza and soft drinks might erode the high levels of integrity we worked so diligently to engender" when he was attorney general. Ashcroft added that he did not "believe for a second" that the invitees' integrity "could be compromised for a piece of pizza." But he said that "no fellowship over lunch" was "worth the sacrifice of any public confidence in the justice community." Instead, "Going back to my traditional brown bag lunch," wrote Ashcroft, "will not be too much of a challenge for me."

The Justice Department's ethics office had not prohibited invitees from attending but asked them to consider how their participation might be perceived. It has been two years since Ashcroft left the department and formed the lucrative Ashcroft Group lobbying and consulting firm. So he's past some of the restrictions imposed on former government officials from lobbying their old agency.

However, because the Ashcroft Group has big clients that have been sued by the department, in antitrust and other ongoing litigation, the invitation raised eyebrows.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Gonzales: 'Protecting Integrity Of Business' A Top Priority (SDDT)

San Diego Daily Transcript via Yahoo! News, March 2, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales touted the Department of Justice's commitment to combating corporate fraud and public corruption in a speech Thursday in San Diego.

Gonzales, making his first appearance here since becoming attorney general two years ago, addressed the American Bar Associations' national institute on white-collar crime.

His remarks came two weeks after Carol Lam was reportedly forced out as U.S. attorney in San Diego because she concentrated too much on white-collar crime and not enough on border smuggling and illegal immigration.

In his speech, Gonzales said reliability and transparency are needed for a successful economy.

"As attorney general, protecting the integrity of business and government is a top priority of mine," he said. "A free market cannot include the freedom to cheat, to defraud or to steal. Rules and enforcement are needed to protect the playing field itself and ensure fair competition."

The Justice Department established a corporate fraud task force in 2002, and it had obtained 1,100 convictions as of the end of last year.

Gonzales said the recent prosecutions involving Enron and WorldComm and the new restrictions imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act have changed corporate America.

Stanford Law School reported a 38 percent decline last year in class-action lawsuits involving securities issues.

But the attorney general said he does not want the Justice Department's renewed oversight to hamper American innovation or prevent individuals from taking risks.

"The United States is the economic envy of the world," he said, "and we are dedicated to keeping it that way. That means we'll stand fast by the laws that keep the markets clean, but it also means we'll stay cognizant of the private sector's need for the oxygen that feeds innovation."

He also praised the government's "offensive against all types of white-collar crime."

"We have a strong record of prosecuting public corruption cases during my tenure as attorney general," he said. "As evidence of that commitment, we have added resources to this fight."

He noted the FBI added 200 new field agents last year to fight public corruption, and it has scored a number of significant convictions.

Government prosecutors, Gonzales said, are also cracking down in the new area of backdating stock options. The Justice Department recently accepted guilty pleas from two executives of Comverse Technology Inc., including its general counsel and chief financial officer, involving backdating.

As recently as last month, Gonzales said, the general counsel of the recruiting firm Monster Inc. pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy and fraud arising from this involvement in a scheme to backdate options.

The attorney general also highlighted another success, a case he called "one of the first-ever extraditions for an intellectual property offense."

The indictment charged the leader of a Internet software piracy group with violating U.S. criminal copyright laws. Prior to dismantling, the piracy group was "estimated to have caused the illegal reproduction and distribution of more than $500 million worth of pirated software, movies, games and music," according to Gonzales.

DOJ_NMG_0138973

The Justice Department's civil division, meanwhile, has obtained 57 felony convictions against business opportunity scammers -- companies that sell phony franchise businesses with the promise of great profits.

Gonzales said the government is combating environmental crime and tax crime as well.

He also explained how the Justice Department is coordinating with other countries to fight corruption globally.

"We send Justice Department employees to help train policemen, prosecutors and judges in countries around the world," he said. "And that includes assistant U.S. attorneys and FBI agents who have chosen to serve in Iraq and Afghanistan."

13 Charged In Big Insider Trading Scam (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Federal prosecutors unsealed criminal charges against more than a dozen people, including former executives at four of Wall Street's elite institutions, accused of engaging in thousands of improper trades in two schemes that netted more than $15 million in profit.

A grand jury in Manhattan indicted nine people on conspiracy, fraud and bribery charges. Among them were lawyers and officials responsible for protecting the integrity of the firms and the market, who instead became perpetrators, prosecutors said. They worked for such top-tier firms as UBS, Morgan Stanley, Bank of America Securities and Bear Stearns.

Four others, who agreed to plea bargains, helped investigators crack open the massive, six-year insider-trading plot and will provide testimony against their onetime associates, government officials said.

Together, the charges and guilty pleas mark one of the biggest and most prominent insider-trading busts since the era of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine, when handcuffed executives were marched out of investment firms two decades ago.

"It is particularly pernicious when Wall Street insiders . . . shamelessly compromise the markets' integrity and investors' trust for a quick buck," said Linda Chatman Thomsen, the enforcement chief at the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The six-month probe unearthed furtive meetings among the alleged conspirators, who used disposable cellphones and coded text messages to evade detection and paid kickbacks in the form of cash-filled envelopes. Investigators said they shook their heads at times as the case increasingly resembled the greed on display in the 1987 film "Wall Street."

The charges come as federal authorities are accelerating their efforts to stanch the improper flow of information among a select group of insiders on Wall Street -- a tactic that allows insiders to reap handsome profits at the expense of average investors.

Among those charged is Mitchel S. Guttenberg, a manager in UBS's equity research department, who prosecutors say tipped off traders to forthcoming upgrades and downgrades in specific stocks in exchange for a share of the profit. Guttenberg was arrested at home yesterday morning, said FBI official Teresa L. Carlson.

In 2001, as part of his job, Guttenberg gained access to a daily list of UBS analyst recommendations before it was distributed to the public, government officials said. He first exploited the information to repay a $25,000 personal loan owed to Erik R. Franklin, a former employee of Bear Stearns who has worked at three hedge funds in recent years, according to court papers.

The pair initially met at New York's fabled Oyster Bar, in the bowels of Grand Central Terminal. But finding that arrangement nettlesome, they bought disposable cellphones and sent each other coded text messages before UBS analysts downgraded their ratings on such stocks as Allstate and CVS.

The scheme involved thousands of trades, according to SEC officials. Guttenberg and Franklin invited others to join them, including relatives and executives who had worked at Bear Stearns, regulators said. The men traded in their personal accounts as well as in Franklin's hedge fund accounts.

Brokers at the New York firm Assent discovered the scheme by monitoring an account that some of the participants used. Instead of reporting the problem to law enforcement officials, however, the Assent brokers "blackmailed" the traders for more than $180,000 in cash to keep quiet, U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia said at a news conference in New York.

"Each of the individuals we charged had a responsibility to protect investors and the integrity of the markets," said Scott W. Friestad, an SEC associate director of enforcement. "What's particularly insidious about this case is that the first instinct of each of these individuals was to try to find a way to personally benefit from the non-public information rather than to do the right thing."

A second alleged plot revolved around Randi E. Collotta, a former compliance unit officer at Morgan Stanley, who prosecutors say shared tips with her husband and other traders about coming corporate acquisitions involving bank clients from 2004 to 2005. Collotta, an attorney, violated Morgan Stanley policy by passing on word of Adobe Systems' looming acquisition of Macromedia and of UnitedHealth Group's purchase of PacifiCare Health Systems, among other deals, according to court papers.

DOJ_NMG_0138974

The two rings converged with Franklin and another man, former Bear Stearns professional Robert D. Babcock. Babcock, who also processed trades for one of Franklin's hedge funds, received tips from a participant in the Morgan Stanley scheme. He allegedly shared that inside information with Franklin and others, authorities said.

SEC investigators found an avenue into the byzantine schemes more than six months ago after examining trades by Franklin's father-in-law in advance of a 2005 Morgan Stanley deal involving Catellus Development. SEC lawyers searched extensive trading records for patterns that led them to Franklin's doorstep.

In October, securities investigators flagged the issue for federal prosecutors and FBI agents in New York and expanded their probe from trades involving corporate mergers to transactions based on when UBS analysts had upgraded or downgraded stock ratings.

Franklin, who helped authorities unravel the scheme, pleaded guilty to conspiracy, securities fraud and bribery on Tuesday. Babcock pleaded guilty to similar charges a day later, but prosecutors kept both agreements secret until yesterday.

Eight of the defendants appeared in New York and another appeared in Florida for arraignment yesterday. Each pleaded not guilty, and all were released on bond.

Barry P. Barbash, a former securities regulator who now works at the law firm of Willkie, Farr & Gallagher, said the case reflects the fact that a generation of young professionals no longer recalls seeing Wall Street titans face perp walks and grueling trials for insider-trading crimes in the 1980s.

"This case is an unfortunate reminder to everybody in the business . . . It's sobering."

In recent months, prosecutors and securities regulators have focused on hedge funds and private-equity companies -- fast-growing investments designed for wealthy individuals and institutions -- that strive to gather bits of information to profit in advance of corporate announcements.

At a meeting yesterday in Texas with leaders of each of the SEC's regional offices, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox affirmed that policing possible insider trading by hedge funds would be a top regulatory priority over the next two years.

Feds Charge 13 With Inside Trading (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, March 2, 2007

NEW YORK — Federal prosecutors announced criminal charges Thursday against 13 people, accusing them of participating in the biggest network of inside trading on Wall Street since the days of Ivan Boesky.

The criminal charges allege that traders from a handful of hedge funds and brokerages, acting on illegal inside information from some of Wall Street's biggest firms, netted $8 million in tainted gains from December 2001 to August 2006.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, which discovered evidence of the ring last year during a routine investigation, filed a parallel set of civil charges against 11 individuals and three hedge funds.

While the $8 million pales in comparison with the enormous sums misappropriated by Boesky and others in the 1980s, the scheme exposed Thursday was nevertheless shocking, said Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement.

The majority of inside trading cases involve an individual who comes across inside information and can't resist the temptation to make a quick buck. The difference here, Thomsen said, is that the inside trading ring operated for five years, involved hundreds of tips and thousands of relatively small trades. Worst of all, the inside information allegedly came from three "top tier" Wall Street firms: UBS, Morgan Stanley and Bear Stearns. "It's particularly pernicious when Wall Street insiders … shamelessly compromise the markets' integrity and investors' trust for a quick buck," she said.

Court documents filed by the SEC and Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, allege that the ring leaders of the scheme were: Mitchel Guttenberg, an executive director at UBS; Randi Collotta, an attorney in Morgan Stanley's compliance department; and Erik Franklin, a former portfolio manager for a hedge fund at Bear Stearns. Franklin has pleaded guilty. Attorneys for Collotta and Guttenberg could not be reached.

The documents allege that the scheme was launched in 2001 when Guttenberg met with Franklin at the Oyster Bar, a well-known restaurant in Manhattan's Grand Central Station. At the time, Guttenberg owed Franklin $25,000.

According to the SEC, Guttenberg proposed to pay off the debt by giving Franklin advance notice of significant changes in the position of UBS analysts on stocks. For example, in December 2001 Guttenberg allegedly tipped off Franklin that UBS was about to downgrade Allstate from "strong buy" to "hold." Franklin shorted the stock through the Bear Stearns hedge fund where he worked, netting a quick profit of $10,100 when the downgrade was published.

Prosecutors alleged that Collotta, a former Morgan Stanley attorney, shared sensitive information about upcoming mergers and acquisitions with her husband and a trader in Florida. The three allegedly split the trading profits that resulted. The Wall Street banks say that they are victims of the crimes and are cooperating with the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0138975

13 Accused Of Trading As Insiders (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson And Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

It started in 2001 with two old friends meeting at the Oyster Bar in the basement of Grand Central Terminal in Manhattan, discussing a $25,000 debt.

It ended yesterday with federal authorities saying that they had exposed one of the most far-reaching insider trading schemes on Wall Street in decades, involving four investment banks and a web of hedge funds, day traders, lawyers and even a few supervisors, who upon discovering evidence of insider trading, blackmailed the traders to keep quiet about it.

Thirteen people were accused yesterday of taking part in the trading ring, including a former Morgan Stanley compliance official, a senior UBS research executive, three employees from Bear Stearns and a Bank of America employee.

Linda C. Thomsen, chief of enforcement at the Securities and Exchange Commission, described the scheme as one of the most "pervasive Wall Street insider trading rings since the days of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine."

Nine of the defendants have been arrested, and four have pleaded guilty to charges ranging from securities fraud, conspiracy to commit securities fraud and bribery. The investigation, conducted by the S.E.C., the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the office of the United States attorney in Manhattan, has been under way for more than a year and is continuing.

The schemes described by federal authorities were unusual for their breadth and the seniority of the executives involved.

The tactics, however, were all too familiar: Wall Street executives tipping hedge fund traders about potential upgrades or downgrades of stocks, information sure to move a stock's price; leaking information about pending mergers and acquisitions, and taking kickbacks to get access to hot deals. In the middle, authorities say, was a hedge fund manager looking for an edge.

Federal authorities say that in 2001, Mitchel S. Guttenberg, a 41-year-old executive director in the stock research department of UBS, met a friend, Erik R. Franklin, then a hedge fund manager at Bear Stearns at the Oyster Bar. Mr. Guttenberg owed Mr. Franklin $25,000 and proposed paying that debt with information about stock upgrades and downgrades. He was a member of the firm's investment review committee, which reviewed and approved analyst recommendations.

Mr. Guttenberg provided hundreds of tips to Mr. Franklin about rating changes so that he could make quick trades in his hedge fund at Bear Stearns, Lyford Cay Capital. The two agreed to share the after-tax profits after the debt between them was settled. They exchanged cash at arranged meeting places — echoes of the Boesky case — and bought disposable cellphones and created codes to communicate with one another.

Lyford Cay was a small hedge fund overseen by Kurt W. Butenhoff, a senior managing director at Bear Stearns who is a top-producing broker and an equity derivatives specialist. Lyford Cay was made available to the firm's high-net-worth clients, a number of whom resided in the exclusive resort of the same name in the Bahamas, as well as senior Bear Stearns executives. The fund was closed down in 2004 because of poor performance.

Mr. Franklin reported to Mr. Butenhoff. In 2002, Mr. Franklin left Lyford Cay to return to Chelsey Capital, a hedge fund whose president once sought to buy the New Jersey Nets. Mr. Franklin joined forces with another portfolio manager, informed him about the UBS tips and the two traded on them, investigators say.

A spokesman for DSJ International, which operates as Chelsey Capital, said: "We are dismayed to learn of the actions of two former employees who left over four years ago. We are committed to continue cooperating in the investigation."

Mr. Guttenberg pleaded not guilty yesterday. His lawyer declined to comment. Mr. Franklin has pleaded guilty. His lawyer declined to comment.

Over five years, according to the S.E.C., Mr. Franklin made $5 million in illicit profits for his various hedge funds, his own personal accounts and an account in the name of his father-in-law, said the S.E.C.

But the ties went further than the two friends: each had his own network of tippees. The case was so complex that the United States attorney in Manhattan, Michael J. Garcia, yesterday used a large poster board to explain the inner workings. "Clearly greed is at work," he said.

According to court filings, some of Mr. Franklin's former Bear Stearns colleagues, including Robert Babcock, also worked with Lyford Cay and knew he was receiving, and profiting from, illegal information. After Mr. Franklin left Lyford Cay at Bear Stearns, Mr. Babcock continued to monitor Mr. Franklin's personal accounts and used the information to trade for Lyford, making $660,000 between late 2001 to 2003. Another Bear Stearns employee was accused of using information gleaned from Mr. Franklin's account to trade for his own accounts.

Mr. Babcock has pleaded guilty. His lawyer declined to comment.

"Actions described in the complaint are clear violations of our policies and procedures," said Russell Sherman, a Bear Stearns spokesman. "We have and will continue to cooperate fully with the investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0138976

Mr. Guttenberg gave tips to other friends, including David Tavdy, a 38-year-old proprietary trader at Andover Brokerage, which was later acquired by Assent. Mr. Tavdy traded on information at Assent and then later at Jasper Capital. Mr. Tavdy ultimately made $6 million trading in illicit information, according to the S.E.C.

Mr. Tavdy pleaded not guilty. His lawyer did not return calls.

Two executives at Assent got wind of the illegal UBS information and the trading that was going on with it. Rather than turn the traders in, they demanded bribes of $150,000 between them to keep quiet, investigators say. The two executives face charges.

A UBS spokeswoman, Rohini Pragasam, said, "UBS is assisting the authorities to the fullest extent possible in their investigation into the alleged actions of a single UBS employee."

It was not the UBS scheme, however, that tipped off regulators but rather trading around big mergers that got the S.E.C.'s attention.

According to authorities, in 2004, Randi Collotta, a 30-year-old lawyer in the global compliance department at Morgan Stanley, teamed up with her husband, Christopher Collotta, to dispense information about Morgan Stanley's work on coming mergers to Marc Jurman, a high school friend of Mr. Collotta's. In return, authorities said they would receive a share of illegal profits.

Mr. Jurman traded on deals including Adobe Systems acquisition of Macromedia in 2005 and ProLogis's acquisition of Catellus Development. The information netted them about $600,000.

Mr. Jurman in turn tipped off Mr. Babcock, who passed on information to Mr. Franklin and his partners at Bear Stearns, closing a wide, and very lucrative, circle.

Unusual trading in Catellus tipped off the S.E.C. The trading led to an account in the name of Mr. Franklin's father-in-law. Over a year of investigation, the myriad connections became clear.

Mark Lake, a Morgan Stanley spokesman said, "We are outraged that a former employee allegedly stole confidential information from the firm, and we have cooperated and will continue cooperating fully with the authorities."

Mr. Garcia described Morgan Stanley and UBS as victims.

Mr. Jurman pleaded guilty. His lawyer, Lilly Ann Sanchez, said: "We aimed to resolve this case expeditiously. Mr. Jurman is a very minor player in the overall conspiracy."

The Collottas entered not guilty pleas yesterday.

Mr. Franklin had yet another scheme going to get inside information: between late 2005 and October 2006, Paul Risoli, a broker at Banc of America Securities, is accused of allocating shares of initial public offerings and secondary offerings to Q Capital, Mr. Franklin's hedge fund, netting the fund at least $160,000. Mr. Franklin is accused of paying Mr. Risoli $9,500 as part of the scheme.

Mr. Risoli pleaded not guilty. His lawyer could not be reached yesterday.

"We are aware of the situation and we are cooperating with authorities," said Shirley Norton, a spokeswoman for Bank of America.

For two counts of conspiracy to commit fraud and four counts of securities fraud, Mr. Franklin would face a maximum of 90 years in prison, but sentencing guidelines suggest he would more likely face about five years.

The S.E.C. complaint accused 11 people and 3 entities of making illicit profits totaling more than $15 million, while the criminal charges cite illicit profits of $8 million from 13 individuals.

A 'Brazen' Insider Scheme Revealed (WSJ)

By Randall Smith, Kara Scannell And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Mitchel Guttenberg was $25,000 in debt to Erik Franklin when the two friends got together in 2001 to settle the obligation. The scheme they allegedly concocted that day in New York's cavernous Oyster Bar restaurant grew into one of Wall Street's biggest insider-trading cases in years.

Mr. Guttenberg, now 41 years old, agreed to relay advance word of potentially market-moving stock analysis by the Wall Street arm of Swiss bank UBS AG, where he was a research executive, to Mr. Franklin, now 39, a hedge-fund manager in those days at Bear Stearns Cos., authorities said.

THE ADOBE LEAK

· How one of the insider-trading leaks happened, according to the SEC:

· On April 18, 2005, Adobe Systems announced it would buy Macromedia, sending Macromedia's stock up 10%.

DOJ_NMG_0138977

· Before the news, Morgan Stanley's Randi Collotta learned the information. She and her husband, Christopher, passed it to Florida broker Marc Jurman. He bought (for himself and his father) "call" option contracts, betting on a rally in Macromedia and two other stocks. Profit: $30,000.

· Mr. Jurman also tipped Bear Stearns broker Robert Babcock on Macromedia and two other deals. He bought call options. Profit: $75,000.

Source: SEC complaint

Federal prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission yesterday unveiled insider-trading charges against the duo and eleven others, including three other former brokers at Bear Stearns.

The participants in what the SEC called a "brazen" scheme allegedly earned about $15 million based on two strands of alleged inside information. The main one, from the UBS research, accounted for most of those gains. A second stemmed from leaks of takeover deals in the works at the blue-chip Wall Street firm Morgan Stanley.

The takeover-trading tips came from former Morgan Stanley lawyer Randi Collotta, 30, who was a compliance official responsible for monitoring adherence to securities rules, the SEC said. In a statement, Morgan Stanley said it was "outraged" and had cooperated in the probe and would continue doing so. Ms. Collotta pleaded not guilty in federal court.

UBS depicted itself as a "victim" of the scheme and said it is "committed to safeguarding the integrity of its proprietary information." Bear Stearns, whose employees allegedly traded on both the UBS and Morgan Stanley tips, said the actions described by regulators "are clear violations of our policies and procedures." Both UBS and Bear said they are cooperating as well.

The case suggests how easy it can be to get and trade on market-moving information before its public disclosure. Participants used disposable cellphones and coded text messages to cover their tracks and at times passed cash in a Doritos bag, people familiar with the case said. Along the way, some of the participants allegedly paid $150,000 to two defendants to keep their trading under wraps, payments U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia in Manhattan called "blackmail."

SEC enforcement director Linda Chatman Thomsen said the illegal trading in the case "shamelessly" compromised "the markets' integrity and investors' trust for a quick buck."

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

1

Speaking at a news conference2 in Manhattan, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia outlines federal charges in an insider-trading case involving 13 defendants from Morgan Stanley, UBS, Bear Stearns and Bank of America.

The SEC filed civil charges against 11 people, two hedge funds and one day-trading firm. Federal prosecutors also charged 10 of the 11 individuals, and three others, with criminal violations.

The alleged scheme, which stretched from late 2001 to last fall, was uncovered within the last six months -- after the SEC checked into suspicious trading by Mr. Franklin's father-in-law before news in June 2005 of an acquisition of Catellus Development Corp. involving Morgan Stanley bankers.

Four of those charged, including Mr. Franklin, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges including conspiracy, securities fraud and commercial bribery. Mr. Guttenberg was arrested at 6 a.m. EST yesterday at his home on the East Side of Manhattan. Wearing a dark blue long-sleeve T-shirt and jeans in court, he pleaded not guilty and was released on $500,000 bond. He declined to comment.

At UBS, Mr. Guttenberg was an executive director and institutional-client manager in the research department, serving since 2001 on its investment-review committee, the SEC said. The committee members got an advance look at midday of the next days' reports, some of them market-moving, by research analysts who rate stocks and forecast their earnings.

After their 2001 meeting at the Oyster Bar in the basement of New York's Grand Central Terminal, the SEC said, Mr. Guttenberg began feeding advance tips about UBS research to Mr. Franklin, who then managed a hedge fund at Bear Stearns with the tony name Lyford Cay.

The SEC said Lyford Cay earned $10,000 from advance word of a UBS downgrade of insurer Allstate Corp. in December 2001 by selling borrowed shares and quickly buying them back at a profit of about $1 a share. Mr. Franklin also traded ahead of new ratings on Lexmark International Group Inc., U.S. Bancorp and Union Pacific Corp.

After Mr. Franklin's profits on the trades were enough to repay the loan, the SEC said, he began making cash payments to Mr. Guttenberg at prearranged meetings.

Before Mr. Franklin left Bear Stearns in February 2002, the SEC said, some of his Lyford Cay trades were entered by another Bear Stearns broker, Robert Babcock, who also entered orders in Mr. Franklin's personal account at Bear Stearns.

Mr. Babcock, realizing that some of the Franklin trades were based on nonpublic information, began using them to trade stocks for Lyford Cay and for his own account and continued to do so after Mr. Franklin left, the SEC said -- netting the Bear Stearns hedge fund $600,000 in illicit profits from 2001-2003. Mr. Babcock has pleaded guilty, and his lawyer declined to comment. Two other Bear Stearns brokers who worked on the same desk as Mr. Babcock, Ken Okada and Andrew Srebnik, also piggybacked on Mr. Franklin's trades for their personal accounts in 2002, the SEC said. Mr. Okada pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud and was released on bail of $100,000. Mr. Srebnik, who wasn't charged criminally, couldn't be reached.

DOJ_NMG_0138978

After leaving Bear Stearns, Mr. Franklin joined another hedge fund, Chelsey Capital, where he provided UBS tips to portfolio manager Mark Lenowitz, garnering Chelsey $2 million in illicit profits and Mr. Lenowitz $325,000, the SEC said. In March 2003, Mr. Franklin opened a new hedge fund, Q Capital, with Mr. Lenowitz as a partner and investor -- netting another $300,000, the SEC said.

Mr. Lenowitz pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud and was released on $250,000 bond. A spokesman for Chelsey, now doing business as DSJ International Resources Ltd., said it was "dismayed" and cooperating.

The biggest alleged beneficiary of UBS tips from Mr. Guttenberg was another friend, David Tavdy, who earned $6 million in illicit profits for himself, a friend and a relative at firms called Andover, Assent and Jasper Capital. At Assent, two employees who learned of the trading got $150,000 for their silence, the SEC said. Mr. Tavdy and those firms, one of which has closed, couldn't be reached.

In 2004 and 2005, the Morgan Stanley deal tips also found their way to Mr. Franklin and two of the Bear brokers, Messrs. Babcock and Okada, via a Florida broker, Marc Jurman, a friend of Ms. Collotta's husband, Christopher. They included advance word of acquisitions of Argosy Gaming Co., Macromedia Inc., and Pacificare Health Systems Inc.

Mr. Jurman pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud, and his attorney called him a "minor player" who earned only $30,000. Mr. Collotta pleaded not guilty, and his lawyer declined to comment.

US Charges 13 With Insider Trading (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Thirteen people, including current and former employees of Morgan Stanley, UBS and Bear Stearns, have been charged with criminal securities fraud in what US authorities said on Thursday was “one of the most pervasive Wall Street insider trading rings since the days of Ivan Boesky”.

The ring capitalised on two key sources of inside information, according to US Attorney Michael Garcia.

Randi Collotta, a Morgan Stanley compliance officer, allegedly passed on news of pending mergers and acquisitions from 2004 to 2005. Mitchel Guttenberg, a UBS executive director, allegedly gave traders for several hedge funds advance warning of stock upgrades and downgrades for more than six years.

The stream of conspirators who passed on or used the inside information eventually grew to include 14 people, including eight Wall Street professionals, two broker-dealers and three hedge funds, including Lyford Cay, a Bear Stearns vehicle, the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

The SEC estimated that the participants netted more than $15m. If convicted, the defendants face potential maximum sentences ranging from 15 to 90 years, depending on their alleged level of involvement.

Four people – including Erik Franklin, 39, and Robert Babcock, 33, both former Bear employees – have pleaded guilty to criminal charges. Nine others, including Mr Guttenberg and Mrs Collotta and her husband, Christopher, were arrested early on Thursday.

“Insider trading is more than just peeking into your opponent’s hand in a friendly poker game. It’s not just unethical. It is a felony,” said Teresa Carlson, acting FBI special agent in charge in New York.

The two insider trading schemes were separate, but some of the same investors – including Mr Franklin and Mr Babcock – benefited from both, Mr Garcia said. His office also brought a third Wall Street case today, charging Paul Risoli, a Bank of America employee, with taking kickbacks in exchange for allocating initial public offering shares to Mr Franklin.

Morgan Stanley and UBS both said they were co-operating with the investigation. UBS said Mr Guttenberg had been placed on unpaid leave. Mrs Collotta left Morgan Stanley of her own volition more than a year ago.

“Some defendants may have thought they were flying ‘under the radar’ by making modest profits on individual transactions, secure in the knowledge that, over hundreds of tips, they would reap millions,” said Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC enforcement director, who also compared the schemes to those of Mr Boesky, a central figure in the insider trading scandals of the late 1980s.

Investigators Say They've Uncovered $15-million Insider-trading Plot (LAT)

By Walter Hamilton And Thomas S. Mulligan, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138979

NEW YORK — In 2001, Wall Street executive Mitchel Guttenberg sat down with his friend, Erik Franklin, in New York City's famed Oyster Bar to discuss repaying a $25,000 loan.

But instead of giving him cash, Guttenberg offered a currency that can be even more valuable on Wall Street: inside information about dozens of stock analyst recommendations at his firm, financial-services powerhouse UBS.

Thus began what regulators described today as the most pervasive insider-trading scandal to course through Wall Street since the days of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine in the late 1980s.

That scheme -- and another at Morgan Stanley that was also disclosed today -- encompassed 14 people, four major Wall Street firms, several hedge funds and more than $15 million in illicit profits over a four-year period, according to federal authorities.

"This involved people who should have known better and people who were making a great living," said Linda Thomsen, enforcement director at the Securities and Exchange Commission. "This is outrageous."

With insider trading, someone with advance knowledge of important events -- such as an analyst recommendation or a corporate merger -- trades on that information or passes it along to an accomplice.

Though it has receded from public view in the years since Boesky and others made headlines, authorities fear that insider trading is making a comeback on Wall Street amid the current bull market. In particular, they are worried that hedge funds -- private investment groups known for their aggressive styles -- are using such tips to make big profits.

In their case, Guttenberg and Franklin allegedly went to elaborate lengths to conceal their activity, using such dodges as disposable cell phones, coded text messages and clandestine meetings.

And, authorities said, there proved to be no honor among thieves, as several people who caught wind of the insider trading launched mirror trades of their own, and two people went so far as to blackmail the original perpetrators by threatening to expose them.

Taken together, the schemes also involved trading on initial public stock offerings and on red-hot mergers and acquisitions, including the 2005 buyout of California health insurer PacifiCare Health Systems Inc.

walter.hamilton@latimes.com
thomas.mulligan@latimes.com

Two Lawyers, 11 Others Indicted For Roles In Insider Trading (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal
New York Law Journal, March 2, 2007

Federal authorities Thursday announced the indictment of 13 people on insider trading charges, including a former Morgan Stanley compliance lawyer and her husband, also an attorney.

The Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney's Office claims the defendants participated in two overlapping insider trading rings. The larger of the two was allegedly fed by Mitchel Guttenberg, an institutional client manager in the equity research group at UBS Securities, who tipped off several Wall Street traders over the past six years about upcoming recommendations by UBS analysts.

The second ring was fed by Randi Collotta, a former member of Morgan Stanley's global compliance group who in 2004 and 2005 passed along non-public information about mergers and acquisitions transactions on which the investment bank was advising.

The recipients of her tips included her husband, Christopher Collotta, a Bohemia, N.Y., labor and employment lawyer, and his friend Marc Jurman, a Florida-based broker. Jurman in turn tipped off Robert Babcock, a Bear Stearns & Co. broker who also participated in the UBS ring.

According to the Securities and Exchange Commission, which also filed a civil complaint in the matter yesterday, the UBS participants made at least $14 million in profits from trading on inside information. The Morgan Stanley scheme netted its participants at least $600,000.

Each defendant faces multiple securities fraud counts, each of which carries a maximum prison term of 20 years. They also face fines and disgorgement of trading profits. Four defendants, including Jurman and Babcock, pleaded guilty earlier in the week.

Guttenberg sold information directly for hundreds of thousands of dollars to two Wall Street traders, Erik Franklin and David Tavdy, who also have pleaded guilty to insider trading. Franklin managed two hedge funds, including one for Bear Stearns, while Tavdy was a proprietary trader for two small broker-dealers. The two passed along the UBS information to hedge fund manager Mark Lenowitz, day trader David Glass and three Bear Stearns brokers -- Andrew Srebnik, Ken Okada and Babcock.

The Southern District prosecutors also brought charges against two brokerage employees who helped conceal trading -- Samuel Childs and Laurence McKeever of Hoboken, N.J.-based Assent brokerage -- activity by Tavdy and Glass, as well as a Banc of America Securities broker who received a kickback for placing initial public offering shares with one of Franklin's hedge funds.

Among the inside information Guttenberg passed along was that UBS was going to downgrade the stocks of Caterpillar Inc. and Union Pacific and upgrade those of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Whole Foods Market Inc. The tippees shorted those stocks to be downgraded and accumulated those that were to be upgraded.

Ms. Collotta's duties at Morgan Stanley, where she worked from 2003 to 2005, included ensuring that confidential deal information was maintained in accordance with both the firm's policies and federal regulations. She tipped off her husband and Jurman ahead of time about Penn National Gaming Inc.'s 2004 acquisition of Argosy Gaming Co.; Johnson & Johnson's unsuccessful bid for Guidant Corp.; Adobe Systems Inc.'s 2005 acquisition of Macromedia Inc.; and other deals.

Both Ms. Collotta, 30, and Mr. Collotta, 34, graduated from St. John's University Law School. He is an associate at the four-lawyer Long Island firm of Zabell & Associates. She most recently worked for The Garden City Group Inc., which provides administration services to large-scale litigations.

US Busts Wall St. Insider Trading 'Ring' That Pocketed Millions (AFP)

By Justin Cole

AFP, March 2, 2007

Federal authorities Thursday announced they had busted a major Wall Street insider trading ring of securities dealers, hedge fund traders and a corporate attorney, and had filed criminal charges against 13 people.

The defendants were accused of illegally amassing millions of dollars by stealing sensitive market information from major investment banks including UBS and Morgan Stanley, aided by members of the ring who worked at the two banks.

The Securities and Exchange Commission said it filed civil charges against the 13 plus one additional person.

The SEC claimed the ring had pocketed over 15 million dollars in "illegal insider trading profits on thousands of trades" dating to 2005.

Its members used inside information, on companies such as Caterpillar and Goldman Sachs, to executive favorable stock trades and net illicit gains, according to officials.

Those accused in the scheme could face prison terms of up to 20 years on some charges. They also could face hefty civil fines from the SEC.

"Today's action is one of the largest SEC insider trading cases against Wall Street professionals since the days of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine," said Scott Friestad, an associate director of enforcement at the SEC.

Boesky and Levine both served prison terms for well-publicized securities fraud and insider dealing cases on Wall Street during the 1980s. The movie "Wall Street" was based in part upon Boesky's illicit activities.

"Our action today is one of several that will make very clear the SEC is targeting hedge fund insider trading as a top priority," SEC chairman Christopher Cox said.

The involvement of hedge fund traders in the ring is likely to spur calls for tougher oversight of the secretive capital pools whose financial muscle has grown rapidly in recent years.

One of the more senior professionals charged was Mitchel Guttenberg, 41, an executive director and institutional client manager at UBS' equity research department.

Guttenberg was charged with securities fraud and could face years behind bars if found guilty of the charges.

"UBS is assisting the authorities to the fullest extent possible in their investigation into the alleged actions of a single UBS employee. The US Attorney has described UBS as a victim of this alleged scheme," UBS said in a statement.

Officials said the ring went to exhaustive lengths to hide their improper trading activities from scrutiny.

Members of the ring met at Manhattan's famed Oyster Bar and also used disposable cell phones, secret codes and cash kickbacks to pull off their improper trades, according to investigators.

Others charged included Randi Collotta, 30, the lone woman in the group and a former Morgan Stanley lawyer who allegedly passed on market tips on deals to her husband Christopher Collotta, 34, another lawyer.

Christopher Collotta then passed his wife's tips onto other members of the ring, the SEC claimed.

Erik Franklin, 39, who worked as a manager at the Lyford Cay hedge fund and also for Bear Stearns in New York, was also charged along with other defendants, including at least two other former Bear Stearns dealers and other hedge fund traders. Franklin's defense lawyer could not be reached for comment.

Other hedge funds named in the charging documents included the Q Capital hedge fund and the Chelsey Capital hedge fund.

"Todays events should send a message to anyone who believes that illegal insider trading is a quick and easy way to get rich," said SEC enforcement chief Linda Thomsen.

"No matter how clever you are, no matter how hard you try to avoid detection, you underestimate us at your peril," Thomsen warned.

The Justice Department and the SEC, who were aided by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, said their probes were ongoing and that financial penalties against those involved were also being sought.

Judge Rejects SEC Suit Against Former Citigroup Execs (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 2, 2007

Charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission that two former Citigroup executives "aided and abetted" their company in a scheme to cheat mutual fund investors of almost $100 million have been dismissed by a federal judge.

Southern District of New York Judge Richard Conway Casey granted Thomas W. Jones and Lewis E. Daidone's motion for summary judgment, finding that the SEC's actions seeking civil penalties and an injunction against the executives were time-barred.

In Securities and Exchange Commission v. Jones, 05 Civ. 7044, the judge also held that the SEC's request for disgorgement was "not supported by sufficient facts."

The commission was successful in winning a $208 million settlement against Citigroup, which did not admit or deny guilt. It did not rule out an appeal of Judge Casey's verdict.

"We are disappointed with the decision and are reviewing our options," said spokesman John Heine.

Jones was chief executive of Citigroup's asset management division, and Daidone was treasurer and chief financial officer of the Smith Barney mutual funds in question.

The case involves the 1999 establishment by the company's asset management division of an in-house transfer agent service and its decision to employ First Data, a processing services provider, as the sub-transfer agent.

A transfer agent is responsible for keeping shareholder records and for issuing or canceling stock certificates when shares are bought and sold.

Citigroup Trust Bank "would take over customer service functions and would maintain overall responsibility for the transfer agent function while sub-contracting First Data to perform transaction processing and all other customary functions of a transfer agent," Casey explained.

Rather than passing a substantial fee discount to the funds, the SEC said that Citigroup's divisions, through the transfer agent, took most of the benefit of the discount for themselves, netting nearly $100 million in profit over five years at the expense of fund shareholders.

The agency alleged that Jones and Daidone did not accurately inform the company's board members as to how much Citigroup stood to make from the arrangement, and the true reasons for picking First Data to serve as subcontractor.

"[They] did not disclose to the Funds' boards the benefits [Citigroup] would receive from the transfer agent arrangement or the revenue guarantee letter that allegedly motivated [the company] to accept First Data's offer," the commission said.

The board ultimately approved the transfer agent proposal, which was implemented in 1999.

In 2003, Irving David, a former Citigroup employee, informed the SEC that the transfer agent arrangement was "probably not in the best interest of the shareholders of the funds," and accused Citigroup of making money that could have been passed on as savings to mutual fund shareholders.

After investigating the allegations, the SEC in May 2005 ordered the disgorgement of more than $109 million plus prejudgment interest, and payment of an $80 million civil penalty.

The commission sued Jones and Daidone in August 2005, alleging that their actions violated §206 of the Investment Advisers Act.

Although the agency only stated one cause of action against the men, it sought three forms of relief: civil penalties, a permanent injunction and disgorgement.

NO 'GUIDEPOSTS'

Judge Casey held that the civil monetary damages and permanent injunction requests were subject to the five-year statute of limitations outlined in 28 U.S.C. §2462. He deemed the requested remedies to be penalties in accordance with this statute, and said that because the agency filed its lawsuit six years after the alleged wrongdoing, it was time barred.

The judge said that while Jones and Daidone's allegedly fraudulent acts of misrepresentation may not have been affirmatively disclosed to the SEC, "the record does not support a finding that they were incapable of being known."

"Irving David drew the Commission's attention to things that were not concealed," he said. "The Commission's conclusory assertion of self-concealing fraud is insufficient to sustain its claim for civil penalties."

DOJ_NMG_0138982

Casey also said the commission had not demonstrated that the requested injunction was aimed at protecting the public from future harm, and said the agency had not "put forth any facts that would indicate that Jones and Daidone engaged in a pattern of securities law violations."

In reviewing the disgorgement request, the judge said the agency did not provide evidence that the two former executives made money as a result of their alleged misrepresentations or omissions.

"Among the hundreds of pages submitted as exhibits to the parties' summary judgment papers, the commission is unable to provide the Court with any guideposts for determining the proper amount of Defendants' compensation subject to disgorgement," Casey said.

He said the only evidence the commission offered in support of its disgorgement action against Daidone involved statements from his supervisors that his compensation was based on how he performed on "significant projects," that the transfer agent initiative was a large project, and that his compensation in 1999 "might have been affected by the initiative."

In support of its disgorgement action against Jones, Casey said the agency offered "even fewer facts." Jones had testified that his boss was a "very performance-oriented person, and had a reputation that if you did a good job, he paid you well."

Jones was represented by James R. Doty, a former SEC general counsel who is now a partner at Baker Botts.

George I. Terrell, Jr., Alex J. Bourelly, Rebecca A. Huddle, Lennette W. Lee, Jeffrey J. McNabb, Timothy Loper and Joshua Klein, also of Baker Botts, were involved in the case.

"Tom Jones did absolutely nothing wrong," Terrell said in an interview. "While Judge Casey's opinion centers on the statute of limitations argument, I have to believe that he was persuaded of his innocence because 95 percent of the summary judgment briefing concerned exactly that."

Jones was forced to resign from Citigroup in October 2004 after an internal audit determined that he had been responsible for a breakdown of oversight in private banking in Japan. The banking giant agreed to pay him $5 million in cash and to invest $50 million in a hedge fund that Jones oversaw (NYLJ, May 11, 2006).

Daidone was represented by Richard J. Morvillo, Michael O. Ware and Peter H. White of Mayer Brown Rowe & Maw.

"We were bullish about our prospects at trial, but it is always gratifying to have a court agree with you that a trial is not necessary," Morvillo said.

Mark K. Schonfeld, Courtney C. Fennimore, Valerie A. Szczepanik and James M. McGovern represented the SEC.

Omnicom Ex-Executive May Aid In Suit (WSJ)

By Peter Lattman And Vanessa O'connell

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

New allegations by a former Omnicom Group Inc. executive could provide legal ammunition to claims in a four-year-old securities-fraud lawsuit that the ad giant created a sham entity, Seneca Investments, to improperly avoid taking write-downs on its Internet assets.

In an amended complaint filed last month in federal court in Manhattan, the former chief executive of Seneca says Omnicom controlled the entity and no other party contributed any assets to it. The ad giant created Seneca in 2001 to move ailing Internet assets off its balance sheet.

In the lawsuit, initially filed in December 2006, Michael Tierney, a former Omnicom executive who became CEO of Seneca, alleges Omnicom owes him stock options valued at roughly $1 million. Omnicom maintains the options never vested. Mr. Tierney left Seneca in March 2004. His amended complaint also raises questions about Seneca's independence from Omnicom, making allegations that match similar charges in the securities-fraud suit.

Omnicom lawyer Peter Wald said in a statement yesterday, "We ... strongly dispute Mr. Tierney's contention that Omnicom controlled Seneca."

Among possible evidence in Omnicom's defense is a 2001 deposition for an unrelated lawsuit. In that deposition, Mr. Tierney said that he was only employed by Seneca, and not Omnicom.

"The evidence clearly shows that Mr. Tierney and his management team have been responsible for the successful day-to-day activities of Seneca since May 2001," Mr. Wald said.

The securities-fraud suits were filed against Omnicom in 2002 after The Wall Street Journal ran a page-one article about Seneca and other accounting practices at Omnicom. In March 2005 a judge dismissed two of the lawsuit's three allegations, involving Omnicom's reporting of growth and liabilities. The remaining accusation involves Seneca. The case is pending in federal court in Manhattan.

Omnicom, the world's largest ad holding company, created Seneca in May 2001 with Pegasus Capital Advisors LLP, a Greenwich, Conn.-based private-equity firm, and put 16 ailing Internet assets into the entity. The main assets were stakes in three public Internet marketing companies -- Agency.com, Organic and Razorfish. Omnicom had originally acquired the investments during the technology boom.

DOJ_NMG_0138983

But its Internet strategy faltered when the boom ended. Omnicom said in an early 2001 filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the assets were still worth about what it had paid for them, but didn't disclose the price. An internal spreadsheet that surfaced later, in the securities-fraud lawsuit, says that it paid $128.1 million but that the stakes' value in March 2001 totaled $38.6 million. (Between late 2002 and mid-2003 Omnicom used its Seneca stock to buy back 100% of Organic and Agency.com, which have prospered as the Internet ad business has recovered in recent years.)

When it created Seneca, Omnicom said it had enlisted Pegasus to help turn around the dot-com businesses. The deal was structured so that Omnicom received preferred shares in Seneca, in return for the Internet assets and some cash. Pegasus received common stock in Seneca. Omnicom accounted for the Seneca deal as an asset sale without reporting a gain or loss. It says Seneca was structured as an independent entity, which allowed the company to avoid recording losses on the assets.

In his lawsuit Mr. Tierney says that Pegasus "contributed nothing, and was required to contribute nothing" to Seneca. He also says that Omnicom completely indemnified Pegasus and paid the private-equity firm roughly $6 million in "management fees" to induce Pegasus to be a Seneca shareholder.

"This guy is alleging that Pegasus is just an agent acting on Omnicom's behalf -- that's a common allegation in this sort of case," says Robert Willens, a tax and accounting analyst at Lehman Brothers. "The result of this being correct would be that Seneca would be a wholly owned subsidiary of Omnicom, and Omnicom would have to report Seneca's results," says Mr. Willens, who isn't involved in the lawsuit. "That would lead to a restatement no doubt, and almost certainly some sort of write-off, or write-down."

Omnicom argues that the dealings with Pegasus were arms' length. It said in a 2001 filing with the SEC that Pegasus contributed cash to Seneca and told its auditors likewise. But Seneca's tax return for 2001 doesn't report cash from Pegasus, according to court documents in the securities-fraud lawsuit.

Lawyers for Omnicom maintain in court filings in the securities-fraud lawsuit that the transfer of assets to Seneca was properly accounted for, as confirmed by two independent auditing firms -- Arthur Andersen and KPMG -- and that an informal SEC inquiry hasn't resulted in action.

"We certainly disagree with the characterizations of the factual allegations," adds Pegasus attorney Stephen M. Baldini, a partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP. "This seems to be a dispute between an individual and Omnicom."

This isn't the first time Mr. Tierney, 54, has sued over compensation issues. In the early 1990s he filed a lawsuit to retrieve money from a former employer. His claim was rejected.

Mr. Tierney's lawsuit paints Seneca as an entity under Omnicom's control. "Omnicom often made major decisions regarding Seneca and its assets without informing" him, says the complaint. As CEO of Seneca, Mr. Tierney says he reported directly to Omnicom's Chief Executive John Wren and Chief Financial Officer Randall Weisenburger on a weekly basis; in addition, the complaint says he maintained all of his Omnicom benefits and received W-2s listing Omnicom as his employer.

Through an Omnicom spokesman, Mr. Wren declined to comment. Mr. Weisenburger didn't return messages yesterday seeking comment.

Omnicom altered its relationship with Mr. Tierney in 2003 as a result of the pending securities-fraud lawsuit, according to Mr. Tierney's lawsuit. The complaint says that Omnicom told Mr. Tierney that it was concerned that his continued work for Omnicom in any capacity would support the claims in the securities-fraud lawsuit relating to Omnicom's control of Seneca. Consequently, Mr. Tierney says Omnicom refused to pay him for options he had allegedly received under his original employment agreement with the company.

Once Again, Nortel Says It Must Restate Its Financial Results (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

OTTAWA, March 1 — Nortel Networks said Thursday that it would have to restate its results for the fourth time in four years, a move that will delay the filing of its 2006 annual report.

The latest restatement involves results from 2004, 2005 and the first nine months of 2006. The company said that the restatements were necessary to correct mistakes in recording income and because errors by an outside actuary firm caused pension liabilities to be misstated by $104 million over several years.

Over all, the company expects that the changes will raise revenue for the first three quarters of 2006 by about $24 million and increase earnings for the period by $15 million. That will be offset by reductions in the earlier years.

DOJ_NMG_0138984

“Clearly, I’m not pleased that we need to restate,” the chief executive, Mike S. Zafirovski, said in a conference call with analysts. Mr. Zafirovski, a former Motorola executive, was hired by the Toronto-based company in 2005, in part to help it recover from its financial turmoil.

The first restatements stemmed from an accounting scandal that led to the firing of several top executives as well as criminal and securities investigations in both Canada and the United States.

The announcement Thursday was not expected. In recent public statements, Mr. Zafirovski has portrayed the company’s accounting struggles as being behind it. Last month, when he announced that the chief financial officer, Peter W. Currie, would be leaving the company at the end of April, Mr. Zafirovski praised his work.

“Peter has successfully steered Nortel through many difficult financial issues and, in the process, has enhanced the company’s governance,” Mr. Zafirovski said at the time.

This will be the third time Mr. Currie has left Nortel. Previously he was chief financial officer from 1994 to 1997 and held other positions from 1979 to 1992.

In Thursday’s conference call, Mr. Currie blamed the complexity of Nortel’s business for the restatements.

Dean Mundy, a Nortel spokesman, said Nortel was still using the actuary firm, but declined to identify it.

Executives At Brokerage Leave Amid Investigation (BSUN)

By Paul Adams, Sun reporter

The Baltimore Sun, March 2, 2007

Ferris Baker Watts, the century-old investment brokerage with deep Baltimore roots, said yesterday that six executives and traders have resigned or taken temporary leave since federal officials and outside counsel began investigating the firm's trades for a former client accused of stealing millions of dollars.

The list of temporary and permanent departures includes several top executives in Baltimore and Hunt Valley, indicating the investigations have disrupted management at the firm more broadly than company officials disclosed two weeks ago.

The changes are fallout from a federal probe of an investment fund set up by a Cleveland man who, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission lawsuit, took in $50 million from investors and spent much of the money on stock trades placed through Ferris and other firms. Most of the money is missing. Ferris has stressed that neither it nor its clients lost money in the scheme and that it is cooperating with regulators and federal investigators.

Legal experts and former SEC enforcement officials say even the temporary absence of so many top people shows how seriously Ferris is taking the matter and suggests the firm faces a lengthy and costly probe of its internal controls designed to prevent fraud. Brokers are subject to extensive regulatory oversight and are required to police trading activity to ensure fairness in the market.

"Outside counsel is going to want to impress the SEC and impress the [Justice Department] ... that the company is doing everything it can to clean house, and on the other hand it's certainly par for the course that key folks might step aside so that there's no appearance of any influence on the investigation," said Charles Ross, a white-collar defense attorney in New York who has defended compliance officers, fund managers and brokers in securities cases.

Personnel changes Ted Urban, the firm's executive vice president and general counsel, took voluntary leave in November and subsequently opted for early retirement, effective yesterday. He has been replaced by Dana S. Gloor, an associate general counsel with Ferris since 2001.

Horace Usry, director of institutional sales, was put on leave Jan. 3 and resigned last week, a firm spokeswoman said. He has been replaced by Jeff Fowlds, a former Stiefel Nicholas managing director, the firm said yesterday. Usry did not respond to a phone message yesterday.

John Belgrade and Mark LaVerghetta, both institutional traders, are on temporary leave during the investigation, the firm said. Neither of the traders could be reached for comment yesterday.

Ferris confirmed on Feb. 12 that Louis Akers Jr., director of the firm's private client group, and Patrick Vaughan, director of retail sales, took temporary paid leave while outside counsel conducted its investigation. At that time, Robin Oegerle, a Ferris spokeswoman, declined The Sun's request to confirm that Usry, Urban, Belgrade and LaVerghetta also had stepped aside, citing the firm's policy of not commenting on personnel matters.

"We note that we are not a public company, so we are not subject to the disclosure requirements that would apply to a public company," she said yesterday.

Oegerle added that the firm brought in outside counsel to investigate what role, if any, the individuals on leave played in the supervision of the trading activity in question.

"It is common to ask individuals who may be close to the inquiry to step aside while the investigation takes place," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0138985

The firm, which has dual headquarters in Baltimore and Washington, said previously that it expects the executives still on leave to return once the investigation has reached an advanced stage.

Gathering facts "Just because there's this internal investigation and people are evaluating what happened doesn't necessarily mean that people engaged in wrongdoing," said Kathleen M. Hamm, a former SEC enforcement official who heads the securities practice group for Promontory Financial Group in Washington.

"I would say this is just the process pursuant to which regulators and prosecutors confirm either that a broker-dealer was a victim of their client's misbehavior or eliminate the potential that someone at the firm knew more."

Hamm said outside counsel will often identify failures in internal controls and recommend how to strengthen fraud-prevention measures. But firms sometimes suffer damage to their reputations and incur great expense while the investigations play out, she said.

"They're incredibly costly, they're time-consuming and they certainly are disruptive," she said.

Ferris Baker's troubles can be traced back to David A. Dadante, the Cleveland man who the SEC says operated his IPOF investment fund as a Ponzi scheme. The SEC complaint says Dadante "misappropriated investor funds for his own use" and pursued an "undisclosed high-risk investment strategy." At least $28 million of investor money is missing.

Dadante diverted some of the funds to amass a 35 percent stake in Innotrac, a lightly traded company in Georgia that processes orders for companies that sell merchandise on the Internet. Some of the trades were placed through Stephen J. Glantz, a Ferris Baker broker who left the firm in 2005. Glantz has denied any impropriety, saying that while he handled Dadante's account, the fund manager's trades often went straight to Ferris' trading desk.

Ferris was one of at least six brokerage houses processing huge purchases of Innotrac stock for Dadante, according to Mark Dottore, the court-appointed receiver for what remains of IPOF. Dottore said Dadante made the trades through numerous accounts, similar to a prescription drug addict obtaining multiple prescriptions through several doctors without each doctor knowing about the others. Investigators are likely asking whether the brokerages sufficiently policed Dadante's activities, Dottore and other securities experts said.

"Some things happened all across the board at all of these different firms," Dottore said. He indicated that Ferris has been cooperative.

That several other firms also were apparently duped by Dadante could play to Ferris' favor, said Ross, the defense attorney. But it might come down to how much trading Dadante conducted through Ferris and how quickly and fully the company reported the problems to regulators once it discovered them.

Regulators also might look favorably on the firm's decision to remove key managers during the probe and to bring in outside counsel, he said.

Ferris said the management changes announced yesterday coincide with the start of the firm's new fiscal year. In addition to the appointments of Fowlds and Gloor, the firm promoted Adrian G. Teel, a Ferris board member and former director of the Maryland Port Authority, to chief operating officer.

paul.adams@baltsun.com

Democrats Unveil Bill For CEO Pay Vote (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The first US legislative effort for two years aimed at curbing excessive executive pay emerged on Thursday as Barney Frank, a top Democrat, introduced a bill that would require public companies to allow non-binding shareholder votes on pay packets.

The move comes as companies prepare for the annual meetings season, when executive pay promises to be an issue with shareholders.

Last month, President George W. Bush warned company boards that they needed to “pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve”.

Mr Frank, chairman of the House financial services committee, said his bill would require companies to include an advisory – or non-binding – vote in their annual proxies. The move borrows from the UK, where advisory votes have been routine for some years.

Public pension funds and unions have urged advisory votes as a way of allowing shareholders a way of expressing their view on whether CEO pay is commensurate with performance.

Mr Frank said: “I do not understand those who argue that the people who make up our stock markets are collectively very wise, but at the same time are somehow incapable of rendering a coherent opinion of what they should pay those they employ to run the corporations that they own.”

DOJ_NMG_0138986

Critics of moves to install new mechanisms for controlling executive pay argue that shareholders should wait to see how executive pay disclosure rules issued last year by the Securities and Exchange Commission work out. The SEC in July passed rules requiring companies to provide a single figure representing an executives' total compensation as well as a "narrative" explaining how compensation committees arrive at a pay package.

Mr Frank said the SEC had taken "a good step forward" with the changes. But he said the disclosure was "incomplete".

His bill would ensure that shareholders had "a say on their company's executive compensation disclosures, without micromanaging the business".

Mr Frank will chair hearings by the financial services committee on executive pay next Thursday.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Verdict Said To Be Unlikely This Week (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Jurors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. seem unlikely to reach a verdict this week and will be allowed to end deliberations at 2 p.m. today to attend to personal matters, Judge Reggie B. Walton said. The judge said he realized that there would be no verdict yesterday, the seventh day of deliberations, because jurors "did not dress" for such an occasion. Six of the 11 jurors wore blue jeans.

Jurors In Libby Case Allowed To Leave Deliberations Early (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Jurors considering perjury charges against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby signaled yesterday that they were still working to reach a verdict after seven days of deliberations and did not expect to arrive at one this week, according to a note they sent to the presiding trial judge.

The 11 jurors asked U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to release them at 2 p.m. today so some can attend to personal business. Walton said in court that he presumes jurors will continue deliberating into next week in the case against Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff.

"We the jury respectfully request to be excused at 2 p.m. on Friday, March 2, to attend to personal professional and medical obligations that can't be addressed during our weekend," jurors wrote to Walton in a note posted on the court's Web site late yesterday afternoon.

Walton called jurors into court about 4:30 p.m. on a separate matter, telling them they could not consult a dictionary, as they had requested. He said he would explain words they have trouble understanding, then promised they could leave at 2 p.m. today and sent them home.

Walton noted the jurors' casual clothing and said he "knew we wouldn't have a verdict today." He added, referring to the note he had just received: "And I assume they will not have a verdict tomorrow either." During their three-minute appearance in court, only the second since deliberations began, several jurors chatted amiably.

Monday would mark the ninth day of jury deliberations after a trial that lasted 14 court days.

Gregory Mize, a retired D.C. Superior Court judge now researching jury trials in state and federal courts, said there is no good way to judge the appropriate length of jury deliberations for a case.

"The time needed to reach unanimity depends on lots of things, such as the complexity of the case and the chemistry of the jurors in their relationship and communications during deliberations," he said.

The longest recent deliberation in this federal court was 29 days, in a 2002 case that resulted in the convictions of six members of a drug gang known as "Murder Inc."

Libby, 56, is charged with five felony counts alleging that in 2003 he lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury investigating the disclosure of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Plame is married to former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who in 2002 was sent by the CIA on a mission to Niger to explore reports that Iraq was trying to buy nuclear materials from the African nation. He concluded those reports were groundless and, months after the Iraq war began, publicly accused President Bush of distorting his findings to justify the invasion.

Prosecutors contend that Libby was part of a White House campaign to disclose Plame's identity to discredit her husband by implying that he was chosen for the Niger mission because she worked at the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0138987

Libby is not charged with the leak. His lawyers say he inaccurately remembered conversations with colleagues and journalists about Wilson and Plame because he had a bad memory and was overwhelmed by national security responsibilities.

Political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb contributed to this report.

Libby Jury Seems To Be Settling In (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jurors in the perjury trial of ex-White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby expect to deliberate into next week.

They asked U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton for a dictionary and more office supplies and asked to leave early today for the weekend. Walton denied the request for the dictionary but told jurors they could take off at 2 p.m.

"So I assume they will not have a verdict tomorrow either," Walton told lawyers Thursday as jurors finished their seventh day of deliberations.

Before bringing the jurors into court, Walton advised lawyers they "will not be happy about coming into court because they don't think they are dressed appropriately."

He said that was why they decided not to come into court Monday for a brief discussion and was how "I knew there wasn't a verdict" coming Thursday.

About half were wearing blue jeans. Most smiled broadly when Walton granted their request to leave early today.

It appeared the seven women and four men were making their own visual aids to help sort out the complicated case.

Jurors had asked for a large flip chart, masking tape, sticky notes and pictures of the witnesses almost immediately after beginning deliberations last week.

Late Wednesday afternoon, they emerged to ask the judge for easel-sized pages to stick on walls.

Walton said he denied the dictionary request — not an uncommon one for juries — because definitions of common words can have legal implications.

He told jurors that if they had questions, they could ask him directly.

Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is accused of obstruction of justice and lying to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating the 2003 leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame, wife of a prominent Iraq war critic.

Study Draft Decries Execution Appeals Process (USAT)

By Richard Willing, Usa Today

USA Today, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — Death-sentence appeals take too long, traumatize victims' families and burden states with millions in extra costs for housing convicted killers, a draft of a new study commissioned by the Justice Department shows.

The study also found that death penalty cases are not hopelessly flawed by errors, as opponents of capital punishment have charged.

The study, which reviewed state death sentences issued in the 1990s, found that 26% were reversed during the first level of the appeals process. Most of those "direct appeals" were rejected because of sentencing errors. Some of the death sentences were later reinstated.

In only 11% of those cases did the appeals court find problems with the underlying murder convictions, says the unreleased study by Barry Latzer and James Cauthen, professors at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York.

USA TODAY obtained a draft of the study.

The study challenges a 2000 report that concluded the capital punishment system is "broken" because 68% of all death penalty cases from 1973 to 1995 were eventually overturned. The report, by a team led by Columbia University law professor and death penalty foe James Liebman, also found 41% of cases were reversed during direct appeals.

The Liebman study provided a false picture of the death penalty because it included many cases from the 1970s and 1980s, when the U.S. Supreme Court rewrote death penalty rules and caused many sentences to be reversed, the Justice Department's report says.

Latzer and Cauthen tracked 1,676 death sentences issued in 14 "representative" states from 1992 through 2002. Among the report's other findings:

·Half of all death penalty appeals take nearly three years to be decided by state appeals courts. Federal review, which follows state appeals, can extend the process by years.

·Virginia settles death penalty appeals fastest, in a median time of 295 days.

·Ohio, Tennessee and Kentucky were the slowest states, each taking more than three years to resolve appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0138988

·States pay an average total of $274,000 in housing costs for every prisoner they execute.

Death penalty supporters say the study shows that delays are part of a strategy to undermine a sentence that most Americans support.

"Opponents of the death penalty can't get an outright repeal anywhere, but are working to impede the process by slowing it down to a crawl," says John McAdams, political science professor at Marquette University in Milwaukee.

Capital punishment foes say the lengthy appeals process may in itself be an argument for abandoning the death penalty.

"If you like bureaucracy, you'll love the death penalty," says David Elliot, spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty.

The death penalty study was commissioned in 2005 by the National Institute of Justice, the Justice Department's research arm, to find ways to speed up the execution process.

Inmate Asks For Immediate Execution (AP)

By KELLY P. KISSEL, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 2, 2007

(AP) - LITTLE ROCK-A death row inmate who wants an immediate execution had his request rejected Thursday.

The Arkansas Supreme Court ruled the request was premature and said the man's U.S. lawsuit challenging the way the state executes prisoners is still pending.

But over the past three months, convicted murderer Terrick Nooner, 35, has tried to exit the federal lawsuit and has asked the court to order his execution.

Nooner suffers from severe mental illness and believes Arkansas prison officials are abusing him by implanting a device in his body that controls him, federal public defender Julie Brain wrote Jan. 3 in a motion challenging Nooner's attempt to drop his lawsuit.

She said Nooner also claims prison staff is contaminating his food.

"His overriding goal is to seek redress for, and relief from, the physical harm that he perceives is being repeatedly inflicted on him," Brain wrote.

U.S. District Judge Susan Webber Wright has not ruled on Nooner's attempt to drop his lawsuit.

Nooner was convicted for the 1993 robbery and murder of Scot Stobaugh, 22, at a laundromat.

Nooner filed his lawsuit last May, saying lethal injection is unconstitutionally cruel and should be banned. Lawsuits nationwide claim the injections leave inmates in pain before they die.

The Arkansas prison system says its dose of a painkiller is strong enough to cause death, even before the subsequent injections of chemicals that paralyze the body and stop the heart.

Brain said in January she had spoken to Nooner and "to the limited extent that counsel is able to meaningfully communicate with" him, Nooner has no desire to hasten his execution. 2007-

State, Feds Vow To Chase Predators (KENPOST)

The Kentucky Post, March 2, 2007

Kenton County Commonwealth Attorney Rob Sanders said his office will partner with the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Kentucky to aggressively prosecute child predators and gun-related cases.

As one of the first steps in that effort, Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney for Kenton County Laura Ward was sworn in Wednesday as a Special Assistant United States Attorney. Ward will help prosecute those types of cases at the federal level.

The new arrangement is part of the Department of Justice's Project Safe Childhood and Project Safe Neighborhoods initiatives, which are designed to coordinate efforts of local, state and federal law enforcement and officials, with a focus on prosecutions of child predators and gun violence.

"These initiatives can only be accomplished through the hard work and cooperation of law enforcement and prosecutors at every level," U.S. Attorney Amul Thapar said in a statement. "This partnership shows the commitment that not only our office has, but that Rob Sanders has as well, on making the community safer for our families and our children."

Sanders said crimes in neighborhoods must not go unnoticed.

"Our children deserve to grow up in safe neighborhoods," he said. "This partnership will help ensure that we are prosecuting cases with every resource available under state and federal law to take these criminals off the streets for as long as we possibly can."

Sanders said his office has launched local initiatives aimed at combating child predators and gun violence that mirror those of Project Safe Childhood and Project Safe Neighborhood.

DOJ_NMG_0138989

U.S. Man Accused In Double Kidnapping Charged With Child Pornography (AP)

By Christopher Leonard, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 2, 2007

(AP) - ST. LOUIS-A man accused of kidnapping and molesting two boys was indicted Thursday on federal charges he took pornographic pictures and videos of one of the youngsters.

The indictment marked the first federal charges against Michael Devlin, 41, a former pizzeria manager from the St. Louis suburbs.

Devlin is charged with kidnapping and other offenses in the 2002 abduction of Shawn Hornbeck, who is now 15, and the January abduction of 13-year-old Ben Ownby. Both boys were found in Devlin's apartment Jan. 12.

U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said four counts of the six-count indictment allege Devlin photographed and videotaped a minor engaged in sexually explicit acts between 2002 and this year. Two other counts allege he took the minor to Illinois and Arizona with the intent to sexually assault him.

Hanaway said all six counts involved the same child, identified only as "S," an apparent reference to Shawn. Authorities have alleged that Devlin held him captive from October 2002 until police found the boy in January.

It is The Associated Press' policy not to identify most alleged victims of sexual abuse, but the boys' stories have been widely publicized and their names are now well-known. Their families have also gone public, conducting media interviews.

Besides the federal charges, Devlin faces 75 state charges, including forcible sodomy, kidnapping and armed criminal action. He has pleaded not guilty to all those allegations.

Devlin's attorney, Michael Kielty, said he had not seen the prosecution's evidence, but he acknowledged that most child pornography cases are "very emotional, very difficult."

"If there are photos and videotapes, that certainly would add some weight to the government's case," Kielty said.

Shawn Hornbeck knew the federal charges would be filed and was with family members for moral support Thursday, said the family's attorney Scott Sherman.

"It's tough," Sherman said. "These are really tough facts. It's the most intimate and the most personal of all the indictments we think," Sherman said.

Shawn is ready to testify in the case, no matter how painful it might be, Sherman said.

"Justice for he and Ben is a very important element in (Shawn's) recovery," Sherman said.

Authorities allege Devlin used a gun to abduct Shawn as the boy was riding his bike near his home. Prosecutors have said he sodomized Shawn at least once a month for the next four years.

Neighbors thought Shawn was Devlin's son and said the boy was free to ride a bike, hang out with friends and cruise the Internet.

When Ben was abducted soon after getting off a school bus in January, a witness got a description of a white pickup seen speeding away. The description matched Devlin's vehicle, leading to his arrest.

Devlin remains jailed on $1 million (â‚¬760,000) bond. His federal trial won't begin until his three state trials have concluded.

Associated Press writers Betsy Taylor and Jim Salter in St. Louis and Lara Jakes Jordan in Washington contributed to this story. 2007-03-01T21:09:11Z

Hired Truck Figure's Son Prison-bound (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, March 2, 2007

Daniel N. Katalinic, the son of disgraced political boss Daniel M. Katalinic, was sentenced in federal court Thursday to 10 years and 1 month in prison for robbing a Mt. Prospect bank last year.

With his father watching, Daniel N. Katalinic shook his head back and forth as U.S. District Chief Judge James Holderman announced the sentence, warning that people who commit such crimes will face stiff penalties.

Katalinic, 32, told the judge a long history of drug abuse led him to rob the Parkway Bank at 1590 S. Elmhurst Rd. with another man.

Katalinic and his fellow robber brandished a loaded shotgun during the robbery.

Daniel M. Katalinic is also a convicted felon, set to serve a year in federal prison for taking bribes in the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program. He received a reduced sentence because he became a key witness in the prosecution of Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich.

Former Developer Of Wisconsin Casino Indicted (CHIT)

By Dan Gibbard, Tribune staff reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 2, 2007

The former developer of Kenosha's proposed $808 million casino project was indicted Thursday on federal charges for allegedly funneling $100,000 in improper campaign contributions to Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle, who has final approval over Indian gaming in the state.

Dennis Troha, 60, of Kenosha, Wis., was charged with one count of fraud and one count of making false statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Attorney's office in Milwaukee said. If convicted, he could face up to 25 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

The indictment alleges Troha used family members and businesses he controlled to send money to Doyle's campaign during the 2002 and 2006 campaigns. Troha would lend money to the family members, who would then write checks to Doyle's campaign, allowing Troha to circumvent the $10,000 cap on political donations by individuals. The money was only repaid early this year after federal investigators began looking into the case, the indictment said.

Prosecutors did not accuse Doyle, the first Democrat elected governor of Wisconsin in 16 years, of wrongdoing.

"The indictment does not allege a quid pro quo," said a spokeswoman for U.S. Atty. Steven Biskupic.

Doyle, in a statement, pledged to return the contributions if Troha is found guilty.

"My campaign was aware of nothing to suggest that the contributions received from Mr. Troha were in any way inappropriate or unlawful," Doyle said.

Wisconsin's Menominee tribe hopes to build one of the Midwest's largest casinos at the site of the Dairyland greyhound track, 10 miles from Illinois on Interstate Highway 94. To do that, the U.S. government must allow the property to be transferred into an Indian trust, because the site is not on the tribe's reservation.

Until last week, Troha was the tribe's developer and point man in Kenosha. On Feb. 23, after news of the investigation surfaced, he announced he had pulled out and sold his interest for an undisclosed sum to the Mohegan tribe of Connecticut.

The Mohegans, who operate one of the nation's largest Indian gaming casinos, were already working with Menominee on the Kenosha project.

The indictment's impact on the project is unclear. The project has cleared two major hurdles in recent weeks, say backers, who maintain its benefits outweigh the scandal.

Evan Zeppos, a spokesman for the project, acknowledged that Troha's troubles could bring new scrutiny but said the benefits should withstand criticism.

"Dennis' situation is obviously going to weigh on some people's minds, but we would just hope that they judge this on its merits," he said.

The main opposition to the project has come from the Forest County Potawatomi Band, which operates its own large casino in Milwaukee. The tribe says the Kenosha casino would hurt its operation and be disrespectful because the Potawatomi have stronger historical ties to the area.

The regional office of the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs recommended in January that the project be approved by the U.S. Department of the Interior. It's uncertain when Washington might issue a recommendation, but Zeppos said it could come as soon as summer.

If the U.S. approves the plan, it will be up to Doyle, who has not indicated a preference, to give the final OK.

That relationship makes the charges against Troha disturbing, said Jack Heck, director of the non-profit advocacy group Common Cause Wisconsin.

"The Troha family, with this interest in the casino in Kenosha, clearly they were trying to buy influence," Heck said.

Meanwhile, the charges are the latest blow to the once squeaky clean image of Wisconsin politics, where the influence of big money has only been felt in the last decade, Heck said.

"We're in a period of political turmoil and scandal like we've never seen in this state," Heck said. "It's a lot like Illinois politics now. It used to be very different."

11 Youths Arrested In Gang Stabbings (WP)

By Lori Aratani And Daniel De Vise

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Eleven young gang members, including a 12-year-old, are facing attempted murder charges in connection with a rampage in Wheaton and Aspen Hill on Saturday that ended with a mentally challenged Silver Spring man being beaten and stabbed, Montgomery County police said yesterday.

Two of them also are accused of a double stabbing that occurred earlier that evening at the Wheaton Metro station. All three victims survived, but the Silver Spring man is hospitalized in critical condition.

DOJ_NMG_0138991

The suspects, all males ages 12 to 17, claim to be members of the "Hotboyz/Shoot 'Em Up" gang, police said. They have been charged with attempted first-degree murder, robbery and assault. Some of their parents reached yesterday evening said they are being falsely accused.

Montgomery police said the first stabbing occurred about 7 p.m. Saturday at the Metro station. The two young victims, both male, told police they believed the attackers were gang members.

Police said the second assault took place about 8:40 p.m., outside a party in the 3700 block of Bel Pre Road in Aspen Hill. Partygoers at an apartment complex spotted an unknown youth climbing inside a car belonging to a party host. They left the apartment to investigate and saw three teenagers standing by the car and 20 others near the building.

When one of the teenagers near the car displayed a gun, the partygoers went inside, except for the 31-year-old mentally challenged man. Police said the man, whom they did not identify, walked toward the suspects and was struck several times with the handgun, repeatedly kicked and then stabbed.

As Montgomery police conducted their investigation, they learned that Metro Transit Police were looking into the stabbing at the Wheaton Station.

On Monday, the father of one of the Metro station victims was approached at a shopping center on the 5500 block of Norbeck Road by two males claiming they were responsible for stabbing his son. The father called police, but by the time officers arrived, the suspects had disappeared.

A short time later, police investigating a disorderly conduct report arrested three teens in the 3800 block of Dunsinane Drive. After joint interviews by Montgomery and Metro Transit Police, investigators determined that the suspects were connected to both stabbing incidents, police said.

Police said that the Metro incident was gang-related and that the party assault took place because the man interrupted the suspects' attempt to break into the car.

Police arrested six suspects Monday and five Wednesday. All have been charged with first-degree attempted murder, armed robbery and first-degree assault.

The 12-year-old was charged as a juvenile and sent to the Alfred D. Noyes Children's Center before being released to family members. His name is not being released because he is a minor.

The 10 others are charged as adults. They are: Roger Ghonda, 14, and his brother Ony Ghonda, 16, of Silver Spring; Alansan Turay, 17, of Silver Spring; Dumisani Tembo, 17, of Silver Spring; Carl Thomas, 16, of Silver Spring; brothers Gilbert Wiche Oriji, 14, and Guyton Mecko Oriji, 16, of Rockville; Alexander Mulugeta Tewolde, 17, of Silver Spring; Wesley Alexander Ruiz, 16, of Silver Spring; and Pernell Ricks, 16, of Derwood.

Thomas and Turay also have been charged in connection with the Metro station stabbing.

Parents of the suspects last night defended their sons.

"He's unjustly charged," said Memunatu Turay, mother of Alansan Turay. "The police don't have any suspects, and they want to pin it on him and his friends. He's not involved at all, and the police know that."

John Wilkins, the father of Gilbert and Guyton Oriji, said his sons are honor students who were not involved in the assault on the mentally challenged man.

"There were three of them: One of them hit him with a gun, one of them hit him with a bat, and one of them stabbed him," he said, describing the sons' account of the assault. "When one of my boys saw a gun, my boys ran."

Hope Umana, attorney for Dumisani Tembo, said he was "a little concerned about the treatment the police have given to this boy. He has not been allowed contact with family members." Umana said his initial impression was that Tembo "had very tangential involvement, if any," in the crimes.

Trial Opens In Case Of Convicted Sex Offender Accused In Murder Of 9-Year-Old Florida Girl (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

MIAMI, March 1 — The drifter charged with raping and burying alive a 9-year-old girl on Florida's west coast in 2005 went to trial here Thursday, after intense publicity forced the case to be moved 300 miles from where the child, Jessica Lunsford, was murdered.

The case provoked a nationwide crackdown on sex criminals, not least because the suspect, John E. Couey, was a convicted sex offender who had managed to skip required counseling sessions and move without telling parole officers. Many states have passed laws in Jessica's name, increasing minimum sentences for sexual offenses against children and requiring offenders to be closely tracked upon release.

DOJ_NMG_0138992

Mr. Couey told detectives soon after his arrest in March 2005 that he had killed Jessica, even telling them where to find her body. But Judge Richard A. Howard of Circuit Court in Citrus County ruled the confession inadmissible because the detectives had refused Mr. Couey's requests for a lawyer.

Prosecutors say they have an airtight case nonetheless. In his opening statement, Ric Ridgway, a state prosecutor, told the jury that Jessica's fingerprints were found in Mr. Couey's bedroom and closet, her DNA was found in blood stains on his mattress and her body was found in a shallow grave in his yard. They are seeking the death penalty for Mr. Couey, who faces charges of first-degree murder, burglary, kidnapping and sexual battery.

"The evidence will show that the one man responsible for all these acts is sitting right there," Mr. Ridgway said, pointing to Mr. Couey, 48, who shifted nervously, covered his face with his hands and drew on a sketch pad during the proceedings.

Despite a vast search and the wide distribution of a photograph of Jessica, her body was not found until three weeks after she disappeared from her bedroom in the middle of the night. She had been buried in two garbage bags outside the trailer Mr. Couey shared with relatives near the Lunsford home in Homosassa.

Even though they cannot bring up the tape-recorded confession that Mr. Couey made to Citrus County sheriff's detectives, prosecutors told the jury he made incriminating statements to guards at the county jail, allegedly telling them that he did not mean to kill Jessica.

"He eventually told the story of what had happened," Mr. Ridgway said.

Daniel Lewan, a public defender representing Mr. Couey, told the jury there was no proof that his client had committed any crime and asked them to stay impartial despite the painful details of the case.

"Emotions, sympathies, prejudices, biases have no part here," Mr. Lewan said. "I want you to look at how this investigation was conducted."

Mr. Lewan also said the crime scene had not been properly secured, evidence had been lost and the guards who allegedly heard Mr. Couey make incriminating statements never entered them in log books. He also said Mr. Couey was mentally ill and mentally retarded, which could affect whether he gets the death penalty if convicted.

Jessica's grandmother, Ruth Lunsford, told the jury how the girl had gone to bed at 10 p.m. on Feb. 23 after eating dinner, attending a children's church group and watching television in her room. Her father, Mark Lunsford, testified that he had arrived home about 5:45 the next morning to hear Jessica's alarm going off in her room and discover she was missing from her bed.

Mr. Couey's sister, Dorothy Dixon, testified that she, her boyfriend and Mr. Couey shared crack cocaine the night Jessica disappeared. She said Mr. Couey had briefly emerged from his bedroom the next morning to watch the search going on in their neighborhood, but that she had barely seen him over the next few days.

His niece, Madie Secord, testified that she had bought Mr. Couey a bus ticket to Savannah, Ga., at his request a few days after Jessica disappeared.

Prosecutors also showed a videotape of Mr. Couey being interviewed by a detective in Savannah, where he was taken in for questioning after the authorities in Homosassa realized he was one of the town's registered sex offenders. He told the detective that he had been living at a different address in Homosassa — the one where parole officers thought he was — and that he had never worked at a school. In fact, Mr. Couey had worked in construction at Homosassa Elementary School, which Jessica attended.

Mr. Couey had been registered as a sex offender after he was convicted in 1991 of exposing and fondling himself in front of a 5-year-old girl.

Mr. Lunsford's lawyer, Mark Gelman, questioned after the proceedings why Mr. Couey had not pleaded guilty given the evidence against him.

"If he had a decent bone in his body," Mr. Gelman said, "he would not be making the family go through all this today."

Exclusive | Gang Tied To Killing Of Toddler (TSSC)

By Adam Beam

The State (SC), March 2, 2007

A 2-year-old Swansea girl killed in a shootout in January was the victim of an attempted robbery by the Gangsta Killer Bloods, according to an FBI agent's courtroom testimony Thursday.

The testimony connects for the first time one of the Midlands' most heinous crimes with the highly organized gang, which has national ties.

The FBI detailed the gang's violent and sophisticated drug trafficking business in documents filed last month as part of an extensive federal investigation.

The girl's death is the first homicide — and at least the fifth violent crime — connected to the gang, whose members allegedly speak in code to hide their crack cocaine distribution network.

At least two of the three people charged in connection with the Jan. 22 shooting that killed Jalah Peeples were GKB members, FBI agent Michael Stansbury said in federal court. They reported directly to Torrean Sims, a now-jailed muscleman for the GKB and leader of one of its two subsets, Stansbury testified.

Miquel Robinson, 26, also known as "Q," and Tucson Jones, 24, also known as "Luck," would speak in code while discussing planned robberies with Sims, Stansbury said.

Sims, who has not been charged in the Swansea incident, was one of the subjects of a secret FBI investigation of the GKB in Columbia. Fourteen of the gang's members have been arrested in an alleged drug conspiracy. The men were indicted by a federal grand jury last week.

Stansbury said Jalah's death is "very significant" to the ongoing investigation, and more charges are expected.

FBI agents intercepted thousands of phone calls on Sims' phone during a court-approved, 30-day wiretap operation that ended Jan. 26. In those calls, agents say, they overheard Sims discussing with Robinson and Jones at least nine robberies of other drug dealers.

Stansbury was in court Thursday in a detention hearing for Sims. Stansbury said he has no evidence that Sims coordinated the Jan. 22 attempted robbery in which Jalah died or that Sims knew it would happen. However, he said Sims discussed the shooting after it happened.

Sims was denied bail Thursday.

According to a police report, Laura McMichael, Jalah's mother, was stopped at her car at about 6 a.m. Jan. 22 by two masked men who were looking for Jalah's father, James Peeples Jr.

McMichael took the men to her upstairs apartment, where there was a shootout in the doorway. Jalah, who was in her mother's arms, was struck during the gun battle, police said.

Lexington officials have not determined who fired the shot that killed Jalah. James Peeples was one of those who fired a weapon during the attempted robbery.

Authorities confiscated powdered cocaine, crack cocaine and about $3,000 in cash from the apartment. No charges have been filed in connection with the drugs.

Jones, of Orangeburg, is accused of being one of the shooters during the attempted robbery, according to police. He was arrested on weapons charges last month in New York City. The earliest he could return to South Carolina would be March 26, police said.

Robinson, who was arrested in early February, was waiting in the getaway car, according to police.

Stansbury testified Lexington County sheriff's detectives listened to the wiretaps after the shooting to aid in their investigation.

Lexington County Sheriff James R. Metts declined to comment because the investigation is active.

Acting Swansea Police Chief Clif Hayes said he did not know about the gang connection. Eleventh Circuit Solicitor Donnie Myers, who is prosecuting the case, declined to comment.

Federal documents accuse the Gangsta Killer Bloods of operating a lucrative crack cocaine distribution ring.

The Gangsta Killer Bloods are part of the United Blood Nation, which is the East Coast cousin of the infamous Los Angeles street gang, the Bloods. The GKB had two subsets operating in Columbia.

According to the most recently filed search warrant documents, agents recovered more than $320,000 from the homes of gang members or gang associates, including nearly $250,000 in cash buried under the house of Javis McKenzie, allegedly one of the gang's main suppliers, who also was charged in the drug conspiracy.

The FBI used the wiretaps and undercover informants fitted with hidden video and audio equipment to bring the charges.

The wiretap on Sims' phone also included a conversation with a gang member in New York, Stansbury said. In that conversation, Sims told the man he was the "big homie" in the "met," meaning he was the leader of the gang in the Columbia metropolitan area.

"He said they were very organized and that they had it all together," Stansbury said. "He was pretty proud of the fact that he was moving up."

Sims lived with his mother. Agents did not find anything illegal in the house when they searched it. Agents did find a "book of knowledge," which they said is the blueprint of the gang's code, symbols and behavior. Stansbury said several sheets had been photocopied for possible recruiting purposes.

FBI agents were monitoring Sims' phone up until the minute of his arrest, Stansbury said. When FBI agents stopped Sims' girlfriend and told her Sims was wanted, Sims girlfriend called Sims and spoke to him in code, telling him to take their baby and run.

DOJ_NMG_0138994

Stansbury said Sims took his 2-month-old daughter and ran outside in the 30-degree weather across a golf course. Sims turned himself in after an FBI agent spoke to him on his girlfriend's cell phone and told him he would arrest his girlfriend if Sims didn't surrender.

Staff writer Shalama C. Jackson contributed to this report. Reach Beam at (803) 771-8405.

© 2007 The State and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.

http://www.thestate.com

Baltimore Man Indicted In Alleged 'Ponzi' Scheme (AP)

By Ben Nuckols

AP, March 2, 2007

Federal prosecutors say more than 900 investors bilked out of $8 million

A man who previously served prison time for fraud bilked more than 900 investors out of $8 million in a Ponzi scheme, the U.S. attorney's office said today.

David McDowell Robinson, 56, of Baltimore, has been incarcerated since last March for violating the terms of his supervised release in the earlier case by running a business, said Joseph L. Evans, his federal public defender. He was arrested again today, a day after a federal grand jury indicted him on wire fraud and mail fraud charges.

According to the indictment, Robinson was sentenced to eight years and 10 months in federal prison after pleading guilty in 1996 to charges of mail fraud arising from three different schemes. He also served prison time following 1989 convictions in Anne Arundel County for fraudulent misappropriation by a fiduciary and misconduct in public office.

Robinson was released from federal prison in April 2003. Prosecutors allege that he launched a new company, Liberty Trade International Inc., the next year and began scamming investors again.

The company solicited investments of up to $10,000 and promised returns of up to 30 percent, saying it would provide short-term "gap financing" to homebuyers or to people refinancing their homes to generate the returns.

Robinson instead paid investors with funds received by other investors, creating a classic Ponzi scheme, prosecutors said. A Ponzi scheme is when an initial group of investors get huge returns and promote the investment opportunity to others, whose investments allow the extraordinary returns to continue to be paid until the scheme collapses.

Robinson maintains his innocence, said Evans, who declined to comment on the facts of the case because Robinson may hire a different lawyer.

Robinson faces five counts of wire fraud and 14 counts of mail fraud. If convicted, he faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine for each charge.

He had an initial court appearance today and was ordered detained pending a hearing Friday. That hearing may be postponed if Robinson retains a private attorney, Evans said.

LTI was a scam from the start, according to the indictment. The company began accepting investors in September 2004, offering a 20 percent return over 60 days on a $2,500 investment; a 25 percent return over 90 days on a $5,000 investment; and a 30 percent return over 120 days on a $10,000 investment.

"Robinson made these representations even though Robinson knew that LTI was a new and untested company with no track record of investment success, no significant cash reserves and no realistic expectations of being able to invest funds itself at the necessary rates of return of 90 percent to 120 percent annually required to pay its investors the returns it advertised," the indictment said.

LTI allegedly used e-mails, faxes and mailings to communicate false information to investors. Robinson also is accused of using Financial Destination Inc., a marketing company that provides members with information about investment opportunities, to spread lies about his company through a voicemail message service and FDI's Web site.

Among what prosecutors describe as Robinson's false claims: that he has a doctorate; that he was a licensed attorney and that he had over 30 years' experience in real estate transactions. He did not mention his convictions or prison time, and prosecutors say that although he is a law school graduate, he does not have a law license.

According to the indictment, when LTI's assets were frozen in March, a court-appointed receiver found that the company had assets of $1.4 million and owed its investors more than $7 million. The amount owed was accruing at a rate of more than $600,000 a month.

LTI began running out of money in late 2005, and between December 2005 and January 2006 alone, the indictment says, Robinson solicited more than $4 million in new investments.

Among Robinson's alleged victims were residents of the Mississippi Gulf Coast who endured Hurricane Katrina. The indictment says he sent an employee to Gulfport, Miss., in January 2006 to make a presentation about LTI, and the company received about $80,000 in investments.

The indictment alleges that Robinson spent $600,000 of his investors' money on personal items, including jewelry and furs for a girlfriend, and down payments and lease payments for luxury cars.

Feds: Man Bilked 900, Including Katrina Victims, In Ponzi Scheme (BALTOEX)

Baltimore Examiner, March 2, 2007

BALTIMORE - Federal prosecutors are accusing David McDowell Robinson, 56, of Baltimore of engaging in a Ponzi scheme that defrauded more than 900 investors, including victims of Hurricane Katrina, of more than $8 million.

A grand jury indictment against Robinson was issued Wednesday and unsealed Thursday upon his arrest.

"The indictment alleges that David Robinson perpetrated an $8 million Ponzi scheme that victimized innocent investors, including Hurricane Katrina victims who were induced to invest their money in a worthless venture," said Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein.

Robinson could not be reached for comment.

From April 2003 until March 2006, Robinson was the sole shareholder, president and chief executive officer of Liberty Trade International Inc., according to the 19-count indictment.

During that time, the grand jury alleges, he solicited investors throughout the country — offering huge returns on investments, promising a 20 percent return on $2,500 in 60 days; a 25 percent return on $5,000 in 90 days; and a 30 percent return on $10,000 120 days.

With the promises, Robinson's company received more than $8 million in funds from more than 900 investors and used funds from other investors to pay the promised rates of return, prosecutors said.

The indictment further alleges that starting in November 2005, Robinson dispatched an employee to Gulfport, Miss., who made a presentation to victims of Hurricane Katrina. Liberty Trade International received about $80,000 in investments from residents of the Mississippi Gulf Coast area as a result of that presentation, prosecutors said.

Robinson faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine on charges of wire and mail fraud.

He is scheduled to have a detention hearing today at 2:30 p.m. before U.S. Magistrate Judge Susan Gauvey.

Probes Exposing Trenton Tradition (PHI)

By Jennifer Moroz And Elisa Ung

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 2, 2007

TRENTON - In Trenton, as it is in the nation's capital, tradition is under fire.

For years, legislators at the state and federal levels have slipped grants for pet causes and hometown projects into the budget at the last minute.

In New Jersey, they're known as Christmas tree ornaments. In Congress, they call them earmarks.

In both places, you'll hear them referred to as "pork." And in both places, they have become key to keeping constituents happy.

But now the longheld political practice, which typically plays out behind closed doors, is coming under major attack amid calls for greater government transparency and accountability.

In Washington, where one spending watchdog estimated that earmarks ballooned to a record $29.3 billion last year, lawmakers have passed proposals to shed light on the grant-making process, including a requirement that they attach their names to funding requests.

In New Jersey, where federal investigators have swarmed the Statehouse, demanding information about Christmas tree grants from the Legislature and Gov. Corzine's office alike, legislative leaders have vowed to similarly change how they add funds to the budget.

At the same time, they warn that the grants, which usually are funneled to causes and districts championed by the majority party, and can add hundreds of millions in spending to the budget should not necessarily be given a bad name.

Ingrid Reed, director of the New Jersey Project at Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute of Politics, agreed.

"The practice in general may now be under the spotlight but the real question is are those grants going to do good work or are people who should be acting in the public interest acting in their own self interest?" she said.

The federal investigation, which appears to focus on whether lawmakers personally benefited from grants they secured, stems from a probe of State Sen. Wayne Bryant, a Camden County Democrat. Bryant, who presided over the budget process as chairs of the powerful Senate and joint budget committees, has not been charged with any crime, but faces allegations that he was paid by the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey to steer millions in extra state funding to the school.

As part of its growing investigation, the U.S. Attorney's Office has since demanded a wide range of documents about the last-minute grants, dating back to 2004, from the Legislature, governor's office, Treasury and Department of Community Affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0138996

Assembly Speaker Joseph Roberts (D., Camden) said he welcomed both the investigation and public scrutiny into the grant-making process.

"Legislators have a right, if not a responsibility, to fight for projects in their districts," he said. Like Senate President Richard J. Codey (D., Essex), Roberts said many of the last-minute additions, both by governors and legislators, were for "very worthy causes" such as hospitals, libraries, the Boys and Girls Club, and municipal aid to help relieve the property-tax burden on homeowners.

"These revisions to the budget are by and large defensible," Roberts said, "but the process that has been used in Trenton forever, namely that these decisions are made at the last minute, is not a good process, and I'm committed to reforming that."

Roberts and Codey have both promised to make the process more open, requiring that legislators attach their names to funding requests and note any potential conflicts of interest. Those requests would have to be submitted much earlier in the budget process, so the public and process have time to review them.

"We have an obligation that the public has confidence in the process and right now, I don't think they do," Roberts said.

Investigators appear to be looking at whether legislators steered money to causes or projects in which they or relatives have a financial interest.

Besides Bryant, who has secured state funds for several employers other than UMDNJ, it is unclear what lawmakers, if any, have been singled out. But there are certainly others whose employers or family members have benefited from state grants.

Several North Jersey hospitals and other groups employing lawmakers and their relatives have received funding. And in South Jersey, Assemblywoman Nilsa Cruz-Perez, another Camden County Democrat, acknowledged in a 2005 interview that she pushed for a $50,000 grant to the Puerto Rican and Latino Culture and Arts Center in Camden. At the time, the center was paying a $26,000 salary to her sister, Ivette Cruz-Nieves, and it was run by her brother-in-law, then-Camden City Councilman Israel Nieves.

Cruz-Perez said in 2005 that her advocacy of the grant had nothing to do with her sister's job.

In a statement yesterday, Cruz-Perez said, "like many other organizations, the Puerto Rican Culture and Arts Center applied for state funding and there is nothing improper about assisting nonprofit groups that improve the lives of our constituents."

She said she and Roberts, who together represent the Fifth Legislative District, "consistently supported many nonprofit groups" and "we will continue to assist those groups in need as long as we hold public office."

Legislative leaders and the governor's office have vowed to comply with the slew of subpoenas that have landed in the statehouse during the last few weeks. Some legislative offices have hired outside attorneys to guide them through a process that to many here is new. Meanwhile, legislative staff yesterday were printing out e-mails and boxing up documents to be carted away to investigators.

Jeff Tittel, who spends much of his time in the State House lobbying legislators as director of the New Jersey chapter of the Sierra Club, said it was like watching rats run around.

"Everyone's scurrying," he said. "Every time you think things are turning back to normal, some new crisis hits. Here we go again, Trenton is under the spotlight."

U.S. Attorney Says Corruption Fight Goes On (AP)

By TOM HESTER Jr., Associated Press Writer

AP, March 2, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. -- A day after sending subpoenas to Gov. Jon S. Corzine's office, U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie on Thursday vowed to continue combating public corruption no matter where it might be found.

"I do not believe that any public corruption in the state of New Jersey by any public official is acceptable," Christie said. "So whether it is a zoning board member in Monmouth County or whether it's someone high up in state government, and everything in between, no public corruption is acceptable and we're going go after whatever we can find and we can prove beyond a reasonable doubt."

Christie's office has delivered seven subpoenas to the administration as part of an investigation into how the state budget has been developed since 2004, including subpoenas delivered Wednesday to Corzine's office and his chief counsel's office. Corzine's office has said it would cooperate fully.

The grand jury subpoenas request documents relating to grants that have typically been placed in the budget without public review just before the spending plan is adopted. Christie declined to detail the inquiry Thursday, but said, "I think the public already knows everything it needs to know about the integrity of the budget process."

Corzine's office defended the budget process under his administration.

DOJ_NMG_0138997

"Gov. Corzine has spent 15 months seeking fiscally sound budgets that are transparent," said the governor's spokesman, Anthony Coley. "He does not tolerate criminal conduct of any form _ whether part of the budget process or elsewhere. From last summer through last week's budget address, the governor has made suggestions on how to transform the budgeting process; he intends to see these reforms to completion this year."

Christie has also subpoenaed budget documents from Democratic and Republican legislative leaders and their staff offices.

He's also sought documents about Sen. Wayne Bryant, the former Senate budget chairman. Bryant resigned his chairmanship after a federal monitor reviewing the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey alleged Bryant received a no-work job at the school while helping steer state funding to it.

Christie, after attending a news conference in Lawrence Township to help announce drug arrests, said the public can take comfort that his office, when it does investigations, will do them right.

"And we will take whatever actions are necessary to protect the public from public officials who put themselves ahead of the public interest," Christie said.

The grants, commonly known as "Christmas tree items," are originated by lawmakers, but the governor approves them when signing the budget legislation.

The current $30.8 billion state budget, adopted last July, contained numerous last-minute add-ons. Corzine allowed them after a budget dispute that closed state government for a week and resulted in $1.8 billion in tax increases.

"We believe (government) should operate honestly and with integrity, first and foremost, and that the other thing that I've said repeatedly is that everyone has a responsibility to that," Christie said.

Christie has prosecuted more than 100 public corruption cases since becoming U.S. attorney in 2002, and he hasn't lost any of them. But he cautioned against prejudging any subpoena.

"Our job is to do our job the right way," Christie said. "When we do our job the right way, I think you'll notice that most of the time people plead guilty."

Senate President Richard J. Codey agreed with Christie's take on the budget, but noted he initiated _ before Christie's inquiry _ reforms that will require lawmakers to publicly request budget changes.

"Whether it's Republicans in power or Democrats, that's the way it's done, and I'm not saying that anybody did anything wrong, but it's going to always be criticized because of the way it's done and let's change it," said Codey, D-Essex.

Assembly Budget Committee Chairman Lou Greenwald said the newly implemented rules will make it more difficult for lawmakers to insert last-minute add-ons into the budget.

"I believe that is a productive byproduct of this process the U.S. Attorney has initiated," said Greenwald, D-Camden.

Associated Press Writer Angela Delli Santi in Trenton contributed to this report.

Alleged Madam Threatens To Sell List Of 10,000 Clients (WP)

By Paul Duggan

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A woman accused of running a prostitution service catering to men in hotels and homes in the Washington area was indicted on federal racketeering charges yesterday in a case with a twist: She has threatened to peddle "the entire 46 pounds of detailed and itemized phone records" of her clients to raise money for her defense.

Working out of her California home, Deborah J. Palfrey, 50, did business in Washington under the name Pamela Martin and Associates. On a Web site seeking donations to her legal defense fund, the company is described as "a high-end adult fantasy firm which offered legal sexual and erotic services across the spectrum of adult sexual behavior."

But federal authorities say it was a thriving call-girl service, begun in 1993, that dispatched college-educated women in their 20s to male clients in the Washington area who paid $275 to $300 per sexual encounter. The prostitutes kept half of the fees and mailed the rest to Palfrey in money orders, authorities allege in an affidavit filed in federal court.

The indictment says that in 13 years, the service employed 132 women and generated about $2 million in income "through prostitution related activities."

From January 2000 to September 2006, "Palfrey received and deposited over $750,000 in money orders from various prostitutes" into bank and investment accounts, according to the affidavit. It also says that Palfrey was convicted of operating a prostitution service in California in 1991 and was jailed for 18 months. She "started her current illegal prostitution business while still on probation," the affidavit says.

Palfrey is scheduled to make her initial appearance in the criminal case at the D.C. federal courthouse next Friday. She had no comment on the charges yesterday, said her attorney, Montgomery Blair Sibley. He is representing Palfrey in a civil asset-forfeiture case brought against her last year by federal authorities in the investigation of the alleged prostitution service.

DOJ_NMG_0138998

Sibley said his client's "legal escort service" was almost exclusively a cash business. He said that the women who worked for Palfrey were given 1099 tax statements each year, listing their earnings as independent contractors, and that Palfrey accurately reported her yearly income on federal tax returns prepared for her by H&R Block.

Palfrey has been warring with prosecutors since they raided her home in Vallejo, Calif., in the San Francisco Bay area, in October. Sibley said they seized about $1 million worth of real estate and $500,000 in cash and stocks and began the forfeiture proceedings.

"Ms. Palfrey adamantly disputes the government's claims of illegal behavior," according to her legal defense Web site, where she began seeking donations after the government took her assets.

"It is an unfortunate fact of life that funds will need to be generated to counteract the present injustice," the Web site says. As a result, "consideration is being given" to selling Palfrey's phone records dating to 1993, including the phone numbers of about 10,000 clients in the Washington area who used what Palfrey asserts was her legal escort service.

Palfrey sent an e-mail to prosecutors this year that warned of the disclosure. "I simply cannot emphasize to you the terrible and quite unnecessary ramifications this case (civil and/or criminal) will set off if permitted to advance," she wrote. "The press will have a field day. . . . I can state with unequivocal certainty this situation will be a very long and unpleasant one."

The U.S. attorney's office in the District, which is prosecuting the case, said it had no comment on the client list or the possibility that Palfrey will make it public.

The indictment charges Palfrey with violating the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act and with three counts of interstate travel in aid of racketeering and one count of conspiracy to launder money.

Authorities said Pamela Martin and Associates advertised in the D.C. Yellow Pages but did not have an address here. They said callers seeking to use the service were connected to Palfrey or someone working for her in California.

"Palfrey hires women who are at least 22 years of age, possess some college education and have employment outside of their prostitution activities," according to the affidavit, filed by an Internal Revenue Service agent last year in the forfeiture case.

Authorities said she placed ads recruiting women in the Washington City Paper, on the Internet, in the student newspaper at the University of Maryland and elsewhere.

"Palfrey personally interviews the women by telephone and has them mail an application with a photograph" to Palfrey's post office box in California, IRS agent Troy A. Burrus said in the affidavit. "The women tell Palfrey the days that they will be available, but Palfrey encourages them to work at least three nights a week."

He added, "After a woman is hired as a prostitute, she is sent to a 'screening' appointment, and is required to engage in sexual activity, without payment, with a male designated by Palfrey." The women had sex with the male "testers," authorities said, "so that Palfrey can ensure that none of her employees are law enforcement officers."

Burrus said "the prostitutes reside in Virginia, Maryland and Washington, D.C., and travel to locations in these three jurisdictions. . . . Palfrey tells the prostitutes where they should go, the time of the meeting with the customer, and the customer's name."

Escort Business Owner Indicted (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

A California woman was indicted yesterday on federal charges she ran a multimillion dollar prostitution ring in the District.

Deborah J. Palfrey, who is considering selling customer records to pay for her legal defense, faces racketeering and money-laundering charges under a federal indictment issued yesterday in federal court in the District.

Prosecutors said Miss Palfrey ran Pamela Martin & Associates as a prostitution ring in the District from her home in California since 1993.

According to the indictment, the prostitution business involved 132 women who were hired primarily through local newspaper ads, with money split between the prostitutes and Miss Palfrey. She was paid through money orders sent to her California post office box, prosecutors said.

The indictment, which also accuses Miss Palfrey of arranging sex for money in Virginia and Maryland, occurred months after authorities seized Miss Palfrey's bank accounts, stocks, real estate and gold coins in connection with the investigation.

Last fall, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed court papers to seize Miss Palfrey's assets. The civil forfeiture proceedings were ongoing.

The Washington Times first reported Feb. 21 that Miss Palfrey told federal authorities she would "make life miserable" for former customers and employees unless her case is dropped. The Times reported that government attorneys said Miss Palfrey had threatened to "harass potential witnesses whose identifies remain secret ... through calculated public disclosures of former customers' and former co-workers' identities."

DOJ_NMG_0138999

On Wednesday, an attorney representing Miss Palfrey in the forfeiture proceedings said his client would sell customer records over the Internet to raise money for her legal defense.

Attorney Montgomery Blair Sibley said Miss Palfrey will be "selling selected records of Pamela Martin and Associates, which will include contact information on all of the 'customers' of the service -- over 10,000 individuals -- from its entire 13-year operational history."

Last week, Mr. Sibley told The Times that Miss Palfrey did not intend to disclose former customers' identities or to make "a circus" out of the case.

Yesterday, he said his client's plan to sell records was "a last resort" to raise money for a legal defense.

Government attorneys have accused Miss Palfrey of threatening to use civil discovery to harass potential witnesses.

"Shockingly, claimant's 'civil' counsel threatened further public embarrassment of former customers," Assistant U.S. Attorney William R. Cowden stated in a court filing earlier this week in the forfeiture case.

In a recent e-mail to the U.S. Attorney's Office, Miss Palfrey warned of repercussions if prosecutors did not drop her case.

"I cannot emphasize to you the terrible and quite unnecessary ramifications this [civil and/or criminal] case will set off, if permitted to advance for both sides," Miss Palfrey wrote.

The indictment filed yesterday charges that Miss Palfrey placed ads seeking escorts in the Washington City Paper and the University of Maryland's Diamondback student newspaper.

Authorities said Miss Palfrey hired women who were at least 22 years old and required that they mail her an application and photo before being employed.

The women also underwent a screening process in which they were required to engage in sexual activity without being paid to ensure that they were not law-enforcement officers, authorities said.

The prostitutes worked about three nights a week, charging as much as $300, authorities said. Half the money went to Miss Palfrey, who used the funds to pay for her mortgage, car lease and stocks, prosecutors said.

In civil proceedings, Miss Palfrey has denied any wrongdoing.

Mr. Sibley, in court records filed last month, said trying the case would require testimony and documents pertaining to 100 escorts and hundreds of customers.

2 Consecutive Life Sentences In Murder Of Racing Icon, Wife (LAT)

By Charles Proctor, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

A Pasadena judge today sentenced Michael Goodwin, convicted in January of murdering racing legend Mickey Thompson and his wife, to two consecutive terms of life in prison without parole.

Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Teri Schwartz earlier rejected defense motions for a retrial and to dismiss the charges. Deputy Public Defender Elena M. Saris said she would appeal.

Goodwin, 62, called Thompson's death a tragedy, but insisted on his innocence. FOR THE RECORD:

Goodwin: In an earlier version, Michael Goodwin's age was given as 61. He is 62. —

"I can't apologize because I'm not guilty," he said before the sentence was read.

Collene Campbell called her brother Mickey "a true man, an icon, and he is missed beyond what any words could describe."

She then began crying as she read from a statement in the courtroom during the sentencing. "I have received calls from around the world from those distressed and impacted by the murders," she said.

The Thompsons' killings became a legendary Southern California mystery, the subject of nearly two decades of police investigation and several national television shows.

Thompson and his wife, Trudy, were gunned down in the driveway of their eastern Los Angeles County home on March 16, 1988 by a pair of hooded assailants, who then escaped on bicycles. Prosecutors said the gunmen shot Thompson repeatedly but kept him alive to watch his wife's murder before they shot him in the head. The gunmen were never identified.

Prosecutors always considered Goodwin, a former business partner of Thompson, the prime suspect in plotting the killings, even though no evidence linked him to the scene.

They alleged that the circumstances -- the killers didn't touch the $4,000 the Thompsons were carrying or the $70,000 worth of jewelry in the house -- showed the murders were motivated by revenge. And they argued that Goodwin was the only person who could want Thompson dead that badly.

Thompson, the first American to reach 400 mph in a piston-driven vehicle and the holder of numerous speed records, joined Goodwin in the mid-1980s to promote motor sports in Southern California.

Their relationship soon deteriorated. Thompson won a $514,000 judgment against Goodwin that was pending at the time of the killings. Goodwin declared personal and business bankruptcy as a result of the judgment, which was never paid.

Prosecutors in Orange County — the location of much of the dispute between Thompson and Goodwin — charged Goodwin with the slayings five years ago. But an appeals court threw out the charges in June 2004, citing a lack of evidence that Goodwin had planned the crime there.

Within days of the appeals court decision, Los Angeles prosecutors filed murder charges against Goodwin.

Witnesses testified that they had heard Goodwin threaten Thompson's life, and one key witness said he saw Goodwin scout out the Thompsons' neighborhood in the gated community of Bradbury.

The defense countered that the passage of time and the "Hollywood" treatment of the case in the media called the veracity of witness testimony into doubt.

charles.proctor@latimes.com

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Local Officials Have Not Heard From FBI About Civil Rights Cases (MONNST)

Monroe News-Star, March 2, 2007

Local and area law enforcement officials said today they have not been contacted by the FBI regarding investigating cold civil rights cases in the area.

FBI Director Robert Mueller said at a news conference Tuesday that the agency is investigating about a dozen cold civil rights cases in an effort to seek justice for victims of racially motivated killings.

FBI officials declined to identify the cases they are working to reopen. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said making that information public could hinder the investigations.

He also said the FBI will help local law enforcement authorities prosecute cases in which federal charges aren't applicable.

Mueller said the FBI and local authorities have made 10 to 12 cases a priority, but as many as 100 could be investigated.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center are assisting the effort.

The center has a list of 127 race-related killings between 1954 and 1968 — a number it concedes could be much higher.

Area cases on the center's list are:

? Frank Morris, Ferriday. In 1964

Morris, who owned a shoe store, was killed when a gas stove exploded during an arson. Morris, who lived in a room adjoining the store, was ordered to return to his room by the men who started the fire. An extensive Justice Department investigation was conducted, but the outcome is unclear.

? Albert Pitts, David Pitts, Marshall Johnson and Ernest McPharland, Monroe. In 1960 a white employer was arrested and then released in the shooting of five of his employees. Four of them died. The victims were accused of making threats. The employer was never charged.

? Robert Wilder, Ruston. In 1965

a white policeman was accused of Wilder's death, and a coroner's jury ruled the slaying was justifiable homicide.

In Concordia Parish, Kathleen Stevens, public information officer for Sheriff Randy Maxwell, said she was not aware of any contact about the Ferriday case from federal investigators.

Stevens, like Ouachita Parish investigations Maj. Royce Toney, said the only people who have inquired about the cases were reporters, who asked about contact or requests from federal investigators.

Lt. Curtis Hawkins with Ruston Police could not be reached.

Since 1989, authorities in seven states have re-examined 29 killings from the civil rights era, leading to 28 arrests and 22 convictions.

In one recent prosecution, 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klan member James Seale, has pleaded not guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy to commit kidnapping in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction, beating and drowning deaths of two black teens — Henry Dee and Charles Moore — in Mississippi.

Justice Department officials also were helping state officials in Mississippi reopen the Emmett Till case. Till, 14, of Chicago, was killed in 1955 after he reportedly wolf-whistled at a white woman. But a court official in Leflore County, Miss., confirmed Monday that a grand jury has decided not to indict anyone in Till's killing.

However, federal prosecutors have won convictions in other high-profile civil rights cases. They sent former Klansman Edgar Ray Killen to jail for 60 years for his role in the killing of three civil rights workers in Mississippi in 1964.

DOJ_NMG_0139001

Congress has tried for several years to establish a “cold case” unit for civil rights crimes in the Justice Department. Bills sponsored by Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., and Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., would authorize $11.5 million a year to create such a unit.

Gonzales said he would welcome any help from Congress, but he denied the congressional push to reopen investigations into old civil rights crimes prodded the Justice Department to act.

EDITORIAL: Focusing On Cold Cases (NOTP)

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 2, 2007

Washington Parish Sheriff's Deputy Oneal Moore was murdered 42 years ago, but the FBI says that it hasn't given up on the case, one of about a dozen unsolved civil-rights era murders that are getting renewed attention from the agency.

When these crimes took place decades ago, African-American victims had little hope of getting justice. Now, investigators will have to deal with the damage time itself has done to the cases.

But that's all the more reason to act quickly, and the FBI's decision to aggressively pursue cold cases that they believe were racially motivated is encouraging.

Deputy Moore and his partner, Creed Rogers, were the first African-American deputies to work for the Washington Parish Sheriff's Office. They were hired to help quell racial tension in Washington Parish, but they ended up being victims of racial violence when they were ambused on Louisiana 21 by a group of white men and shot. Deputy Moore was killed; his partner lost an eye.

The murder led to further violence. A year later, Clarence Triggs, another African-American man, was shot to death after attending a demontration to protest the lack of progress in the Moore case.

Jim Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans office, says the Moore case, while difficult, has never been closed. In 1990, authorities dug up a slab in hopes of finding the murder weapon and convened a grand jury. Two years later, the FBI told the deputy's widow that it had new information and offered a $40,000 reward.

Now, Special Agent Bernazzani says that the FBI has some "very hot leads" in the case, and that sounds promising.

There have been some notable successes in pursuing old civil rights cases, including the 1994 conviction of Byron de la Beckwith for the murder of civil-rights leader Medgar Evers. In Mississippi, authorities recently arrested James Ford Seale in connection with the 1964 abduction and murder of Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee. Mr. Seale will be tried on charges of kidnapping and conspiracy next month.

It remains to be seen whether this new push will bring justice for the slain Washington Parish deputy or closure for his family. But these cases must not be forgotten, and it's only right that the FBI and the Justice Department make every effort to see them solved.

Bending Toward Justice, Finally (BN)

The Birmingham News (AL), March 2, 2007

THE ISSUE: A new cold case initiative may help solve suspicious death cases from the civil rights era.

If justice delayed is justice denied, what is justice ignored? A national disgrace.

Too many times, civil rights-era murderers got away with their crimes. Too many times, law enforcement officials covered up cases, failed to investigate them fully and even wrongly classified some murders as accidental deaths. Too many times, there was no justice for the loved ones of victims, just grief and anger.

Fortunately, the U.S. Justice Department has decided to reopen investigations into nearly 100 suspicious death cases from across the South during the civil rights era to see if they were racially motivated murders that can be solved and prosecuted.

The FBI and Justice Department on Tuesday announced partnerships with the NAACP, Southern Poverty Law Center and National Urban League, which have referred the cases to the federal agencies. Eight of the 76 cases SPLC referred to law enforcement were unsolved cases from Alabama. Ten to 12 of the nearly 100 cases are under active investigation with new developments, according to FBI Director Robert Mueller.

The Civil Rights Cold Case Initiative was inspired, at least in part, by the successful prosecutions of Thomas Blanton in 2001 and Bobby Frank Cherry in 2002 for the 1963 murders of four girls in the heinous Sixteenth Street Baptist Church bombing in Birmingham. Mueller on Tuesday mentioned those and other recent, successful prosecutions of old cases, such as the 2005 conviction of Edgar Ray Killen for his role in the 1964 murders of three civil rights workers in Philadelphia, Miss.

"These successes have restored our hope and renewed our resolve," Mueller said. "Justice has been delayed, but we are determined justice will not be denied."

In many of these cases, that may prove easier said than done. Perpetrators and witnesses alike may no longer be alive. Memories may have faded and evidence could be lost. In some cases, there may be no federal jurisdiction. And guilty consciences don't necessarily compel people to tell what they know, as Birmingham lawyer Doug Jones, who prosecuted Blanton and Cherry, found out.

"If there was ever a case for people to step forward to do some reconciliation or right a wrong, it was one when four innocent girls were killed in a bomb in a church," Jones told News staff writer Mary Orndorff. "And guess what? We didn't have anybody like that."

Still, looking to uncover "a few burning embers" in cold cases, as SPLC President Richard Cohen put it, is the moral and right thing to do.

If cases can be prosecuted and convictions won, it will bring a measure of justice where there has been none. Grieving families and friends of the victims who have carried deep emotional wounds for decades, knowing that killers had gotten away with their crimes - and sometimes knowing who those killers are - may find some small relief.

The Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. famously said, "Let us realize the arc of the moral universe is long, but it bends toward justice."

Recent convictions of civil rights-era crimes have bent that long arc toward justice. Tuesday's announcement bent it just a tiny bit more.

Navy Chaplain Is Discharged (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, a Navy chaplain, has lost a three-year battle to stay in the chaplain corps after superiors warned him about delivering sectarian Christian prayers and sermons at a sailor's memorial service and other events attended by religiously diverse audiences. Lieutenant Klingenschmitt, who spent 16 years in the military, became a hero to religious conservatives, but was court-martialed last year for wearing his uniform at a political protest in front of the White House. He received an honorable discharge.

Bush Administration's Quiet Campaign Against Religious Bias (TENN)

By CHARLES C. HAYNES, Columnist

Nashville Tennessean, March 2, 2007

Here's one of the best-kept secrets about the Bush presidency: Over the past five years, the U.S. Justice Department has quietly, but vigorously, enforced civil rights laws designed to protect religious freedom.

Now Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wants to get the word out. On Feb. 20, he announced an initiative called the First Freedom Project to carry out "even greater enforcement of religious rights for all Americans."

Since presidents aren't shy about their accomplishments, I'm not sure why we haven't heard more about this before. Maybe we're so busy shouting past one another about church-state conflicts that we overlook threats to free exercise of religion.

Lest we forget, there are two religious-liberty provisions in the First Amendment: no establishment and free exercise. Establishment-clause battles over "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance or the Ten Commandments in the courthouse grab the headlines. But free-exercise problems — discrimination against religious practice and expression in the workplace, schools, land use and elsewhere — have a real impact on the lives of millions of Americans.

The new report documents the Bush administration's efforts to take religious discrimination seriously. After establishing the first-ever Special Counsel for Religious Discrimination early in the administration, the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division dramatically increased enforcement of federal statutes protecting religious rights.

In education, for example, the department reviewed 82 cases and conducted 40 investigations 2001-06. Compare this with the 1995-2000 time period, when the department reviewed one case and made no investigations.

Investigations involving religious discrimination in employment went up from 16 in 1995-2000 to 31 cases 2001-06. Similar increases occurred in housing and public accommodation.

Administration critics aren't impressed. "Expecting the Bush administration to defend religious liberty," says Barry Lynn of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, "is a little like asking Colonel Sanders to baby-sit your pet chicken."

Interfaith Alliance President Welton Gaddy calls the Justice Department project "a scam that weakens religious freedom for all Americans."

Lynn and Gaddy are veterans of church-state battles with the Bush administration over everything from faith-based initiatives to school vouchers. They argue that the current Justice position on establishment-clause issues undermines religious liberty. But the debate over "no establishment," as important as it is, shouldn't keep us from finding some common ground on the need for "free exercise" protections.

DOJ_NMG_0139003

As Judge Judy would say, these are real cases about real people. From attacks on houses of worship to incidents of discrimination at school and work, the Justice Department over the past five years has investigated scores of cases involving religious rights of Christians, Jews, Muslims, Sikhs, Native Americans and others.

However much we disagree about the relationship between religion and government, surely we can agree that freedom of religion should mean freedom from religious discrimination.

ANTITRUST:

EU Threatens Microsoft With New Fines (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

BRUSSELS -- New European Union charges against Microsoft Corp. that threaten the company with as much as $1 billion in fines highlight an increasingly fierce industry battle over how to sell business software.

European regulators launched formal charges yesterday against Microsoft -- for the third time in three years -- accusing the tech giant of trying to overcharge competitors for information to make their products work well with Microsoft's ubiquitous Windows operating system.

The charges stem from a 2004 EU decision that Microsoft abused its near-monopoly position as the producer of Windows. Microsoft has already racked up close to $1 billion in fines in the case.

The EU's latest move goes to the heart of a growing battle between Microsoft's traditional fee-based software business and challenges from International Business Machines Corp., Red Hat Inc. and Oracle Corp., which offer free or nominally priced "open source" software.

Microsoft's competitors say they believe the company has structured its proposed charges for the programming information in such a way as to undermine their business models.

The March 2004 EU decision requires Microsoft to offer licenses for the programming information on "reasonable and non-discriminatory terms" to software rivals who need it. No companies have licensed the information yet.

The 2004 decision ordered Microsoft to help rivals write software linking back-office server computers with employees' Windows-driven desktop computers for a narrow range of functions, including the accessing and printing of documents and logging onto password-protected company systems.

"The current view is that there is no significant innovation" in the programming information to warrant the price Microsoft is charging, EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement yesterday.

But Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said in an interview he was surprised by the aggressive new charges. "I feel we need a more constructive approach to address very complicated and technical issues in a way that is going to make progress," he said.

Microsoft has appealed the original 2004 decision against it, and a decision from a European court in Luxembourg is expected this year.

The background to the current dispute is an effort by IBM, Red Hat, Oracle, Sun Microsystems Inc. and other companies to best Microsoft in the lucrative market for business software. The rivals' strategy is to hawk open-source software to companies, at little or no price.

Any programmer is free to alter these open computer programs as he likes or make improvements available to others via online downloads -- hence the term open source. The Microsoft rivals then make money by selling service contracts to companies to maintain and upgrade their software.

Microsoft's software, by contrast, is protected by fee-based licenses that don't allow alteration or sharing of its computer code.

Microsoft proposed a complex system requiring its rivals to pay "per-unit royalties," or a fee every time the competitors' customers use software that incorporates parts of the disputed Microsoft programming information.

Although the EU case only concerns a relatively small part of the overall business market, critics say this pricing system is part of a strategy to stymie open-source-software providers.

"It would be fundamentally inconsistent with their business model," which doesn't track the number of end users of its products or how they use the products, said Thomas Vinje, a lawyer for an industry group including IBM, Oracle, Red Hat and Sun Microsystems.

DOJ_NMG_0139004

Mr. Smith of Microsoft said the disputed programming information is covered by 36 technology patents and that an additional 37 patents are pending. "It's hard to see how the commission can argue that even patented information must be made available for free," he said.

Mr. Vinje countered that many software patents are granted incorrectly and are often reversed upon challenge.

The EU has fined Microsoft twice. In 2004, regulators ordered the company to pay more than $600 million after finding Microsoft had exploited its near-monopoly in operating systems for personal computers to muscle aside competitors.

In July, regulators hit Microsoft with a further €280.5 million fine ($371.2 million) for failing to compile the disputed programming information in a usable manner. Microsoft later fixed that problem.

The "statement of objections" sent to Microsoft yesterday is a formal charge outlining how regulators believe the company hasn't complied with EU orders. Microsoft has four months to answer the charges and can also request a closed-door oral hearing.

After weighing Microsoft's defense, Ms. Kroes will decide whether to level the fine and, if so, the amount of the penalty. Microsoft can then appeal the fine to the European court in Luxembourg.

Brussels Threatens Microsoft With Further Antitrust Fines (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Microsoft was yesterday dealt a serious setback in its long-running antitrust battle with the European Commission, when Brussels threatened to impose yet another massive fine on the US software group for failing to comply with a landmark competition ruling handed down almost three years ago.

Europe's top antitrust regulator yesterday issued a new set of charges against Microsoft, a step that is likely to result in another ruling and a new fine against the group. Since the Commission opened its probe against the world's largest software maker more than eight years ago, Microsoft has been fined close to €780m (£526m) for abusing its dominant market position and failing to respect the regulator's ruling.

The Commission refused to comment on the size of any new fine that could arise from yesterday's charges. However, Brussels could - in the worst-case scenario for Microsoft - hit the group with a penalty in excess of €800m.

The Commission accused Microsoft of demanding excessive royalties from companies wishing to license technical information about its Windows operating system. The order to make such information available to rivals formed a key plank of the Commission's March 2004 ruling against the group.

The Commission stressed that Microsoft was the first group to be accused of ignoring a European Union antitrust ruling. "This is a company which apparently does not like to have to conform with antitrust decisions," said the spokesman for Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner.

Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, rejected the Commission's allegations. He said Microsoft's proposed pricing scheme would be 30 per cent cheaper than comparable licensing fees.

Under the terms of the 2004 ruling, Microsoft has to make available "interoperability" information to other software makers so that rivals can design server software that functions smoothly with Windows-driven computers and servers.

The Commission said yesterday it had found "no significant innovation in the interoperability information".

It also claimed that companies were being asked to give Microsoft 35 per cent of the net operating profits they made by selling products designed with the help of the licence.

The original 2004 ruling is under appeal in front of an EU court, which is expected to issue its ruling in the next six months.

EU Threatens New Fines Against Microsoft For Not Abiding By Antitrust Ruling (AP)

By Raf Casert, Associated Press

AP, March 2, 2007

BRUSSELS, Belgium -- The European Union threatened Microsoft Corp. on Thursday with fines as high as $4 million a day, claiming the software company was still not offering a fair deal to rivals seeking to make their products more compatible with Windows.

Microsoft said the EU Commission's demands were not reasonable. "We believe we have been fair in setting" prices for the information, said Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith.

"It is hard to see how the Commission can argue that even patented innovation must be made available for free," he said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0139005

The EU complained that three years after a landmark antitrust ruling to open up the market, the world's largest software maker still refused to cooperate. "This is a company which apparently does not like to have to conform with antitrust decisions," said EU Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd.

Under a 2004 antitrust ruling by the European Union, Microsoft had to disclose complete and accurate interface documentation on reasonable and nondiscriminatory terms, allowing its competitors to interoperate with Windows PCs and servers.

Under a so-called "statement of objections" released Thursday, the EU's executive Commission said there was "no significant innovation" in the requested information. It also rejected 1,500 pages of submissions by Microsoft over the past three months and said Microsoft's price proposals were unreasonable.

"I am therefore again obliged to take formal measures to ensure that Microsoft complies with its obligations," EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement.

Smith complained Microsoft had asked for feedback half a year ago and only on Thursday received a reply thinly veiled in a threat.

"We're disappointed that this feedback is coming six months later and in its present form, but were committed to working hard to address the Commissions Statement of Objections," said Smith.

He added "the findings appear to be an attempt to regulate the pricing of our intellectual property rights on a global basis" something which would go beyond the jurisdiction of the European Commission.

Microsoft has four weeks to reply to the Commission after which the EU could impose fines going as high as 3 million euros ($4 million) a day, Todd said.

Work group servers are designed to let numerous users share and exchange information on projects so that groups of workers located near or far from their offices can collaborate on joint projects.

"The royalty demands are intended to force every competitor out of the market," said Simon Awde, the chairman of the European Committee for Interoperable Systems, a group of Microsoft rivals.

At a hearing last year, EU regulators used evidence from IBM Corp., Novell Inc., Oracle Corp. and Sun Microsystems Inc. on systems compatibility. None of those companies are currently involved in the legal battle, although they are members of two broad industry coalitions -- ECIS and the Software & Information Industry Association -- that back the Commission.

Microsoft is challenging the EU's original 2004 antitrust order at the EU's Court of First Instance. The 2004 antitrust order found the company broke competition law for abuse of a dominant position and fined the software maker a record euro497 million (US$613 million).

"It is the first time we have been confronted by a company which has failed to comply with an antitrust decision," said Todd. "We are in unknown territory."

"We don't want to be in a situation where ten years after an antitrust decision, they still are not in compliance," said Todd, adding the "vast majority of the information" provided to the software competitors, was "not innovative."

To remedy Microsoft's antitrust abuse, the EU ordered the company to sell a copy of Windows without its media player software and told it to share communications code and information with rivals to help them develop server software that worked smoothly with Microsoft's ubiquitous Windows desktop operating system.

EU regulators fined Microsoft another 280.5 million euros ($371 million) last July for failing to supply the "complete and accurate" interoperability required.

Brussels Needs More Time To Rule On Sony BMG (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The music industry faces a prolonged period of regulatory uncertainty after the European Union's top antitrust regulator said yesterday it needed another four months to scrutinise the merger that created Sony BMG.

The European Commission waved through the original tie-up in 2004, arguing that the merger would not undermine competition in the market. However, its ruling was challenged and - in a rare move that shocked the music industry - a top European court decided last year to overturn the Commission's clearance decision.

For Sony BMG, the ruling meant it had to resubmit the merger to the Brussels watchdog for approval and a fresh investigation.

The Commission said it had completed an initial one-month assessment of the Sony BMG merger, but now needed more time to examine whether the deal "strengthens or creates a dominant position in these relatively concentrated markets". Brussels added it would take into consideration factors such as "the growing sales of online music" .

DOJ_NMG_0139006

But the Commission said it would also examine whether the merger had created a "collective dominant position", which means a situation in which a small number of big companies can effectively control a market and keep smaller companies from challenging their power.

The Commission said it had until July 2 to make a final decision on the merger. Brussels can either block the deal, wave it through in return for concessions such as asset disposals or approve the deal without conditions - which it did in 2004. Should the regulator block the tie-up, Sony BMG would have to break apart.

Icahn's Move On Motorola Lifts Stock (FT)

By Paul Taylor In New York

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Shares in Motorola rose in early trading yesterday after the world's second largest mobile phone maker revealed that Carl Icahn, the billionaire Wall Street raider, was seeking to lift his stake in the company to about 6 per cent by acquiring another $2bn in stock.

If completed, the proposed stock purchase would lift the stake in Motorola acquired last month by Mr Icahn from 1.6 per cent, and turn him into the company's second biggest investor behind Barclays Global Investors. Barclays had a 6.82 per cent stake in Motorola at the end of December.

Mr Icahn's demand that Motorola use the bulk of its $11.6bn in cash to accelerate share buy-backs has helped prop up its share price in the wake of a series of setbacks.

The company reported weak financial resultsearlier this year reflecting a fierce mobile phone price war and a lack of blockbuster products.

Profit margins in Motorola's core phone division shrank to 4.4 per cent in the fourth quarter from almost 12 per cent in the preceding three months as the company slashed prices in order to retain market share and remain competitive with Finland's Nokia, the world's largest mobile phone maker.

Late on Wednesday, Motorola said Mr Icahn and Icahn Partners had each filed for approval to buy between $119.7m and $500m in Motorola stock. In addition, Motorola said it had received a notice under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust act that two other Icahn entities had also each filed to buy more than $500m worth of shares. If all four entities each buy $500m of stock, it would lift the Icahn stake to about 6 per cent.

*Nortel Networks, the Canadian telecommunications equipment maker, surprised investors yesterday with yet another restatement of earnings, but said its fourth-quarter results would not be affected by the move. Nortel has struggled to shore up its profitability and investor confidence following restatements related to accounting problems.

China Builds Commerce Codes (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

BEIJING -- China's leadership is stepping up its efforts to build a legal system that can handle the demands of a complex, market-driven economy, as managing the fast-growing nation becomes increasingly challenging.

That program will take the spotlight when China's legislature opens its annual session on Monday. The National People's Congress is scheduled to consider, and most likely pass, two crucial pieces of economic legislation. One would give private property new protections of unprecedented force and detail for China; another would require foreign and domestic companies to pay the same rate of tax.

The property-rights law will be a symbolic milestone for the still nominally Communist nation, even though it falls far short of what more liberal reformers had initially advocated. For foreign businesses, the tax law will put them on a more-equal footing with local competitors, as it gradually brings an end to most of the special breaks offered in the past. Several other important laws will also be discussed at the meeting for passage later this year, including the country's first antitrust legislation and a measure that would give workers more say in contracts with their employers.

All of these are the building blocks of the legal infrastructure that underpins the daily functioning of a market economy, although the country's legal code is still in its infancy and legal redress can be difficult to come by. Many of these laws have been in the works for years, and have provoked sometimes heated debate. They are coming to fruition this year as a consensus grows that the new legislation can fill some gaping holes and rectify obvious inequities in the current system.

"China is, step by step, going down the road of the market economy," said Sheng Jiemin, an expert on antitrust legislation at Peking University. "The government had to revise many laws after China joined the World Trade Organization. And other necessary measures are being regularly issued."

DOJ_NMG_0139007

The annual meeting of the National People's Congress, when nearly 3,000 delegates gather in Beijing, is one of the few occasions when China's leaders discuss their policies in public. Given the turmoil in China's stock markets this week, as fears spread that a government crackdown on speculation was imminent, this year's meeting is likely to be particularly closely watched for signals on financial policy, as well as progress in lawmaking.

China's economy has been changing much faster than the legal system that is supposed to govern it. Huge numbers of Chinese now own their own homes and run their own businesses, but it is difficult to settle precisely who owns what and what they are allowed to do with it.

Private-property rights, in the abstract, have been recognized in China's constitution through a series of amendments, the earliest in 1988. But those vague principles are of little help in handling specific cases, such as the government's frequent confiscation of land for development. That is a big reason for passing the property-rights law, which details the scope of different types of rights and sets rules for how to change or transfer them.

"The property-rights law tells you what is yours and what is his, and how it can be obtained or transferred. Without that, it's impossible to solve property disputes," said Mei Xiaying, a professor at the University of International Business and Economics in Beijing. Businesses in particular will welcome the clarification of property rights, which should make it easier to buy and sell major assets such as land, he said.

The legal overhauls have been controversial: The proposed property-rights law, in particular, attracted vocal opposition from leftist scholars who worry that it will pave the way for the accelerated privatization of state companies and widen the gap between the wealthy and the poor.

The draft antimonopoly law, under discussion for more than a decade, has also been held hostage by disputes among policymakers. Some want to use it to break open still-closed parts of the economy, while others see giving the government new antitrust powers as a way to strengthen its control over businesses -- particularly powerful foreign companies that have dominant market share in China.

Though its laws aren't subject to popular vote, the Chinese government does usually try to build a consensus among its officials before pushing through a major policy change. The property-rights law had been scheduled for passage at last year's meeting before a critical backlash took it off the agenda, and even the less-sensitive tax overhaul has been held up for years. Changes were made to the draft laws last year to address the criticisms.

With those laws having now been declared ready for passage, 2007 is shaping up to be a landmark year for legislation governing the economy -- after several technical measures, including China's first code for corporate bankruptcies, were passed in 2006. As all these new laws fall into place, scholars say, China's commercial code is finally getting close to completion.

The new measures will reinforce China's shift toward relying on law and legal processes, rather than government dictates alone, to manage the economy -- an ideal that has been endorsed by the highest levels of the leadership.

In a major speech late last year, the Communist Party's top law-and-order official, Luo Gan, said the government needs to "get better at using legal methods to harmonize economic relationships." If the legal system can help citizens settle their problems with employers, schools, and hospitals, he said, that promises to "fundamentally reduce social conflicts triggered by the conflict of interests."

Mr. Luo also appeared to recognize the importance of fairness in encouraging companies and individuals to turn to the legal system to resolve their disputes, saying it should "protect equally the legal interests of all types of market participants, [and] eliminate the appearance of bias in law enforcement." In practice, court decisions are heavily influenced by the government, and it is often difficult for individuals to use the legal system to counter official government actions.

All that doesn't mean Mr. Luo and other leaders endorse the idea of an independent judiciary. Party leaders say their goal is to "rule the country according to law." The idea is for the Communist Party's to exercise its power through the legal system, not just arbitrary commands, but it doesn't mean the party's authority is itself subject to the judgment of the law.

Legal Makeover To Underpin China's Market-Driven Economy (WSJ)

By Michael Connolly

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

With China's economy changing much faster than the legal system that is supposed to govern it, Beijing is moving quickly to create a system that can handle the demands of a complex, market-driven economy just as events like this week's Chinese market turmoil underscore how challenging managing the fast-growing nation has become.

The annual session of China's legislature, the National People's Congress, which begins Monday, is to consider and likely approve two significant pieces of economic legislation, one giving private property new protections of unprecedented force and detail for China, the other requiring foreign and domestic companies to pay the same rate of tax. Several other important laws will also be discussed for passage later this year, including the country's first antitrust legislation and a measure that would give workers more say in contracts with their employers.

DOJ_NMG_0139008

Though vast numbers of Chinese now own their own homes and run their own businesses, it is difficult to settle precisely who owns what and what they are allowed to do with it, as Andrew Batson reports. Private-property rights, in the abstract, have been recognized in China's constitution through a series of amendments, beginning in 1988. But those vague principles are of little help in handling specific cases, such as the government's frequent confiscation of land for development. Nonetheless, the proposed law has attracted vocal opposition from leftist scholars concerned it will pave the way for the accelerated privatization of state companies and widen the gap between the wealthy and the poor.

The draft antimonopoly law, under discussion for more than a decade, has also been held hostage by disputes among policymakers. Some want to use it to break open still-closed parts of the economy, while others see giving the government new antitrust powers as a way to strengthen its control over businesses -- particularly powerful foreign companies that have dominant market share in China.

Read Andrew Batson's report from Beijing:

http://online.wsj.com/article/0,,SB117278021348123785,00.html1 * * *

DETENTE WITH KIM: Increasing diplomatic softening between the Washington and Pyongyang could lead to more stability in East Asia and bring North Korea out of its economic isolation. After having long taken a hard line on North Korea, the Bush administration has begun to backpedal on the major dispute for the past five years -- that Pyongyang violated the spirit of a 1994 disarmament deal with the U.S. by secretly developing nuclear weapons with highly enriched uranium. The pact explicitly covered only weapons using plutonium, a more common material for nuclear devices.

In testimony to congressional committees during the week, diplomatic and intelligence officials have expressed doubt about the amount of progress North Korea made in researching or developing uranium-based weapons. The U.S. national intelligence director's mission manager for North Korea, Joseph DeTrani, said the U.S. categorized its belief in North Korea's uranium-production program "at the midconfidence level," meaning it lacked corroboration. That was a step down from the previous categorization of "high confidence."

As Evan Ramstad reports, the move represents a big change in U.S. policy, and creates a smoother atmosphere for further discussions with North Korea on the uranium issue. It also lowers expectations in case international inspectors enter North Korea and find no facilities for uranium-based weapons. Bet that Pyongyang's President Kim Jong Il is beaming.

Read Evan Ramstad's report from Seoul:

http://online.wsj.com/article/0,,SB117274838424023298,00.html2 * * *

MORTGAGE IMPACTS: As falling home values can deprive homeowners of equity used to finance new vehicle purchases and increase loan defaults, the toll in the U.S. subprime mortgage market may explain General Motors Corp.'s decision Thursday to delay filing its 2006 annual report.

While in the midst of a massive restructuring of its North American operations, GM continues to wrap up issues related to past accounting problems. Meantime, GMAC Financial Services -- in which GM sold a majority stake during the fourth quarter to a consortium of investors led by Cerberus Capital Management -- continues to work on finishing its financial statements for the fourth quarter and all of 2006. The auto maker still owns 49% of the lending unit and relies on its health because GMAC backs GM's major incentive programs by offering attractive leasing and financing terms. GM and Cerberus are still negotiating the book value of GMAC following the completion of the sale.

Nonetheless, GM surprised Wall Street by reporting a 3.7% increase in monthly light-vehicle sales to 308,411 vehicles for February as sales to retail custoimers surged. Analysts had expected its sales would be flat or decline. Ford Motor Co.'s February sales, meanwhile, fell nearly 14%. But Toyota Motor Corp. posted a 12% jump in U.S. auto sales.

Read our report:

http://online.wsj.com/article/0,,SB117267190348622030,00.html3 * * *

CORPORATE TRANSFORMATIONS: While personal-computer titan Dell Inc., which re-installed founder Michael Dell as chief executive in January, posted depressed fiscal fourth-quarter results and said a "transformation" is under way, Berkshire Hathaway Inc. posted a decline in quarterly net and said its 76-year-old chairman, Warren Buffett, is on the hunt for someone to take over his investment duties when he dies. Mr. Buffett didn't disclose what he would pay, and, while he is taking resumes, isn't planning on leaving soon. "At 76, I feel terrific and, according to all measurable indictors, am in excellent health," he said. "It's amazing what Cherry Coke and hamburgers will do for a fellow."

Read our report on Dell:

http://online.wsj.com/article/0,,SB117277529689223648,00.html4

Read our report on Berkshire Hathaway:

http://online.wsj.com/article/0,,SB117278144646923805,00.html5

DOJ_NMG_0139009

Political Energies (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

As corporate dramas go, few can match the long-running Endesa takeover story. But the latest plot twist, in which Italian utility Enel entered the scene, may have the Spanish electricity giant's shareholders feeling like they're watching a farce. As usual when it comes to Europe and energy, politicians appear to be the ones making a mockery of the market.

A new chapter began Tuesday, when Enel bought a 9.9% stake in Endesa -- just three weeks before Endesa's shareholders were to consider bylaw changes that would allow Germany's E.On to move forward with a €41 billion purchase of the company. Yesterday Enel made arrangements to boost its holding to 17% -- Spanish law requires a regulatory review before an investor can buy more than 10% of a utility -- and said it would ask permission to keep buying up shares until it had nearly one-fourth of the company, at which point it would have to bid for the entire firm.

E.On's bid, which just last week seemed like a reasonably safe bet, is now in real danger. Spanish conglomerate Acciona owns 21% of Endesa and has indicated it won't sell to the German utility. Spain's public holding company owns 3%, so if Enel refuses to sell to E.On -- so far the Italians are being coy on that question -- the German company would have to win over almost all of the other shareholders to take control of Endesa. Even then, the large minorities might prove to be a thorn in E.On's side.

This saga might have been all to the good for Endesa shareholders -- competing bids can't be bad, right? -- if this were a true competition. But that's not the case. As it stands, smaller shareholders probably won't get the chance to weigh E.On's offer. Investors who bought Endesa stock over the past year and a half, during which time the share price has doubled, may still have a chance to recoup handsome rewards -- if there are any takers still out there.

So why did Enel jump into the fray? There's plenty of reason to believe that the motivation was in part political. After failing to marry Endesa with Barcelona-based Gas Natural, Spanish Prime Minister José Luis Rodíguez Zapatero has been laboring for months to keep the company out of E.On's hands.

Last week, Mr. Zapatero had a summit with his Italian counterpart, Romano Prodi. Both governments insist the two leaders didn't discuss Endesa, only "reciprocal investments." So perhaps it's truly a coincidence that a few days later Enel, which is more than 30% state-owned, made its move for Endesa.

If, however, government meddling did occur, it is the last thing Europe needs in a sector that's already highly politicized. Rising oil prices, Russia's natural-gas games the past two Januarys and what the French call patriotisme économique have frustrated EU attempts to open the energy industry.

There are of course business reasons for Enel to buy into Endesa. Like E.On, Enel has been sitting on a pile of cash reserves and has few options for making acquisitions. Paris caught wind of a possible Enel-Suez deal last year and forced the latter into a tie-up with Gaz de France instead -- to the ire of the Italian government. Endesa is the only big fish available in Western Europe, and it's available only because the European Commission has spent the past year badgering Madrid for its protectionism. Yet the payoff for buying only a minority stake isn't clear.

Brussels deserves credit for its persistence in the Endesa case, even if Enel may negate much of that good work. Still, the difficulty it's had in enforcing cross-border competition here shows that the balance of power still lies in national capitals. Recognizing this, EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes is threatening to break up energy companies into suppliers and distributors in order to boost energy-sector competition.

We think it's too early for such a drastic and largely irreversible step. But Madrid, Rome and Paris aren't doing themselves, their utilities or their citizens any favors by indulging in these power plays.

XM-Sirius Merger Provides Little Airtime For Antitrust Issues (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, March 2, 2007

The brand-new House Committee Antitrust Task Force took up the proposed merger between the nation's two satellite radio companies Wednesday, discussing technology, economics and personalities. Antitrust law, which will weigh big in the deal's ability to win government approval, received very little airtime.

Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.'s CEO Mel Karmazin was the headliner at the standing-room-only event as he pitched his company's merger with rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. He did his best to express his willingness to work with regulators and Congress to get the deal approved. But if the deal is ultimately rejected, he said, both XM and Sirius would be able to go on as separate and viable businesses.

But David Rehr, president and CEO of the National Association of Broadcasters, repeatedly told the room that the merger would be a "government-sanctioned monopoly," and that allowing the combination "portends great potential harm to the American public and to the many benefits of free local radio broadcasting."

DOJ_NMG_0139010

Representatives invited one antitrust lawyer not involved with the deal to shed light on how the Department of Justice would examine the merger. Charles Biggio, a partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, testified that the DOJ's antitrust division would likely issue a second request for information on the deal in order to adequately tackle the various issues.

"The ultimate question the antitrust division will ask in reviewing the XM-Sirius transaction is whether the transaction will create or enhance market power; that is, whether it will cause prices to go up, output to go down, or quality or technological development to deteriorate in a relevant market affected by the transaction," Biggio said.

The analysis, he continued, would look at advertising, distribution via retail outlets and car manufacturers, content purchases and consumer subscriptions. Only after evaluating the effects in those areas would the staff lawyers at the DOJ consider the benefits of the deal, which have been estimated to be extensive, since the combined company would cut costs by better utilizing its satellite spectrum.

After his prepared testimony, however, lawmakers had virtually no questions for Biggio.

A number of the representatives acknowledged they, or their family members, are current subscribers to one or the other satellite service.

Rick Boucher, D-Va., said that satellite radio companies may compete more with terrestrial radio stations than Rehr was willing to acknowledge, given a report released this week by international media and marketing research firm Arbitron Inc. That report said a survey of satellite radio users indicates that only 3.4 percent of radio listeners use satellite radio. Satellite radio listeners on average listened to far more radio, and actually listened to more terrestrial radio than satellite radio, according to the survey.

Several representatives told the witnesses they were keeping an open mind about the merger and would look forward to further information.

FTC Clears Carlyle's Philosophy Buy (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

Federal Regulators Approve Carlyle Group's Acquisition of Skin Care Company Philosophy

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal antitrust regulators approved Carlyle Group's purchase of cosmetics and skin care company philosophy inc., according to a notice issued by the Federal Trade Commission Thursday.

The FTC cleared the sale without requiring any changes.

Carlyle, a private equity group, announced the purchase Jan. 31, but did not disclose terms of the deal. Philosophy sells through retailers and television shopping channels and was the top beauty brand on QVC in 2006, Carlyle said.

Carlyle also said in announcing the deal that it was its third consumer and retail acquistion in 11 months, after its purchase of Dunkin' Brands in March 2006 and Oriental Trading Co. in July 2006.

FTC Clears Purchase Of Mirant Plants (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

Federal Regulators Approve $1.4B Purchase of Mirant Power Plants by Private Equity Firm

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal antitrust regulators approved the $1.4 billion sale of six power plants by Mirant Corp. to LS Power Equity Partners, according to a notice issued Thursday by the Federal Trade Commission.

The FTC cleared the sale without requiring any changes.

Mirant said when announcing the sale in mid-January that it expects net proceeds of $1.32 billion, after paying off $83 million in debt.

The plants, all in the U.S., produce a total of 3,619 megawatts of power. Mirant is selling its Michigan Zeeland plant, its West Georgia plant, its Shady Hills plant in Florida, its Sugar Creek plant in Indiana, its Bosque plant in Texas and its Las Vegas-based Apex plant.

LS Power Equity is part of private equity firm LS Power Group.

Shares of Mirant rose 72 cents, or almost 2 percent, to $37.91 in late afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

FCC Sides With Cable Phone Firms (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, March 2, 2007

In a move that's expected to bring new discount phone services to millions of rural Americans, the Federal Communications Commission ruled Thursday that local phone companies cannot block cable providers' rival Internet-based phone offerings.

"The commission must promote competition," FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said.

DOJ_NMG_0139011

In an FCC petition last year, Time Warner Cable complained that rural carriers in South Carolina and Nebraska refused to set up connections so users of the company's Voice over Internet Protocol (VoIP) service and rural phone customers can exchange calls. The carriers also would not provide local phone numbers and 911 services.

Time Warner typically leases these services from MCI and Sprint, which, in turn, lease them from the rural phone companies.

The rural carriers claimed a federal law promoting competition doesn't require them to provide the services because MCI and Sprint would not serve residents directly. They also noted VoIP has not been labeled a telecommunications service. State regulators in South Carolina and Nebraska sided with the rural carriers. Similar battles are playing out in other states.

But FCC staff said wholesale providers are entitled to the same network-leasing privileges as retail companies and that VoIP's classification is irrelevant.

Cable companies have lured millions of VoIP customers from local phone giants in major cities but largely have been shut out of less-populated markets, many of which have no land-line phone alternative. "This will enable Time Warner Cable to deploy its digital phone service to areas that have been denied the benefits of competition," the company said in a statement.

VoIP requires a broadband line and sends calls over the Internet.

Analyst Jessica Zufolo of Medley Global Advisors says the ruling should let cable companies "fully penetrate these rural markets."

But Dan Mitchell of the National Telecommunications Cooperative Association, which represents rural companies, says the FCC should have first resolved how much VoIP providers must pay local phone companies to connect calls. They now often pay very little.

"They're imposing costs on our networks and not paying for it," Mitchell said. "From our perspective, that's unfair competition."

FCC Grants Internet Phone Access (WP/BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Rural telephone companies must allow carriers such as Verizon Communications to use local lines to connect Internet-based calls, U.S. regulators said yesterday.

The Federal Communications Commission ruling, in granting a petition filed by Time Warner Cable, "will enhance consumers' choice for phone service by making clear that cable and other [Internet phone] providers must be . . . allowed to put calls through to other phone networks," FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin said in an e-mailed statement.

AT&T and Verizon, the two biggest U.S. phone companies, supported Time Warner Cable's petition.

The FCC order overrides rulings by state regulators in South Carolina and Nebraska that barred certain carriers from connecting calls using voice-over-Internet protocol, or VOIP, to traditional local phone lines. The South Carolina regulators said Verizon had no right to route Internet-based phone calls through lines owned by rural-phone companies as part of a wholesale service it sells to Time Warner Cable, a unit of Time Warner Inc.

The state rulings would have impeded phone competition, the commission said in its decision. They also would have hindered the deployment of high-speed Internet access, the FCC said.

Cable companies have invested more than $100 billion on broadband networks "to offer consumers a wide array of new services, and this action will speed the rollout of digital voice service in many more markets," said Kyle McSlarrow, president of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association.

Oracle Adds Business-Intelligence Firm Hyperion (WSJ)

By Vauhini Vara

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Oracle Corp.'s roll-up of smaller software concerns continues to roll on, with a twist in emphasis.

The deal announced yesterday -- a tender offer for Hyperion Solutions Corp. for $3.3 billion, or $52 a share -- highlights the business-software giant's shift from buying head-on rivals in maturing markets to snapping up players in fast-growing niches. Hyperion specializes in business-intelligence software, a hot field where Oracle has been a relatively minor player to date.

The transaction, which sent Hyperion's shares up 20% and moved the stocks of other companies in the sector, would be Oracle's largest acquisition since it acquired Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion in 2006.

In the past two years, Oracle Chief Executive Larry Ellison has spent upward of $20 billion on buying more than 25 software firms. Early on, Oracle used big bids for major rivals such as PeopleSoft Corp. and Siebel to build itself into the No. 2 maker of applications for business tasks, such as finance and human resources, after German rival SAP AG. Those deals significantly beefed up Oracle's own applications business and customer list, while creating opportunities to increase profit by laying off employees in duplicate positions.

But lately, the company has focused on smaller acquisitions in areas such as security and content management, as well as firms focused on specific industries.

DEAL JOURNAL

1 · Read the Journal's new daily take2 on the high-stakes world of deal making, and see more in our new Deals & Deal Makers page3.

The Hyperion acquisition is the latest reflection of that plan. The company focuses on programs that help companies collect, analyze and share data about how their businesses are performing -- an increasingly important field as businesses seek to extract more usable knowledge from their growing troves of business data.

Forrester Research found in a recent survey that 13% of businesses plan to make first-time purchases of business-intelligence software this year -- more than in any other area of application software.

"In applications, [Oracle's] strategy has been to gain critical mass," UBS analyst Heather Bellini said. Now, the company is using its cash to drive revenue growth, not just cost savings, she said.

Where Oracle cut the former sales teams of PeopleSoft and Siebel, for example, it plans to squeeze cost savings from other parts of Hyperion.

"They've got a sales force," Safra Catz, Oracle's chief financial officer, said on conference call. "We're keeping it intact."

Oracle expects the transaction to be accretive to Oracle's earnings on a non-GAAP basis by at least one cent per share in fiscal year 2008 ending in May of that year and by at least four cents per share in fiscal 2009. The deal, subject to customary conditions, is expected to close next month.

Oracle had been in talks for months with Hyperion, of Santa Clara, Calif., and with rivals in the field that include Cognos Inc. and Franco-American Business Objects SA, according to people familiar with the matter. Oracle, Redwood Shores, Calif., was looking for a purchase that would fit with its own business-intelligence software and liked Hyperion because there was little overlap between the companies' products.

Analysts say they expect Oracle to focus, going forward, on similar types of deals in other niches. Major rivals, such as SAP, could now decide to snap up the other business-intelligence specialists, they suggested.

A spokesman for SAP, however, emailed a statement that appeared to question the wisdom of trying to grow through large deals. "This latest acquisition only further muddies Oracle's already cluttered application landscape," he wrote.

The latest deal sent Hyperion shares up $8.73 to $51.57 as of 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Oracle shares rose 34 cents, or 2.1%, to $16.77, also on Nasdaq, where Cognos shares rose 95 cents, or 2.5%, to $39.06, and Business Objects' American depositary shares fell 98 cents, or 2.7%, to $35.12.

Hyperion has ridden a wave of demand for software that helps companies analyze corporate data, counting 91 of the Fortune 100 companies as customers. Its revenue rose 9% to $765.2 million in its 2006 year ended June 30.

Hyperion has had to make acquisitions of its own as the software industry consolidates. Most recently, it announced in January that it would acquire, under undisclosed terms, closely held Decisioneering Inc., which makes software to help companies predict how they should run their business.

Separately, Oracle is making changes in its product-development organization, having fewer executives report to John Wookey, senior vice president of applications development, according to people familiar with the matter.

Edward Abbo, a senior vice president in charge of customer-relationship-management products, will take on broader responsibilities for Oracle's existing product lines, these people said. Mr. Abbo reports to Mr. Wookey.

Some of the other executives who reported to Mr. Wookey will now report to Mr. Abbo, these people said.

Oracle To Buy Hyperion Solutions In $3.3 Billion Deal (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, March 2, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — Oracle bagged Hyperion Solutions for $3.3 billion on Thursday, renewing a furious shopping spree to unseat business-software leader SAP.

The cash deal, if approved by regulators, gives Oracle the keys to Hyperion's line of software used by corporate executives to track their company's performance — software that is also widely used by SAP customers.

The Hyperion acquisition is Oracle's biggest since it snapped up Siebel Systems for $6.1 billion last year. Oracle has spent more than $20 billion on almost 30 acquisitions in the past two years.

Oracle will pay $52 per share for Hyperion, a 21% premium above the most recent closing price of Hyperion's stock. Hyperion shares soared 20%, to $51.57, after the deal was announced Thursday. Oracle shares edged up 2%, to $16.77.

DOJ_NMG_0139013

Oracle's acquisition could trigger a ripple effect, tech analysts say.

AMR Research analyst Bruce Richardson says Canada-based Cognos could be a takeover candidate for IBM, and France-based Business Objects may be courted by SAP. Hewlett-Packard might also sniff around for a purchase, he says.

"I would be surprised if something doesn't happen in 60 days. This is one of the last virgin markets," he says.

Business Objects is "keen" to remain independent and court Hyperion customers wary of the Oracle takeover, says Keith Gile, a senior adviser for Business Objects.

"We see this deal as a positive for us in eliminating Hyperion as a competitor," Gile says.

The purchase of 2,700-person Hyperion continues an aggressive expansion plan by Oracle CEO Larry Ellison to bolster his company's business-applications software, which automates a wide range of administrative tasks. Most of Oracle's revenue comes from its flagship database-software franchise, but growth in that market has slackened.

The Hyperion deal "beefs up" Oracle's business-intelligence software, David Hilal, managing director of Friedman Billings Ramsey, said in a report Thursday. "Unlike the acquisitions of PeopleSoft and Siebel, where there was meaningful product overlap, this deal is more complementary," he said by phone.

SAP still commands a healthy lead in the $56.4 billion market, but Oracle has chipped away by snapping up software makers such as PeopleSoft and Siebel. About 55% of Hyperion's 12,000 customers are also SAP customers, according to AMR Research.

Oracle expects a jump in sales and "some very significant (cost) efficiencies" because of Hyperion, Chief Financial Officer Safra Catz said on a conference call with analysts Thursday.

Hyperion earned $63 million on revenue of $765 million in its last fiscal year.

$8.6 Billion Acquisition Of Qantas OK'd (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

(AP) - SYDNEY, Australia-The proposed $8.6 billion acquisition of Qantas Airways Ltd. by an investor group cleared a hurdle Thursday when the Australian competition watchdog said it will not oppose the sale.

The Australian Competition and Consumer Commission, or ACCC, said while market inquiries during a comprehensive review of the proposed acquisition had revealed a range of potential competition issues arising from the interests of the bidding consortium members, it ruled the deal is "unlikely to substantially lessen competition" under federal trade laws.

Qantas' board has recommended shareholders accept the bid by Australia's Macquarie Bank, Forth-Worth based Texas Pacific Group, Canada's Onex Corp. and others, which was first announced mid-December. It would be one of Australia's biggest-ever corporate takeovers.

ACCC chairman Graeme Samuel said while the regulator has closely reviewed whether Macquarie Bank's "partial direct and indirect interests" in Qantas and Sydney Airport could lead to discrimination in favor of Qantas by Sydney Airport management, it appeared there are "not clear incentives" for the bank to do this.

The ACCC found there is not likely to be a substantial lessening of competition across a range of aeronautical services, domestic and international air passenger services, aircraft parts and leasing, airline catering and ticketing services.

In a statement, the bidding consortium Airline Partners Australia said it welcomes the ACCC ruling and has worked with the regulator to "address all relevant issues in relation to our bid."

The government's Foreign Investment Review Board is due to report to Treasurer Peter Costello next week on whether the bid breaches foreign ownership laws. Costello can block the sale if he believes it would not be in the national interest.

Costello said that a Senate inquiry announced Thursday into the sale would not delay his decision.

Qantas Buy-out Plan Clears Hurdle (FT)

By Raphael Minder

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

A proposed A$11.1bn (US$8.7bn) buy-out of Qantas, the Australian airline, yesterday cleared a big hurdle when the country's antitrust regulator ruled the takeover was unlikely to strangle competition. Graeme Samuel, chairman of the Australian Competition and Consumer Commission, said the watchdog's review had identified some potential issues of concern, in particular relating to Sydney airport.

But he said the concerns were not enough to suggest the deal could lead to "a substantial lessening of competition". Australia's leading airport is controlled by Macquarie, the investment bank that has spearheaded the buy-out offer for Qantas.

Peter Costello, Australia's treasurer, is expected in the next few days to receive a report from the Foreign Investment Review Board to determine whether the deal would run against the "national interest".

DOJ_NMG_0139014

The consortium, which also includes Texas Pacific Group and Sydney-based Allco Equity Partners, has structured the deal so that foreign investors own only 39 per cent of the equity.

The Senate, the upper house of parliament, is also preparing to conduct a separate review of the deal.

Raphael Minder, Sydney

ENVIRONMENT:

Md. To Investigate Dumping On Site In Rural Montgomery (WP)

By Miranda S. Spivack

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Two Maryland agencies are investigating a two-acre pile of debris that has been dumped by a landscaping firm for the past eight years on a secluded site near the Patuxent River, a source of drinking water for the region.

The dump sits on property owned by Pepco in northeastern Montgomery County and rises 20 feet in places. It contains yard and construction waste, including cable, concrete and closed canisters, said government officials who have inspected the site. At one point last year, the debris pile was smoldering and emitting steam.

County officials have been aware of the dump since early 2006, but they did not order removal of the debris or issue fines to Pepco or Kollins Landscaping, the Brinklow firm dumping on the site. The dumping stopped a year ago after a frustrated neighbor obtained a court order. Not until last month did county officials begin examining the dump's contents more closely to assess its toxicity.

Log entries made by a county investigator who examined the site in early 2006 indicate that Pepco knew about the dumping and allowed it to continue.

"Through my conversation with Pepco it is clear that they are aware that Kollins Landscaping is placing materials at this location and that they have let it go on. However this still constitutes an illegal transfer station," said a log entry written in early 2006 by Peter R. Dilima, an inspector with the county's Department of Environmental Protection. Dilima did not respond to requests for comment.

Michael Boland, associate general counsel with Pepco, disputed that assessment.

"I don't know the inspector or how accurate or inaccurate he might have been with his notes and recollections," Boland said yesterday. "We don't permit anything like this. As soon as we became aware of it, we addressed it, and the county inspector thought it had been addressed," he said.

The county's inspector general, Thomas Dagley, whose office is independent of the executive branch, referred the matter to the state attorney general's office and the state Department of the Environment last month. Both agencies have sent investigators to the site in Ashton, state and local officials said.

Dagley said the site, a few hundred feet from the Patuxent River, needs to be examined further to determine whether the dump is toxic. The river is used not only for drinking water but also for fishing and recreation.

"For allegations involving environmental crimes, it is important to the county and state investigators to coordinate," Dagley said. "Unless there is fact-finding at the state level, no one can answer the question of 'Is this an isolated dump on a Pepco site or one of many?' "

County officials said they are focusing on removing the material and pointed out that County Executive Isiah Leggett (D), who took office in December, had inherited the situation.

"We want to work with Pepco to clean it up," said Timothy Firestine, the county's chief administrative officer. "Our position is it needs to be cleaned up. It has been going on for a long time. Wrongs have certainly occurred."

Firestine said county officials estimate that 120 truckloads of debris need to come out. He said efforts are underway to ensure that the removal of the debris does not cause environmental damage.

Dilima's log indicates that several officials in the county's environmental and permitting agencies were told of the debris in early 2006. But dumping continued even as Pepco worked to distribute the waste on the site to try to speed decomposition, Dilima's log indicates.

Last March, a neighbor, Steve Kanstoroom, obtained a court order to stop dump trucks from using a nearby road to reach the site. Even so, one load was dumped there in June, records show.

Dilima's log, which Kanstoroom obtained through a public records request, indicates that the inspector initially urged the removal of the debris but that he agreed to allow most of the material to remain after a Pepco forester proposed spreading it around the site.

DOJ_NMG_0139015

According to the log, Pepco forester David Paduda, who patrols the area, told Dilima that he and "others from his office" had a plan to remove some material and leave some to decompose on the site. The log says Paduda also told Steve Pullum of Montgomery's Department of Permitting Services and Paul Kolanowski of Kollins Landscaping of his plan.

Dumping such material legally would be expensive: The county transfer station in Shady Grove charges about $300 to $500 for a truckload of solid waste. Dumping natural wood waste is generally less expensive.

Illegal dumping, a misdemeanor in Montgomery, is punishable by six months in jail and a $1,000 fine. Unauthorized storage of solid waste on private property carries a fine of $500 a day.

Because the Ashton dump is near a stream that feeds into the Patuxent River, fines also could be imposed under federal environmental laws.

In mid-March 2006, the dump began giving off steam and possibly smoke, officials said, and it smoldered for several weeks under Pepco's overhead electrical transmission wires. Boland, the Pepco attorney, said yesterday the company did not believe the heat from the dump posed a danger.

Firefighters, inspectors and a state forester arrived to examine the site, but no one tested the dump's contents, according to Dilima's log. Officials agreed to leave the material alone and let it burn out on its own, the log says. Elizabeth Brigham, who lives nearby and is related to Paul Kolanowski, owner of the landscaping firm, was assigned to monitor it, the log says.

"Something is terribly wrong when the county refuses to take enforcement action against corporate polluters . . . and private citizens are left trying to protect their property by acting as a private attorney general," Kanstoroom said.

Kanstoroom said he became aware of the dump several years ago. He said he spoke to Kolanowski about it and thought the dumping had stopped. In early 2006, Kanstoroom began seeing Kollins Landscaping trucks carrying debris into the area and driving out empty. Kanstoroom said he asked Kolanowski to stop it, but the dumping continued. He said he then reported his observations to several county agencies and sent Pepco and county officials a video that showed the dump and the trucks.

Kolanowski declined to comment other than to say the dispute over the dump "was resolved over a year ago."

A few days after Kanstoroom sent out the video, he said, he visited the site and noticed that someone had bulldozed the debris, covered it with dirt and pushed some of it toward a stream that leads into the Patuxent, where much of it remains. Several weeks later, Kanstoroom filed suit in Circuit Court.

County Council member Marc Elrich (D-At Large), whom Kanstoroom approached for help, said the case shows a fundamental breakdown in the county's enforcement of environmental regulations.

Elrich said: "We are trying to ask the county, 'Why were you not able to deal with this? . . . Why was nobody cited? Was it an administrative process with a bottleneck? Or is the law so unclear that you feel you couldn't deal with this? I have met with every department involved."

He added, "Nobody should have to go through this again."

The Climate-Change Precipice (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The scientific debate about whether there is a global warming problem is pretty much over. A leading international group of climate scientists reported last month that the evidence for global warming is "unequivocal" and that the likelihood it is caused by humans is more than 90 percent. Skeptical researchers will continue to question the data, but this isn't a "call both sides for comment" issue anymore. For mainstream science, it's settled.

The question now is what to do about global warming. This is a political problem more than a scientific one. The solutions (if we can agree on any) will require political will and imagination -- and also pain. That was my only reservation about the Oscar night celebration of Al Gore's leadership on this issue. The gowns and black ties and the celebrity back-slapping made it look like dealing with global warming will be fun, a walk down the red carpet. But it's more likely to be about catastrophe and how to share the pain.

These issues come into focus in a startling new report by futurist Peter Schwartz. He turns the usual discussions upside down: Rather than starting with detailed estimates of climate change (how much temperatures will increase; how much sea levels will rise; what new diseases will be spawned), he looks instead at systems that already are vulnerable to such stresses.

What Schwartz discovers with his stress-testing makes climate change even scarier: The world already is precarious; the networks that maintain political and social order already are fragile, especially in urban areas; the dividing line between civilized life and anarchy is frighteningly easy to breach, as the daily news from Iraq reminds us. We look at the behaviors of butterflies and migratory birds as harbingers of climate change. But what about early effects on human beings? "The steady escalation of climate pressure will stretch the resiliency of natural and human systems," writes Schwartz. "In short, climate change pushes systems everywhere toward their tipping point."

DOJ_NMG_0139016

Schwartz's report, "Impacts of Climate Change," was prepared by his consulting group, Global Business Network, for a U.S. government intelligence agency he doesn't identify. The text of the report is available at the online discussion forum PostGlobal (http://www.washingtonpost.com/postglobal). Here's a brief trek through the ravaged landscape Schwartz describes.

A first set of disasters waiting to happen involves stressed ecosystems. Human actions -- deforestation, overfarming, rapid urbanization -- have created special vulnerabilities to catastrophic natural events that are likely as the climate changes globally. In an interview, Schwartz cited the example of Haiti, which because of deforestation and loss of topsoil is "an ecosystem at the edge." A prolonged drought or a devastating hurricane could tip Haiti over that threshold -- and produce a refugee crisis of tens of thousands of boat people fleeing a devastated country.

Or take the problem of rising sea levels: Climate scientists are uncertain how fast the icecaps will melt and the seas will rise. But in Bangladesh, where millions of people live at or near sea level, even a small increase could produce a catastrophe. In a severe monsoon, 60 million to 100 million people could be forced to flee inundated areas, Schwartz warns, producing "the single greatest humanitarian crisis we have ever seen."

Lack of water may be as big a problem as flooding. Schwartz notes that more than 700 million people now live in arid or semi-arid areas. Climate change could tip this balance, too, producing severe water shortages and even "water wars." Tens of millions of people may become water migrants. The world's feeble political systems can't cope with existing migration patterns, let alone this human tide.

And finally, there is the problem of maintaining social order in a stressed world. You don't have to go to Baghdad to see how quickly the social fabric can be shredded; just look at New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina. The stresses come in part from rapid urbanization. Schwartz notes that in 1900, one in 20 people lived in cities; today it's about half, and the percentage is rising fast. Without strong and supple governments, this could become a world of vigilantes and militias, desperate to control scarce resources.

The big problems in life aren't the ones that hit you by surprise but the ones you can see coming. That's surely the case with climate change: We can measure it, we can imagine its catastrophic effects. But can we do anything to stop it? If we let ourselves visualize how bad it could get, as Schwartz does in this report, will we make changes that might reduce the disaster? That's the real stress test: It's coming at us. What are we doing about it?

Uncle Sam's Greenhouse Gases (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Stop the presses: Senator Barbara Boxer of California has a good idea. Ms. Boxer, who heads the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, suggested last week that a first step in reducing greenhouse gases would be to require that federal buildings use more efficient light bulbs, and ask federal bureaucrats to turn off their computers at night.

"Don't you think it's time the federal government were a model of energy efficiency?" she asks. We warmly agree, not least since the United States Government is the largest single consumer of energy in the United States.

It's also one of the most inefficient energy users. According to a 1999 report by the Alliance to Save Energy, the "federal government, consumes about 32% more energy per square foot than the nation's building stock at large." This inefficiency costs taxpayers an estimated $1 billion a year. In Al Gore's phrase, Uncle Sam's leaving one giant "carbon footprint."

Of course, it follows from all this that the best way to make the federal government more energy efficient would be to undertake a government-wide policy of . . . lights out, permanently. Save the environment; kill a federal program.

Start, needless to say, with the Department of Energy, operating at an annual cost of $22 billion. The U.S. Government Accountability Office reports that from 1980 to 1996 Energy frittered away more than $10 billion on programs that were "terminated before completion." On behalf of combating climate change, America could live without DOE's Energy Hog Webgame for kids, which cost taxpayers $325,000.

The Senate Government Reform Committee has identified more than $200 billion of budget savings, enough to easily balance the budget, by eliminating redundant and wasteful federal activities. They'd have to open that nuclear-waste dump at Yucca Mountain to bury all the turned-off lightbulbs and computers. At this rate, Barbara Boxer might eclipse Al Gore as the Democrat who saved the planet. The key to success is one wonderful word -- "efficient."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds Target Gang Gun Connection (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune staff reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139017

The arrests of 19 people in Chicago and Mississippi in a gun-trafficking conspiracy offer a snapshot into the illegal gun trade in which gang members here end up with high-powered weapons, federal authorities said Wednesday.

A loose organization made up of relatives, their friends and associates allegedly arranged for the purchase of more than 100 guns in Mississippi, where laws are relatively lax, and transport here for sale to gangs such as the Gangster Disciples.

About three dozen weapons eventually were recovered at Chicago crime scenes, including a shootout last year in which two people were killed and a police officer wounded, investigators said.

"When you add illegally obtained heavy-caliber firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago, the result to say the least is an unacceptable level of violence," said Gary Shapiro, first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago.

Three people were in custody in Chicago and 15 in Mississippi after a team of agents from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and officers from the Chicago Police Department and Illinois State Police cracked down on the group early Wednesday.

Shapiro said gun-running operations like the one dismantled Wednesday contribute significantly to crime in the city.

It "threatens not only those who try to enforce our laws, but also the law-abiding citizens who only wish to live their lives in the neighborhoods that the gangs are trying to dominate," Shapiro said.

Recovered guns included two assault rifles and several high-powered handguns, Shapiro said.

Authorities said gun brokers in Chicago worked with traffickers, who recruited buyers in Mississippi. Those buyers made what are known as "straw purchases" at a group of three pawn shops and a gun store in Clarksdale and Tunica, Miss., falsely claiming that the guns were for them.

An ATF affidavit filed in the case outlines when weapons were purchased by alleged conspirators and when those guns turned up in Chicago.

On July 30, 2005, one of the buyers, Percy Strong, 54, of Jonestown, Miss., bought a 9mm handgun at Krosstown Trade and Pawn in Clarksdale, according to the affidavit Last October, Chicago police trying to thwart a gang hit in Humboldt Park pulled over a car full of New Breeds gang members who were on their way to shoot a rival.

The gang members pulled out an assault weapon and the pistol Strong had bought at Krosstown, authorities said. A shootout ensued that left two of the gang members dead and a police officer shot in the hand.

In December 2003, Strong bought another 9mm pistol from Krosstown. That weapon was recovered by Chicago police in the South Side bedroom of a convicted felon, along with a stash of drugs, according to the affidavit.

On Sept. 1, 2003, Strong bought a .45-caliber pistol at the same business, the affidavit states. Less than two months later, the gun was recovered after a Gangster Disciple street gang member used it to shoot someone in the 5700 block of South Wabash Avenue.

Another buyer, James Jiles of Clarksdale, bought a semiautomatic rifle at Mega Pawn in that town. Police executing a search warrant on the South Side in 2004 found the weapon in the possession of a member of the Mafia Insane Vice Lords, the affidavit states.

ATF leaders said they began to crack the network by analyzing gun data, discovering that between 2001 and last fall, 300 guns recovered by law enforcement in Northern Illinois came from the Clarksdale and Tunica shops. Records from those businesses were then used to identify the purchasers, who were questioned by investigators and who blamed others in the network.

Strong told the ATF he was recruited by Eddie Nesby, 25, of Chicago, who was among those charged. Nesby paid him $250 cash in addition to the cost of the gun, authorities said, but other buyers were paid as little as $20 or $50.

Many involved in the scheme knew where the guns were headed, investigators said, and attempted to destroy the serial numbers on many of the weapons. Most of the guns remain on the street and unaccounted for.

Other Chicagoans arrested and charged in the conspiracy in addition to Nesby were Julius Statham, 37, who allegedly bought some of the weapons in Chicago; and Antonio Brunt, 30, who along with Statham was accused of using a relative to obtain firearms in the South.

Attorneys for the men could not immediately be reached for comment.

Andrew Traver, special agent in charge of the Chicago ATF, said the case is a good example of how firearms-trafficking works. Traver called it a growing problem that involves more-sophisticated groups moving deadlier firearms.

"Back in the late '80s and early '90s, it was generally one person with a trunkful of guns who would drive up and sell them," he said. "Now we have these groups of people, where they recruit family members or associates in states that tend to have more lenient gun laws than Illinois."

Mississippi does not require a special firearm owner's identification card to buy a gun, authorities said, and has no waiting period.

DOJ_NMG_0139018

Officials Break Up Gunrunning Operation (JCL)

By Andrew Nelson

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, March 1, 2007

Purchasers would buy weapons in Miss. because of lax firearm laws and send them to Chicago brokers

Nineteen people suspected of putting more than 300 Mississippi-purchased firearms in the hands of Chicago street gang members were arrested Wednesday, most in the Delta town of Jonestown in Coahoma County.

At least one of those guns is believed to have been used in a shootout with police in November that left an officer wounded and two alleged gang members dead.

At a news conference in Chicago following the arrests, prosecutors displayed a table of weapons similar to those confiscated in the crackdown, including AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and an assault-style shotgun, The Associated Press reported.

"They just weren't your regular handguns," Monique Bond, a spokeswoman for Chicago Police Department, told The Clarion-Ledger. "These were assault-type weapons - heavy artillery."

According to Bond, brokers in Chicago arranged to have guns purchased in Mississippi because of the state's "lax gun laws."

Purchasers were recruited to buy the weapons at three different pawn shops in Clarksdale and Tunica, Bond said. Those purchasers knew the guns were going to be used illegally, she said.

The sellers have cooperated with authorities and are not suspected of being involved, said Senior Special Agent Austin Banks of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. He would not identify the shops.

After the weapons made it to Chicago, they were used in crimes, Bond said.

One 9 mm pistol is believed to have been used in November by members of the New Breeds gang in a gunfight with police on the city's west side.

Many of the members of the group are related, Banks said. The Mississippians arrested all had family or friends in the Chicago area.

The 15 arrested in Mississippi are expected to be arraigned Thursday in Oxford, Banks said. The four arrested in Chicago will be arrainged there.

Each charge carries a sentence of five to 10 years. Some of the suspects face multiple charges.

Weapons Crackdown Nets Feds 19 Arrests (AP)

By Mike Robinson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

CHICAGO -- Nineteen people have been charged with taking part in gun-running operations from Mississippi to Chicago that provided high-powered weapons to street gangs, federal prosecutors announced Wednesday.

"When you add illegally obtained firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago the result is an unacceptable level of violence," said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago.

At a news conference, prosecutors displayed a table of weapons similar to those confiscated in the crackdown, including AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and a sinister-looking, assault-style shotgun.

Fourteen of those accused were charged in a complaint unsealed in Chicago on Wednesday. Three of those charged were arrested in Chicago Wednesday, and 10 were arrested in Mississippi. One other was already in jail, authorities said.

Five others were charged by federal officials in Mississippi.

Prosecutors said 301 guns confiscated by police and agents in Chicago over five years were traced to federally licensed gun dealers at four shops in Tunica and Clarksdale, Miss.

They said typically, so-called straw purchasers with clean records would buy the guns under orders from brokers who would then have them taken to Chicago and sold to members of the Gangster Disciples and other gangs.

Often, the serial numbers were obliterated in an effort to hide the origin of the guns from police and federal agents, authorities said.

The investigation was conducted by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives along with the Chicago Police Department and the Illinois State Police.

Police say they confiscated well over 10,000 guns in Chicago last year, which they said was a fairly typical year. Officials said that indicates that the guns recovered in the latest investigation are only a small part of the weapons being brought into Chicago, where individuals may not buy guns.

Feds Charge 19 In Mississippi Gun Pipeline (CHIST)

By Frank Main, Crime Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, March 1, 2007

Weapon from gang shoot-out came from state

A 9mm handgun recovered last year in a Chicago Police standoff that left two gang members dead was one of hundreds of guns smuggled here from Mississippi, officials said Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors unsealed gun-trafficking charges against three Chicago men and 16 others from Mississippi. Members of at least four Chicago gangs bought the smuggled weapons from the traffickers, federal prosecutors said.

"The violent activities of these gangs have been disrupted," Chicago Police Deputy Supt. Hiram Grau said.

Could be hundreds more The Chicago defendants include convicted felons Eddie Nesby, 25, Julius Statham, 37, and Antonio Brunt, 30.

Nesby allegedly told investigators he recruited Percy Strong of Mississippi and others to buy guns for him there. Strong could buy guns because he was not a felon, officials say.

In 2005, Strong bought a 9mm Hi-Point pistol at a Clarksdale, Miss., pawn shop. The Hi-Point was recovered last October in the 3200 block of West Augusta after officers stopped a car containing gang members getting ready to shoot a rival, police said. The gangsters pointed the Hi-Point and an AK-47 at officers, who opened fire and killed two of them, police said.

Chicago Police, State Police and the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives have been investigating the Mississippi-to-Chicago gun pipeline since 2001. The defendants named Wednesday were allegedly responsible for 39 Mississippi guns recovered by law enforcement officials in Chicago. Authorities have not found 117 other Mississippi guns distributed in Chicago by the defendants, officials said.

Investigators are looking into whether about 200 other Mississippi guns recovered in Chicago were smuggled by the same defendants.

One gun bought in Mississippi was used in a crime in Chicago just five days later.

Smugglers change tactics In recent years, gun traffickers have been selling powerful, expensive weapons such as 9mm and .40-caliber pistols -- and assault weapons such as AK-47s -- through smuggling networks, said Andrew Traver, head of ATF in Chicago. In the past, traffickers worked alone and sold cheap, easily concealed low-caliber pistols out of their cars, he said.

"The face of firearms trafficking has changed dramatically," Traver said.

fmain@suntimes.com

19 Arrested In Gun-running Ring (WLS)

By Stacey Baca

WLS-TV, ABC 7, Chicago, February 28, 2007

Federal agents and Chicago police teamed up to take down a gun trafficking ring that ran high-powered weapons from Mississippi to Chicago.

The guns -- a collection of AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and a sinister-looking, assault-style shotgun --were reportedly purchased illegally in Mississippi and sold to gang members in Chicago.

"When you add illegally obtained firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago the result is an unacceptable level of violence," said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago.

Out of the 14 arrested, 10 were taken into custody in Mississippi. Three were in Chicago and one was in jail.

Five others were charged by federal officials in Mississippi.

Prosecutors said 301 guns confiscated by police and agents in Chicago over five years were traced to federally licensed gun dealers at four shops in Tunica and Clarksdale, Miss.

"A majority of these firearms are purchased in gun and pawn shops in Mississippi. Despite the attempts to obliterate the serial numbers, Chicago police were able to trace the origins with good old-fashioned police work," said Hiram Grau, Deputy Police Superintendent.

"We've noticed in the last few years there's a definite trend to go with powerful were higher capacity, more lethal firearms," said Andrew L. Traver, ATF special-agent-in-charge.

The investigation was conducted by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives along with the Chicago Police Department and the Illinois State Police.

Police say they confiscated well over 10,000 guns in Chicago last year, which they said was a fairly typical year. Officials said that indicates that the guns recovered in the latest investigation are only a small part of the weapons being brought into Chicago, where individuals may not buy guns.

"Is it the tip of the iceberg?" asked Shapiro. "You'd have to say it is."

DOJ_NMG_0139020

FBI Bust Up Mid-South "gunrunning Operation" (WMC)

WMC-TV, Memphis, March 1, 2007

It's a growing crime on which the Feds are focused.

"The movement of guns from the Mid-South to the streets of Chicago," says U.S. Attorney Jim Greenley of the Northern District of Mississippi.

Nineteen people were rounded up Wednesday and charged with running guns.

"In my 20 years of law enforcement with the ATF, this is the most successful arrest operation I've ever been a part of," says ATF agent Robert Browning.

In all, the Feds say 100 firearms went from North Mississippi to Chicago between 1999 and 2005.

Many of the weapons were distributed to gang members and used to commit serious crimes, including homicide.

"Some of these guns were involved with officers getting shot," says Coahoma County Sheriff Andrew Thompson.

Most of those charged in this latest round of arrests are from Jonestown, Mississippi in Coahoma County, but the weapons were purchased from pawn shops in Tunica and Clarksdale.

In most cases, the crooks are accused of paying people with clean records to fill out the required paperwork and buy the weapons for them.

"Often times, the people fill out the forms because they want crack cocaine or some other type of drug," says Browning.

Federal officials say without the cooperation of accomplices, these weapons would have never made it north.

"And to those who would consider buying guns for others--don't," says Greenley.

That's because it's a federal crime that could land you in the same place as these accused gunrunners.

By the way, they face 5 to 10 years in prison and up to a $250,000 fine.

Gun Trafficking Leads To Arrests (DMISS)

By Heather Berry

Daily Mississippian, March 1, 2007

Nineteen people were arrested Wednesday morning for allegedly illegally purchasing firearms in Mississippi that then were transported to Chicago for criminals and gang members to use.

"These guns found their way onto our cities' streets and were used to terrorize our citizens," said Jim Greenlee, U.S. attorney for North Mississippi.

The firearms were purchased in the Clarksdale and Tunica areas from federally licensed firearms dealers. The defendants purchased them for family members and friends, or for the exchange of money or drugs, according to Robert Browning, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

"Our office will be relentless in pursuing these investigations," said Browning, who is with the New Orleans division of firearms for ATF.

The investigation began as a result of the recovery of firearms in Chicago, and the case has been impending for the past couple of years, Browning said.

"We're cracking down on it," he added. "Enough is enough."

"Today was one of the most successful operations I've seen in my 30 years (of work)," said Coahoma County Sheriff Andrew Thompson.

The investigation was conducted by ATF, the Chicago Police Department and the Illinois State Police. Agents from the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics and Deputy U.S. Marshals also assisted ATF with the arrests.

Fourteen people in Illinois were charged with strong purchase, as were five people in northern Mississippi. Under the direction of U.S. attorney Jim Greenlee and ATF Special Agent in Charge David Harper, the five defendants in Mississippi were indicted by a federal grand jury in the Northern District of Mississippi.

If proven guilty charges, the people arrested will be given a sentence of anywhere from five to 10 years, Browning said.

"It's not worth it to buy guns for someone else," Greenlee said.

The firearms were purchased in Mississippi because the state is more lax on gun laws compared to Chicago's restrictive gun laws, Browning said. In Mississippi, residents are not required to have a permit in order to own a gun.

Browning said federal laws regarding firearms are sufficient enough for them to monitor illegal activity outside the municipal laws.

"In this country we have an idea of individual freedom and the ability to buy things," Greenlee said.

But Southerners "abhor the illegal practice" of purchasing firearms for other people who are prohibited to, he said.

The defendants were taken advantage of by criminals who did not have the rights to purchase firearms, Browning said.

DOJ_NMG_0139021

Greenlee and others involved in the arrests want to warn people not to be involved in the illegal activity.

The five defendants charged in Mississippi are Clifford Moore, 26, Latoria Davis, 26, Jeannie Mae Bedford, 36, Veronica Gilliam, 27, and George Gilliam, 25. None of the defendants live in Oxford.

The others charged are Eddie Nesby, 25, Percy Strong, 54, Charles Cotton, 46, Julius Statham, 37, Roy Christopher Brunt, 29, Antonio Brunt, 30, Sylvester Rice, 29, James Jiles, 26. Arness Brunt, 26, Demetrius Burnett, 33, Percy Mattox, 33, McKinley Pitts, 29, Tammie Brown, 30, and Curtis Simmons, 25.

To turn in people who are buying guns illegally, call 1-800-ATFGUNS.

U.S. Marshals Official Accused Of Misspending Security Funds (USAT)

By Matt Kelley, Usa Today

USA Today, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — A U.S. Marshals Service official misspent $4.3 million meant for courthouse security and witness protection to pay for fitness centers and firing ranges at federal buildings, a Justice Department investigation found.

The Office of Management and Budget repeatedly told David Barnes not to use construction money on exercise and training facilities, citing agency policy and appropriations laws that restricted the money for improved prisoner security, the report said.

MARSHALS WARNED: Budget office specified where money was to go

Barnes, who oversees courthouse space for the agency, concealed the spending from his superiors and directed $2.6 million in construction money for fitness centers and firing ranges at 20 federal courthouses from 2000 to 2005, according to a copy of the 41-page report obtained by USA TODAY.

The agency has not acted on the report, which it received last April.

Barnes also used nearly $900,000 budgeted for witness protection to build a firing range in the Miami federal courthouse, and he used nearly $400,000 in construction money to hire fitness center staff and clerical workers at the Marshals Service headquarters, where Barnes works, the investigation found. Some workers were friends or relatives of Barnes and his subordinates and were unqualified for the jobs, the report said.

Barnes' lawyer, Charles Printz, said his client had the authority to spend construction money on firing ranges and fitness centers. Printz said the investigation was spurred by disgruntled employees and he expected his client to be cleared.

"No monies were misappropriated," Printz said in an e-mail response.

Barnes remains on the job, pending an administrative review. He could be fired, suspended or cleared.

Marshals spokesman Michael Kulstad and Paul Martin of the Inspector General's office declined to comment.

Printz referred questions to Kevin Linskey, the former staff director of the Senate panel controlling Justice Department spending. Linskey said Congress gave the agency leeway to spend its construction money, including for fitness centers and firing ranges.

In the report, the Justice Department said construction money was supposed to be for "prisoner holding space" in courthouses. In 2001, a congressional committee warned security must be tightened "before a tragedy occurs."

The report also found Barnes:

·Wasted $440,000 by bypassing Marshals Service officials and paying for contractors and construction through the General Services Administration. Printz said those contracts were legal.

·Violated ethics rules by having subordinates do work for free around his home and by forming a vanpool company used by contractors he hired. Ethics rules ban managers from receiving gifts from their employees, the report said. It also found that the vanpool company, which he initially failed to disclose, was a conflict of interest. Printz said the workers are longtime friends of Barnes and that the vanpool arrangement did not violate ethics rules.

Office Specified Where Marshals Money Was To Go (USAT)

By Matt Kelley, Usa Today

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Ten years ago, the White House budget office warned the U.S. Marshals Service to get its priorities straight: Money designated to improve courthouse security was not to be used for fitness centers or firing ranges.

The agency's construction account should be spent on securing areas used by prisoners, such as elevators, holding cells and entrances, Kenneth Schwartz, an Office of Management and Budget (OMB) official, said in a letter to a top Justice Department administrator.

MARSHALS MISSPEND MONEY: $4.3M used inappropriately

DOJ_NMG_0139022

"We are concerned with the oversight and priority setting within this program and request that the department continue to monitor USMS expenditures from this account closely," Schwartz wrote.

David Barnes, who oversees courthouse space for the Marshals Service, pressed the OMB to change the policy in several telephone conversations in 2001, Lisa Ward of the budget office told investigators. His arguments, repeated in letters, e-mails and statements to investigators: Marshals Service officers need to stay physically fit and practice their marksmanship, and facilities to do so were often expensive and far from their offices.

Eventually, the General Services Administration and the Justice Department agreed that the Marshals Service could request exemptions for the construction of firing ranges. The GSA is the independent agency responsible for construction and renovations of federal buildings.

Barnes' office asked for 14 waivers during 2003, but all were denied, records show.

In 20 cities, Barnes found ways without waivers to get the GSA to build or renovate firing ranges and fitness centers, an internal Justice Department investigation found.

The investigation by the department's inspector general found Barnes shifted money among various construction projects and bypassed his supervisors to spend nearly $3.9 million on firing ranges and fitness centers at courthouses from Alaska to Florida, and wasted $440,000 in fees by paying for contractors and construction through the GSA rather than his agency.

A Marshals Service disciplinary board will decide whether to fire, suspend or clear Barnes for what investigators found was a pattern of violating ethics rules and misspending money.

His lawyer, Charles Printz, said Barnes did nothing wrong, and the unauthorized release of the report shows a "clear and gross abuse of authority" by someone in the Justice Department.

In the report, Justice Department investigators cited the Marshals Service's lax oversight as a reason why Barnes' spending sometimes went undetected. A 2003 report from the department's inspector general found that the service couldn't always show it was spending its money the way Congress directed, for example.

John May, the service's chief of budget execution, told investigators it was "impossible to track" the spending by Barnes' office.

Barnes told investigators he did not notify his superiors about many of his spending decisions. When investigators asked Barnes about the disputed expenses, he replied, "I don't think it's a problem," the report said.

Until fiscal year 2006, however, appropriations laws said the Marshals Service construction account was to be used for building and renovating "prisoner holding space" in courthouses and other federal buildings. Both the OMB and Justice Department said that language clearly excluded firing ranges and fitness centers — a central point Barnes' attorney disputes.

The largest amount of challenged spending, $881,500, went to build a firing range in the basement of the new federal courthouse in Miami, the investigation found.

After the OMB deleted the firing range from courthouse plans approved by Congress, Barnes began pressuring the GSA to build a firing range anyway, the report says.

GSA officials said no, but Barnes signed an order directing the GSA to build the range with money from a Marshals Service account used to pay for witnesses' security, the report's attachments show.

The probe also found Barnes used about $400,000 meant for a security fence at the federal courthouse in Anderson, S.C., to begin construction of a firing range in the Tallahassee, Fla., courthouse. The GSA built the fence with $68,000 of its funds, investigators found.

The GSA stopped construction of firing ranges in Tallahassee and Seattle after Justice Department investigators questioned the projects. The Marshals Service had spent nearly $300,000 on a ventilation system for the Seattle shooting range before the project was stopped, the report said.

Courthouse security remains a problem. OMB's latest report said the proportion of courthouses that meet requirements rose from 6% in 1999 to 19% in 2003, but has remained flat since.

Subject Of Explosives Probe Left Homeless, Lawyer Says (MINNST)

By Chao Xiong, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 2, 2007

A Bloomington man who was jailed then released after federal authorities confiscated several firearms and explosive materials from his house has been left homeless after the city condemned his house, according to his attorney.

Terry L. Dahlen, 60, and his wife are living with relatives after a city official said the couple have mice and too much clutter in their basement, garage and back yard, said attorney Joe Rymanowski.

"Normally they don't condemn for that," Rymanowski said. "They say, 'Clean it up.' " Rymanowski said the couple were given until March 8 to clean up the house.

Dahlen has not been charged with any crime and was released from jail Wednesday afternoon. He agreed to be named for this story.

The last few days have been rough, Rymanowski said.

Dahlen has "been reduced to tears," he said. "He's obviously terrified."

FBI agent Paul McCabe said only that the case is still under investigation. The state Bureau of Criminal of Apprehension and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) are part of the joint investigation into Dahlen.

Speaking on Dahlen's behalf, Rymanowski said his client is a gun and pyrotechnics hobbyist who used to be a licensed weapons manufacturer in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The materials and firearms seized by authorities are left over from the days he made firearms for sale to other hobbyists, Rymanowski said.

"None of it was illegal," he said. "He wasn't building a bomb. He wasn't threatening anybody."

Rymanowski said he's puzzled as to why federal authorities searched Dahlen's house, but added that they have been cooperative and professional.

"My question is: If he's such a menace to society, why didn't Hennepin County charge him?" his attorney said. "I think this is just another level of government harassment. People think gun collectors are nuts."

Federal authorities have not said why or for how long Dahlen has been investigated. The Bloomington and Minneapolis bomb squads were called out to his home Monday in the 1700 block of W. 84th Street. Authorities also searched a commercial retail building at 5200 47th Av. S. in Minneapolis on Tuesday that belongs to his wife, who runs a salon at the address. "Explosive materials" that required a bomb squad and the skills of military personnel also were found there.

Steve Bogdalek, assistant special agent in charge of the ATF, has said the materials found at both locations were not in danger of exploding.

Authorities have said they also found blasting caps and detonation cords at Dahlen's house. His attorney said he also had inert land mines that are sold as collectors' items and clocks in the shape of fake dynamite sticks.

Rymanowski said his client does not now have plans to take any legal action in response to the searches, condemnation of his house or arrest.

Task Force To Pursue Local Gangs (WT)

By Daniel Taylor, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

The head of the FBI's Washington Field Office yesterday said he has created a new task force to pursue federal gun and racketeering charges against gang members in Northern Virginia.

Joseph Persichini Jr., the assistant director in charge of the field office, said the task force began its work about a week ago and is made up of eight to 10 agents and representatives from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and local law-enforcement agencies.

He said authorities hope to prosecute gang members using federal gun statutes and the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO).

"We're looking for RICO indictments of people," Mr. Persichini said during a wide-ranging interview with editors and reporters at The Washington Times. "The key here also is using ATF and all the gun charges [because] many of those crimes are committed with weapons."

Agents will "take a look at every gang or crew in Northern Virginia," he said.

Mr. Persichini, who was appointed head of the field office inNovember after serving as its acting director since January 2006, said the effort is part of an increased focus on dealing with local violent crime, which he called a "very serious concern."

He also pointed to a recent uptick in violence in parts of the District. Mr. Persichini said he has spoken extensively with Acting Metropolitan Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier about gathering and sharing intelligence and that he talked with Mayor Adrian M. Fenty as recently as Wednesday night about comprehensive plans to thwart violent crime.

Mr. Persichini said "organized opportunistic crime," including crew-related and robbery-related violence, was driving a spike in violent crime in the 3rd District, which encompasses much of the downtown core.

He said his office has been solidifying its ties to the city's business community and minority populations, to aid its efforts in fighting local crime.

"We can't do what we do without the faith and trust of the people we serve," he said.

Mr. Persichini also said his office has taken a greater role in the schools, expanding internships for teenagers and setting up "junior special agent" programs for sixth-grade students.

"Their first interaction with law enforcement should be positive," he said.

Despite the increased local focus, Mr. Persichini said the priorities of the field office remain unchanged.

DOJ_NMG_0139024

"Counterterrorism will always be No. 1," he said, calling the District a "target-rich environment" that requires constant vigilance against terrorist threats from international groups and what he described as the "home-grown lone wolf."

Mr. Persichini, whose background is in public-corruption cases, said corruption would be the focus of the field office's criminal investigations.

"I'm a firm believer that the FBI is an agency that is ... suited for the investigation of public corruption," he said.

Mr. Persichini declined to talk about the status of the ongoing investigation into the October 2001 anthrax attacks that killed five persons, including two D.C. postal workers. He said that about 20 agents are still working on the case, but would add only that it is a "continuing, pending investigation."

Meet The FBI's 'Best Undercover Agent' (NYSUN)

New York Sun, March 2, 2007

At 6-foot 4-inches and more than 300 pounds, veteran FBI agent Joaquin "Jack" Garcia is a small mountain of a man who is hard to miss. That's never stopped him from being a master of disguises. In recent years, the expert undercover agent's appointment calendar must have read a bit like the script for the 1960s screwball comedy "If It's Tuesday, This Must Be Belgium."

Mr. Garcia surfaced last year when he took the stand in a closed courtroom to describe how he had played the role of a Gambino associate for 27 months. At the same time, Mr. Garcia was also posing as a New York capo in a 36-month FBI sting against crooked Florida cops in which four police officers were nailed last week on corruption charges (thus the reason for the secret testimony).

That wasn't all: Sources tell Gang Land that Mr. Garcia worked undercover in three other successful organized crime and corruption cases during the same time frame.

In Boston, he posed as a drug lord, resulting in the indictment of three police officers last July on drug trafficking and money laundering charges. During the lengthy FBI sting operation, the cops were also implicated in steroid abuse, identity theft and other crimes. Five weeks ago, a fourth cop was charged with perjury, obstruction of justice, and trafficking in steroids.

During the same period, sources said, Mr. Garcia worked undercover in two separate cases in Atlantic City. In one involving Asian organized crime, he played the role of a wiseguy. In a political corruption probe that resulted last fall in guilty pleas by three city council members — two from Atlantic City and one from Camden — he posed as a Wall Street financier.

During the final stages of the Florida, Atlantic City, and Boston probes, Mr. Garcia, who was undercover all but two of his 26 years as an FBI agent, was retired and working as an independent contractor, according to his testimony at the trial of Gambino capo Gregory DePalma, one of 32 mobsters and associates who was convicted as a result of Mr. Garcia's undercover work in New York.

For the record, the DePalma investigation began in December 2002 and ended in March 2005. Mr. Garcia, who retired last March, testified against DePlama last May. The Sunshine State sting operation began in February 2004 and ended last week.

"Without question, Jack Garcia is the best undercover agent the Bureau has ever had," a veteran law enforcement official who worked with him on the DePalma case said. The family's acting boss, Arnold "Zeke" Squitieri, and underboss, Anthony "the Genius" Megale, were among those who copped plea deals rather than go to trial with DePalma.

At trial, Mr. Garcia, a Cuban-born émigré, said he posed as a "fourth- or fifth-generation" Italian American who traced his lineage to Sicily. "The ruse was that I was a knock-around guy, a guy who had access to everything," he testified.

Mr. Garcia's testimony at the DePalma trial was piped into another room to prevent his cover from being blown in the Florida case. In that investigation, the cops traveled to New York and Atlantic City, according to a federal complaint filed in Miami.

Two cops allegedly delivered $400,000 in "stolen" bearer bonds to an undercover agent in New York who was posing as an underling of "Big Jack" in 2005. Last June, a month after Mr. Garcia sunk DePalma from the witness stand, the cops allegedly transported "stolen artwork" to the same "underling" in Atlantic City.

On October 26, according to the complaint, police officer Kevin Companion, the leader of the alleged rogues, met Big Jack and two "underlings" at the Borgata Hotel in Atlantic City to discuss several schemes. Out of the presence Mr. of Garcia – who acted as a non-drug dealing wiseguy in the scam — Mr. Companion agreed to provide protection for a drug shipment, and enlist his colleagues for the job.

A month later, the four cops, who were warned against mentioning "heroin or drugs" in front of Big Jack, agreed to the drug caper with Big Jack's crew, and, after safely escorting a drug mule out of harm's way, were videotaped receiving a total of $32,000 for their services. All told, the four took in $92,000 for their outside work, much of which was done while armed and in uniform, according to the complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0139025

Sources say other cops were implicated in crimes but may escape prosecution because Mr. Companion and police officer Jeffry Courtney learned of the probe after the FBI told Chief James Scarberry about it last month and he relayed the information to his top brass and city officials.

FBI officials, not to mention Mr. Garcia and 12 other agents who worked undercover in the investigation, are furious about the leak, and are likely to point to it the next time the agency gets accused of not sharing information with local police.

On the bright side, Messrs. Companion and Courtney called in sick and began to inquire about retirement benefits when they got wind of the probe. They didn't react the way New York's infamous Mafia Cops, Louis Eppolito and Steven Caracappa, often did during their careers. The dark side — that the lives of FBI agents were put at risk if the Hollywood cops had taken the same path as the murderous New York duo — doesn't sit too well with the FBI.

***

Out there in Gang Land, many people on both sides of the law probably assume that the feds always go the extra mile whenever one of their own has been harmed.

Don't try telling that to William Aronwald, a former federal prosecutor whose father was gunned down in 1987 by a trio of bumbling gangsters who mistook the father for the son in a mob hit.

This week, Mr. Aronwald ripped U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf of Brooklyn for what he called "unprofessional and irresponsible" conduct by her office in its dealings with former mob associate Frank Smith, one of the participants in the killing.

"Shame on the U.S. attorney's office," Mr. Aronwald said. "We're the victims here, my family."

In the past, Mr. Aronwald has criticized Ms. Mauskopf's office for not pushing for tough sanctions initially against Smith, whose cooperation led to the conviction of Colombo underboss Joseph "Joe Waverly" Cacace, now serving a 20-year sentence for ordering the murder of the former prosecutor's father.

More recently, Mr. Aronwald has condemned them for letting Smith off the hook when he was arrested in November for grand larceny, after a short, house arrest term. That arrest, for stealing a load of flat screen TVs, was a violation of the terms of the reduced sentence he received in the killing of Mr. Aronwald's father.

Yesterday, Mr. Aronwald said he was even more irate that he had been kept in the dark that Smith had finally been charged with violating the terms of his sentence, and now faces up to three years in prison. Smith testified about that Tuesday, when he appeared on behalf of an old buddy, Carmine Carini, stating he was wrongly convicted of a 1983 murder.

Ms. Mauskopf, he said, had personally assured him that her office would keep him "in the loop" about Smith's case.

But, the ex-prosecutor told Gang Land, he has been consistently been rebuked by the office, and only learned about Smith's testimony in the Carini case after he was off the stand Tuesday. And the information, he said, came not from Ms. Mauskopf, but from a New York Post reporter, Alex Ginsberg.

"I would expect that someone from the government would have the courtesy to call me," said an "extremely disappointed" Mr. Aronwald, who is now a defense attorney.

A Mauskopf spokesman said that "in light of pending court proceedings in this case," the office would not respond to Mr. Aronwald's remarks.

This column and other news of organized crime will appear today at ganglandnews.com.

4 West Suburban Men Are Held In U.S. Drug-trafficking Probe (CHIT)

By Angel Rozas

Chicago Tribune, March 1, 2007

Four west suburban men have been charged in a nationwide investigation into a Mexican drug trafficking and money laundering ring that resulted in the arrests of 400 people in the last 20 months, authorities announced Wednesday.

The investigation, called Operation Imperial Emperor, targeted a Mexico-based drug trafficking organization authorities say is responsible for supplying tons of cocaine and large amounts of methamphetamine and marijuana to distribution cells on a monthly basis throughout the United States, U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales announced in San Diego.

In Illinois, Melrose Park authorities worked with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to arrest four men alleged to be selling drugs through two Melrose Park businesses. Jose Payan, Saul Leyva and Bogar Santana were each charged with conspiring with others with intent to distribute and distribution of more than 100 grams of heroin. According to the complaint, Payan told a cooperating source that he could go to Santana Automotive Inc. in the 3400 block of West Lake Street in Melrose Park to get a sample of the heroin, said Assistant U.S. Atty. April Perry. In the course of the Payan investigation, authorities seized more than 310 grams of methamphetamine and more than 240 grams of heroin, Perry said.

In a separate complaint, authorities charged Florentino Velazquez of Villa Park with conspiring with others to distribute and distribution of more than 1 kilogram of cocaine. He and an unknown man are alleged to have distributed 2 kilos of cocaine to a cooperating source, Perry said. Velazquez is alleged to have used an unnamed Melrose Park restaurant to sell the drugs and collect money, Perry said.

DOJ_NMG_0139026

The men are in federal custody and will be prosecuted in the Northern District of Illinois.

A Wider Front In Doping Battle (WP)

By Amy Shipley

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The battle against the use of illegal performance-enhancing drugs by athletes is increasingly being led by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies as part of an expanding cooperative effort with the U.S. Olympic Committee's primary anti-doping body, according to law enforcement and anti-doping officials.

The latest manifestation of this collaboration came this week in the multi-state crackdown on illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs that led to the arrests Tuesday of eight people in three states, the officials said.

In the run-up to the bust, Drug Enforcement Agency agents in Mobile, Ala., contacted federal investigators involved in the probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, or Balco, in Northern California that has implicated dozens of Olympic and professional athletes, including baseball slugger Barry Bonds. The California investigators put them in touch with officials from the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency, with whom they have been closely cooperating for the past four years.

Within days, the USADA sent a chemist to Mobile to offer his expertise. Several DEA agents flew to Colorado Springs, where the anti-doping agency is based. There were frequent phone conversations. The cooperation illustrated the changing landscape of anti-doping enforcement, investigators say.

USADA officials say the collaboration also reflects the failure of a more than three-decade effort to contain the use of performance-enhancing drugs by competitive athletes through testing. These officials say that with the Beijing Olympics less than 18 months away they fear the use of even more sophisticated drugs and masking agents by athletes will continue to outpace testing methods.

The collaboration has "had an absolutely enormous effect," said Don Catlin, who has been involved in anti-doping efforts since the early 1980s as the director of UCLA's Olympic Analytical Laboratory, which services the USADA. "When I look at the 23 years of work before Balco and what we were able to do -- yeah, we would grind out positives and occasionally have a big hit -- but when the government to decides to go after it and comes in with their tools. . . . They [wiretap], they pull out e-mails; I was amazed.

"It has clearly caused a revolution. Sports authorities have no power to do anything and government has the power to do all. That's what it takes."

The crackdown on the online pharmacies this week suggests how the relationship already is benefiting both sides. While law enforcement agents have said they are targeting the pharmacies and not necessarily their customers, the California investigators urged DEA agents to turn over evidence of any involvement by high-profile athletes to the USADA so it could start disciplinary proceedings against them.

One lead agent in the multifaceted, three-state bust said he would be willing. "Certainly," Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, said in an interview. "It would be reasonable to do that."

The pharmacies' customers are reported to have included Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield, former baseball star Jose Canseco, a physician for the Pittsburgh Steelers and what one official called other "celebrities."

Federal officials say the cooperation has given them ready access to the scientific expertise of the anti-doping community as well as the benefit of USADA's proximity to athletes and coaches.

Matt Parrella, an assistant U.S. attorney working on the Balco case, said the USADA's ability to sanction drug cheats independent of a criminal conviction by banning them from competition helps "validate" federal investigators' work. Law enforcement authorities rarely go after users of performance-enhancing drugs, choosing instead to focus on distribution networks.

"It was a good relationship from the beginning," Parrella said in an interview in San Francisco. "They could bring something to the table that was unique and we were bringing something to the table they had no ability to do."

The USADA is involved in at least four other drug-related government investigations including the Internet pharmacy case, according to USADA general counsel Travis Tygart and chief executive Terry Madden. They declined to reveal the details of the investigations.

Government officials speculate that increases in federal sentencing guidelines for steroids and other drugs that resulted from the Balco probe have provided agents with more incentive to pursue such cases. "I've seen these things break apart under their own weight many times," Parrella said.

DOJ_NMG_0139027

In the Balco case, he said, it did not. "All involved realized this was a relationship that needed to be fostered for the greater good."

To some extent, the collaboration reflects a worldwide trend. International anti-doping agencies have grown increasingly reliant on government intervention to catch drug users since 1998, when Australian customs agents caught Chinese swimmers with banned drugs and French police conducted raids and made arrests at that summer's Tour de France.

At the Salt Lake City Olympics in 2002, local police confiscated blood-transfusion material at a residence of the Austrian cross-country ski team. Four years later at the 2006 Winter Games in Turin, Italian police raided the rooms of Austrian skiers and biathletes. Dozens of cyclists have been linked to a federal drug raid last year in Madrid known as Operation Puerto.

The World Anti-Doping Agency, an independent Montreal-based body established by the International Olympic Committee, has become so convinced of the necessity of investigative work in anti-doping enforcement that it is preparing to hold its second symposium on the matter in London in April. Jeff Novitzky, a special agent for the Internal Revenue Service who is the lead investigator in the Balco case, and Parrella spoke at the first conference last November in Colorado Springs.

"If you look at the really big busts, the really big advances, the majority have been with the assistance of other government agencies," WADA Director General David Howman said. "It's important that we don't get all wound up collecting urine and blood. It's not the be-all and end-all."

Athletes sanctioned in the Balco scandal said they used a steroid specifically designed to avoid detection. Such "designer steroids" aren't the only problem. Testers still don't have reliable tests for human growth hormone and other naturally produced performance enhancers known to be popular with athletes.

In an environment in which the athletes who use illegal performance-enhancing substances seem routinely to be at least one step ahead of drug testers, efforts are under way to strengthen the relationship between sports bodies and law enforcement officials.

The creation of a task force that would bring together various governmental and nongovernmental agencies is being discussed on Capitol Hill as a means of formalizing the relationship and creating a mechanism for information-sharing, according to a source with knowledge of the discussions.

The USADA, in its seventh year of existence, receives about 60 percent of its funding from the federal government. It is a nonprofit corporation whose stated mission is to eliminate drug use in sport and protect athletes' health through research and education. It has no investigative power, no investigators and no budget designated for investigations.

The USADA has another problem: jurisdiction. All of the U.S. professional sports leagues conduct their own drug testing even though in 2005 several members of Congress, including Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.), publicly urged the leagues to turn their testing over to the USADA.

Of the many examples of the USADA's partnership with government agents, two stand out, officials say.

In 2004, Kevin V. Ryan, the U.S. attorney who oversaw the Balco case until leaving for private practice last month, granted Novitzky, the IRS investigator, permission to testify at two arbitration hearings in which the USADA sought -- and received -- bans for athletes who had never failed drug tests. Ryan also allowed Novitzky to take various pieces of evidence with him rather than providing copies whose authenticity might be questioned.

Parrella said the moves weren't merely "uncommon, it was unique," since the criminal probe was far from complete.

"What drove my decision was the realization that this case was bigger than" the criminal investigation, Ryan said. "Everyone was a little nervous about it. It had never been done before. It turned out to be more a gesture of goodwill. It was our recognition that they had a job to do. . . . They knew we had a lot of evidence, a lot of material, that would help them in their mission."

Throughout the Balco probe, USADA officials communicated almost daily with Novitzky and an assortment of other agents involved in the case, including Parrella and fellow Assistant U.S. Attorneys Jeff Nedrow and Jeff Finigan, IRS agent Erwin Rogers and FBI agent Heather Young.

"If you tried to formalize [the relationship], you'd have lawyers meeting for five or 10 years and nobody would agree on anything," Catlin said. "The beauty of this is it happened. It was all sort of spontaneous from people trying to do the right thing."

Killing Highlights Risk Of Selling Marijuana, Even Legally (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

DENVER, March 1 — Ken Gorman, an aging missionary of marijuana, was found murdered in his home here two weeks ago. The unsolved crime is exposing the tangled threads at the borderland of the legal and illegal drug worlds he inhabited.

Mr. Gorman, who was 60, legally provided marijuana to patients under Colorado's medical marijuana law, but he also openly preached the virtues of illegal use, and even ran for governor in the 1990s on a pro-drug platform.

DOJ_NMG_0139028

In recent years, he had grown frightened as the mainstream medicine of cannabis care bumped against the unregulated and violent terrain of the illicit drug market. He had been robbed more than a dozen times in his home on Denver's west side, had recently gotten a gun and also talked of installing a steel door and gates.

"Ken was really fed up with the barrage of robberies and he told me it would never happen again," said Timothy Tipton, a friend and fellow medical marijuana supplier, who said Mr. Gorman showed him the gun about two months ago.

Some legal experts say Mr. Gorman's death could lead to a reconsideration of how medical marijuana is administered here and elsewhere. Providers are often left exposed and vulnerable because of the nation's conflicting drug laws, with marijuana use illegal under federal law but legalized for some medicinal purposes here and in 10 other states.

Since 1997, after the first medical marijuana law was passed in California, as many as 20 legal marijuana providers have been killed around the country, mostly in robberies, said Allen St. Pierre, the executive director of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or Norml, a nonprofit advocacy group in Washington.

Some in law enforcement, including Colorado's attorney general, John W. Suthers, say the Gorman killing illuminates more clearly than ever that crime and marijuana cannot be disentangled.

"Mr. Gorman showed that the law is abused and can be abused," said Nate Strauch, a spokesman for Mr. Suthers.

Many people in the medical marijuana supply system say the central risk comes down to the fact that they work in the shadows, where law enforcement officials are often either conflicted or hostile and crime is rampant.

At the Colorado Compassion Club, for instance, which opened last year as a storefront support center in Denver, the 200 marijuana patients served there go through as much as a pound of marijuana a day. The club grows as much as it can, said its founder, Thomas E. Lawrence, but must rely on buys on the illicit market for the rest, usually made by one or two caregivers who have volunteered.

Mr. Gorman's killing, legal experts say, has exposed the paradoxes and ambiguities about medical marijuana that most states have failed to grapple with.

The Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment, which administers the marijuana program, is not authorized, for example, to provide information about where the 1,100 patients who are certified under the program can obtain their drugs, according to the department's Web site.

The state also does not license marijuana providers, or inspect the quality of the drug that patients obtain.

Colorado's law allows patients with certain illnesses, as well their doctors and others who provide care, the right to possess, grow and transport marijuana.

But all those things remain illegal under federal law. And a chief deputy district attorney for Denver, Greg Long, said that anyone selling drugs illegally, even if the final recipient was legally entitled to possess them, could still technically be violating state laws too — though as a practical matter, Mr. Long said, prosecutors do not generally pursue cases in which the drug being sold is marijuana for certified medical use.

The portrait of Mr. Gorman is just as unclear. His friends say he was quixotic and selfless, a man uninterested in financial gain who tilted against the confining rules of society, especially the drug laws.

A merry prankster at a time when marijuana advocacy groups were becoming more adept at politics than protest, he had become an anachronism, acquaintances say, whose counterculture antics embarrassed and angered many people in the medical-advocacy and legal reform movements.

"I have gray hair on my head and I attribute some of it to Ken Gorman," Mr. St. Pierre of Norml said.

Some critics said Mr. Gorman was caught up in his own image as a rebel, thwarting even the rules about medical marijuana that could further the causes he espoused.

Just one week before his death, for example, the local CBS television news affiliate in Denver broadcast an investigative story in which a young station employee with a hidden camera captured Mr. Gorman happily explaining how to fake the medical card that would make a drug transaction appear legitimate.

The story prompted an uproar in medical marijuana circles, forcing Mr. Gorman to defend himself on a pro-marijuana Internet forum from attacks by people who said he had betrayed them by making medical marijuana look like a cover for old-fashioned drug-dealing.

And he had become an angry, fearful man, his friends and acquaintances said. Though he had served time in prison — five years for a felony drug conviction in the mid-1990s — and often seemed to scoff at the law, he had grown increasingly frustrated about being a crime victim himself.

The Denver police have revealed little about the murder investigation.

A spokesman, Sonny Jackson, said the police responded to reports of shots fired at Mr. Gorman's home around 7 p.m. on Feb. 17 and found Mr. Gorman with a gunshot wound to the chest. He died shortly thereafter.

DOJ_NMG_0139029

Mr. Jackson said that there had been an incident the previous night in Mr. Gorman's home; someone had been arrested and neighbors reported shots fired. But investigators said they did not believe that incident and the slaying were connected.

Colorado's medical marijuana law, enshrined in the state's Constitution by a statewide vote in 2000, protects people from prosecution under state law. Acquiring the drug illegally, however, puts those people in very dangerous company.

Mr. Gorman, his friends say, had no intermediary. The face that was famous on television as Colorado's most ebullient marijuana advocate was the same one making the buys out on the market.

"It's dangerous to help people," said Mr. Tipton, who lives in a suburb of Denver and said he had about 45 marijuana patients. "We're out there, exposed to abuse from patients, law enforcement, robberies — it's a long list."

Lawyers and medical marijuana advocates in California — which has the oldest and by far largest medical marijuana system in the nation, with about 100,000 licensed drug recipients and 200 dispensaries — say that robberies and violence against medical distributors, a problem in the earlier days of the system, have become much less frequent because of improved security.

But many robberies also often go unreported, said Dale Gieringer, the state coordinator for the California chapter of Norml.

"It usually gets hushed up," Mr. Gieringer said.

Mr. Gorman's home, still taped off by a police ribbon, has become a kind of shrine to the subculture he celebrated.

On one night a few days after the killing, a group of more than 20 people — young men and teenagers, mostly — sat around a bonfire in Mr. Gorman's front yard, passing marijuana joints and beer bottles as a Tupac Shakur song blared on a car stereo.

"He was the most compassionate, kind man I knew," said a young man who identified himself as Vuddah, as thick curls of smoke shrouded the group. "We want to keep this place open so that the patients can keep coming," he added. "That's what we're going to do.

"That's what Ken would have wanted," he continued. "To us, he was a medical marijuana freedom fighter."

US Cites Failure Of Countries In Drug Fight (AP)

By Matthew Lee, Associated Press

AP, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The United States said yesterday that top antiterror allies Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Colombia had fallen short in the war on drugs despite enhanced counter-narcotics efforts and it criticized perennial foes Iran, North Korea, and Venezuela for not cooperating.

The State Department also noted backsliding in some key Latin American nations such as Bolivia while it praised improved performances by Mexico and traditional Asian transshipment points China and Thailand, but slammed neighboring Burma for illicit drug production.

In its annual global survey of the drug war, the department said massive opium poppy production in Afghanistan, long the world's top producer of the main ingredient for heroin, continued to pose a major threat due to its links with groups such as the Taliban.

"Afghanistan's huge drug trade undercuts efforts to rebuild the economy and develop a strong democratic government based on the rule of law," the department said in the 2007 International Narcotic Control Strategy Report.

"There is strong evidence that narcotics trafficking is linked to the Taliban insurgency. These links between drug traffickers and antigovernment forces threaten regional stability," the department said.

It added that endemic "corruption" and prevailing "dangerous security conditions" were seriously hindering efforts to combat Afghan poppy production that shot up 59 percent to a record 5,644 tons from 2005 to 2006.

"More must be done," Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs Anne Patterson told reporters.

The report stressed that Afghan President Hamid Karzai remains committed to reducing the harvest but Patterson said that results remained "insufficient."

Across the border in Pakistan exists a major transit point for opiates and hashish, where Taliban and Al Qaeda operatives are also believed to operate, the State Department said. It said it believed the government there had launched several promising new antinarcotics initiatives.

Mexico Prevails As Drug War Ally (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139030

Several countries, including Mexico and Colombia, showed a willingness last year to confront global drug dealers, but Venezuela, Bolivia, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Iran and North Korea have fallen short in the war on drugs, a report said yesterday.

In its annual study of the international drug war, the State Department also said drug smugglers were hiding in the "shadows of an open society" to link themselves with sophisticated criminal and terrorist organizations to launder millions of dollars in illicit profits.

"As long as criminality remains in the underground of aliases, coded messages, false documents, bearer instruments and clandestine operations, it is often undetectable to even seasoned investigators," said Anne Patterson, assistant secretary for international narcotics and law enforcement affairs. "When criminal activity breaches this underground, it often provides leads and evidence authorities can use to unravel these cases."

According to the report:

·In Mexico, the Fox and Calderon administrations cracked down on traffickers and drug-related violence more than any previous Mexican governments -- seizing drugs, eradicating illegal crops, preventing chemical diversion and extraditing some of Mexico's most notorious traffickers. Although work is still to be done and Mexico remains the primary corridor for drugs entering the United States, the Bush administration said it was pleased with the country's "strong actions to address these problems."

·Colombia continued to attack the drug trade and terrorist organizations that profit from it, eradicating a record amount of coca last year. Though cultivation persists, aggressive eradication resulted in the destruction of what could have become billions of dollars of cocaine.

·Venezuela and Bolivia faltered last year, both failing to adhere to their obligations under international narcotics agreements or to cooperate with the United States. Venezuela is now a principal transit country for Andean cocaine, and Bolivia "experienced an erosion" of previous successes.

·Afghanistan's opium poppy cultivation increased by 59 percent, making last year's crop the largest on record. The country produced more than 90 percent of the world's opium and had the distinction of being the world's largest producer and trafficker of heroin. Pakistan, beset by rampant corruption, is a major transit point for opiates and hashish, where Taliban and al Qaeda operatives are also thought to operate.

The report also noted that Iran had sought to deal with a domestic drug consumption surge but has not enacted or enforced laws to decrease demand. The result, according to the report, has been "an epidemic of opiate abuse."

In Burma, opium production continued to fall, but its military rulers failed to meet international standards, and the nation remained the world's second-largest producer. Burmese rebel groups continued to be a major source of methamphetamine.

The report praised China and Thailand, which border Burma, for their efforts in stemming the illicit drug trade.

"We must continue to target the financial networks that allow criminals to reap their ill-gotten gains and terrorists to finance their activities," Miss Patterson said.

Report on Poppy (HT)

Hindustan Times, March 2, 2007

The US has praised India's good record on counter-narcotics, but is worried that an alarming increase in poppy cultivation in Afghanistan is helping Taliban terrorists fund attacks on US and NATO forces.

"The Indian government has a good record on this, but it's also a huge country with a very large industry, so to prevent diversion from the legitimate pharmaceutical industry is a challenge," a senior US official said on Thursday.

"India, of course, is the only legal producer of opium and we've worked closely with the Indian government. India has a good record, frankly, on counter-narcotics," said assistant secretary of state for international narcotics and law enforcement affairs Anne W Patterson.

India, she noted, has a very large, legitimate pharmaceutical industry. "We work very closely with them to prevent diversion from that. The Indian government is very committed to that," she said while the US government's 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategy Report.

Of particular worry in Afghanistan is the Taliban's involvement in the drug trade, Patterson said noting that cultivation of the opium poppy there increased by an "alarming" 59 percent, making the 2006 crop the largest on record.

Taliban leaders have publicly linked themselves to poppy cultivation, and drug profits now support elements of the Taliban and fund attacks on US and international troops in Afghanistan. The opium poppy is used to manufacture heroin, she said.

Patterson attributed much of the poppy problem in Afghanistan to the fact that the Afghan government "doesn't have control of [its] territory". Cultivation of opium poppies soared in 2006 in two Afghan provinces, Helmand and Kandahar, "because there is basically a lack of law enforcement and control", she said.

The resurgence of Afghan opium cultivation has increased the flow of heroin to Europe, Russia and the Near East, which "undermines those societies and the consolidation of democracy and security in Afghanistan", the report stated.

DOJ_NMG_0139031

Patterson praised neighbouring Iran's role in combating drug trafficking, despite a State Department report characterising the country as a "major transit route for opiates smuggled from Afghanistan", which eventually reach Western markets.

"They are playing a very positive role" in fighting the Afghan opium trade, Patterson said of Iran. "They have been very active along the border" with Afghanistan.

The Iranians view the opium trade as a "major social and law enforcement problem" and have been the "most aggressive" by far of Afghanistan's neighbours in interdicting the Afghan opium crop, said Patterson.

Apart from Afghanistan, the report cited Bolivia and Venezuela as being particular problems in the drug trade.

Turning to terrorist financing, the US official said money laundering had long been "intertwined" with the drug trade. But the global community had become more aware since the September 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States of "terrorists using underground systems to move money and transfer assets".

Focusing on money laundering "is one of the most valuable tools law enforcement has to combat international crime", the report said.

A focus on money laundering "can accomplish what many other law enforcement tools cannot" in attacking such threats as narcotics trafficking, alien smuggling, intellectual property theft, corruption and terrorism, it said.

Afghan Opium Output Reaches Record; Drug Trade Aids Taliban (BLOOM)

By Paul Tighe

Bloomberg, March 2, 2007

March 2 (Bloomberg) -- Afghanistan's opium production reached a record in 2006 and the drug trade is supporting the Taliban insurgency to overthrow the government of President Hamid Karzai, the U.S. State Department said.

The country produced 5,644 metric tons of opium compared with 4,475 metric tons in 2005, the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs said in a report. Opium is the base ingredient for heroin.

``There is direct evidence linking the insurgency in Afghanistan and narcotics," the bureau said. ``Traffickers provide weapons, funding and personnel to the Taliban in exchange for the protection of drug trade routes, poppy fields and members of their organizations."

The Taliban, ousted in the U.S.-led war on terrorism in 2001, increased their attacks last year mainly in southern and eastern provinces, prompting the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to expand its 35,000-strong force. Afghanistan produces more than 90 percent of the world's opium poppies and is the largest heroin producing and trafficking country, according to the bureau.

Areas under poppy cultivation increased 61 percent in 2006 to 172,000 hectares (424,840 acres) from 107,400 the previous year, according to the report. It estimates the country's illicit opium was worth $3.1 billion last year and represents about one- third of Afghanistan's licit and illicit gross domestic product.

Southern Provinces

Helmand province in southern Afghanistan, the center of the Taliban insurgency, is the country's most significant opium producer, responsible for 46 percent of the national poppy crop. Kandahar, Oruzgan and Farah provinces, also in the south, together produced 24 percent, while 12 of Afghanistan's 34 provinces were poppy-free in 2006, according to the report.

Links between the Taliban and drug traffickers are highlighted by the case of Haji Bashir Noorzai, the alleged leader of the largest trafficking organization in central and southwest Asia, who was arrested in the U.S. in 2005 and is awaiting trial, the bureau said.

His indictment alleges that he provided explosives, weapons and personnel to the Taliban in return for protection of poppy crops and trafficking routes. Noorzai was a former leader of a Taliban council, according to the report.

Drug-related corruption is also a problem within the Afghan government and is ``particularly pervasive at provincial and district government levels," it said.

National Conference

The Afghan Ministry of Counter Narcotics last year organized a national conference on combating the drug trade, the government's first effort to start a nationwide campaign. The plan didn't take effect until after the planting season for the 2006 crop.

``In order to make sustained progress in combating narcotics trafficking, the government of Afghanistan will need to continue to extend credible governance throughout Afghanistan's provinces and districts and demonstrate its ability to enforce the rules of law across the country," the bureau said. ``This will require international and political support over many years."

The unstable security, political and economic environments limit the ability of Karzai's administration to combat narcotics production and trade, it said.

DOJ_NMG_0139032

Fighting last year killed at least 4,000 Afghan civilians and dozens of NATO personnel. U.K. Defense Secretary Des Browne on Feb. 26 said Britain will add 1,400 soldiers to its contingent bringing its force to 7,700 service personnel.

US: Venezuelan Situation Favors Illicit Drug Traffic (EU)

El Universal, March 1, 2007

Venezuela, with "a rampant high level of corruption, weak judicial system and lack of international counternarcotics cooperation" is increasingly enabling a growing illicit drug transshipment industry, US authorities said Thursday.

This forms part of the conclusion of the 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategy Report, a document made public each year about international cooperation in the fight against drug traffic, news agency Efe reported.

The report states that according to officials from the US embassy in Caracas, Venezuelan security forces are involved in the drug traffic.

Also, the authors of the report claim that "because of the permissive and corrupt Venezuelan environment, and the success of Plan Colombia in neighboring Colombia, traffickers have set up operations to transship illicit drugs through Venezuela to the eastern Caribbean, Europe, Africa and the United States. Venezuelan traffickers have been arrested in the Netherlands, Spain, Ghana, the Dominican Republic, Mexico and other countries."

According to the report, Venezuela is one of the major drug transshipment countries in the Western hemisphere.

During the presentation of the report, Abelardo Arias, a director for Latin America of the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs, US Department of State, said that cooperation between Washington and Caracas is at the minimum level, adding that Venezuela refuses to sign any agreement of information exchange on drug traffic.

"Venezuela failed demonstrably to adhere to its obligations under international counternarcotics agreements and take the measures set forth in US law."

Report Looks At Cocaine Trade (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Venezuela has become a significant player in the flow of cocaine from Colombia to the USA by allowing drug smugglers to operate freely and making little effort to cooperate with U.S. anti-drug efforts, a State Department report said Thursday.

The number of flights from Venezuela suspected of ferrying Colombian cocaine to the Dominican Republic and Haiti — key transfer points for U.S.-bound shipments of the drug — increased 167% last year, State Department Assistant Secretary Anne Patterson said. She added that the leftist government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, a frequent critic of the United States, has allowed drug trafficking to flourish.

"Venezuela's permissive and corrupt environment led to more trafficking, fewer seizures and an increase in suspected drug flights (from Venezuela) over the past 12 months," Patterson said.

In 2006, the Department of Defense's Joint Interagency Task Force South documented 75 flights from Venezuela to the Dominican Republic and 46 flights into Haiti, says U.S. Coast Guard Rear Adm. Jeff Hathaway, who directs the task force.

"What we have seen emerging over the last 12 months is a virtual explosion of drug trafficking emanating from Venezuela," Hathaway said.

The task force gives information about suspected drug flights to the Venezuelan government, but it rarely acts on it, he said. "Venezuela is not making any attempt to stop the aircraft when they are being tipped off by the United States."

The Venezuelan Embassy did not respond to phone calls and e-mails requesting comment.

Patterson praised governments in Mexico and Colombia for aggressive counterdrug programs, but she said both countries continue to be major drug suppliers to the USA. In Bolivia, she said, the political will to counter drug trafficking has declined.

Recently elected Bolivian President Evo Morales has said the government would allow farmers to increase cultivation of coca to be used legally for flavorings and pharmaceuticals from 29,653 acres to 49,421 acres. The U.S. government contends that just 618 acres of coca cultivation would meet worldwide industrial demand.

The report also said Afghanistan's opium-poppy cultivation rose 59% last year, making the 2006 crop the largest ever. Patterson said profits from the opium trade help finance Taliban forces. The Afghan government does not control the Helmand and Kandahar provinces, where much of the opium is grown, she said.

Officials at the Afghan Embassy did not respond to a request for comment.

Report Slams Venezuela For Drug Trafficking (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139033

WASHINGTON - In its harshest assessment yet of drug trafficking in Venezuela, the State Department on Thursday said the country is turning into a haven for smugglers because of corruption and the government's refusal to cooperate with other nations.

The department's 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategies Report also expressed uneasiness over Bolivia's efforts to expand the cultivation of coca, the raw material used to make cocaine, and the State Department offered rare praise for Cuba for deporting a Colombian trafficker to Bogota.

It also praised three countries - Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico - that Bush will visit this month during a swing through Latin America, saying the three were trying to halt drug smuggling, if not succeeding.

The report also said that opium production hit a record high in Afghanistan last year and that the drug trade was undermining democracy there.

The report says Afghanistan produced a record 5,644 metric tons of opium in 2006, a 26 percent jump from the previous year. The State Department said there was "strong evidence" that drug trafficking was funding the Taliban insurgency.

"These links between drug traffickers and anti-government forces threaten regional stability," the report said.

Venezuela's leftwing President Hugo Chavez has long been at loggerheads with the Bush administration, which has accused him of everything from undermining democracies in the hemisphere to provoking an arms race - allegations denied by the Chavez government.

The report calls Venezuela "one of the principal drug-transit countries in the Western Hemisphere," with Colombian traffickers setting up shop there because the Chavez government is "permissive and corrupt."

Anne Patterson, the State Department's top anti-drug trafficking official, told reporters that suspected drug trafficking flights from Venezuela to Haiti and the Dominican Republic had soared by 167 percent last year.

More than 200 metric tons of cocaine transit through Venezuela every year, according to the report, which covers the entire world. Arrests are limited to small-time traffickers, and seizures within Venezuela dropped while Venezuelan shipments interdicted in other countries tripled.

The Venezuelan embassy in Washington declined to comment on the report, but in the past Chavez and several of his government's officials have denied any relaxation of its fight against illicit drugs.

The report praises Colombia, the world's top cocaine producer, as "completely committed" to the drug war. It calls Mexican efforts to combat traffickers last year as "unmatched" by any previous government there. About 90 percent of the cocaine in U.S. streets is believed to have come through the border with Mexico.

Guatemala is described in the report as "major drug-transit country" that made "substantial progress" in reforming the police's ability to combat drugs. The report, prepared weeks ago, made no mention, however, of the Feb. 19 murders of three Central American legislators in what Guatemala's President Oscar Berger said may have been a drug-related crime.

Four police officers arrested in the deaths, including the head of Guatemala's organized crime unit, were murdered days later in their cells at a prison outside Guatemala City. The assailants, who are still at large, passed through eight prison checkpoints unchallenged, officials said.

Patterson denied that the report picked on Venezuela because of Chavez's strident criticism of Bush.

"In contrast to the strong stands taken by the governments of Mexico and Colombia," Patterson said, "political will in Venezuela and Bolivia faltered last year."

She said Venezuela long had one of the strongest records in the hemisphere against trafficking. "And frankly, that's all stopped, for reasons that aren't entirely clear to me."

The Bush administration stepped up its criticism of Venezuela after Chavez ousted Drug Enforcement Administration agents from Venezuelan government facilities in late 2004, allegedly because they were spying. The two countries later negotiated an agreement to allow DEA agents to return, but Venezuela has so far refused to sign it, the report says.

In September of last year, the administration "de-certified" Venezuela as a helpful ally in the drug war and cut off aid and weapons shipments, among other sanctions.

Patterson praised Cuba for deporting alleged trafficker Luis Hernando Gomez-Bustamante to Colombia after holding him in prison for several months. He is expected to be extradited soon from Colombia to the United States.

"There is not a major trafficking issue through Cuba," she added. The Cuban government has long maintained that it is carrying on a strong fight against illicit drugs, despite past U.S. allegations that government officials there were involved in protecting foreign traffickers.

Bolivia's leftist President Evo Morales wants to increase the acreage of legally grown coca while fighting the illegal trade in cocaine. The Bush administration believes more coca will lead to more cocaine and is to decide by March 15 if Bolivia is doing enough to stop drug trafficking.

Bolivia's ambassador to the United States, Gustavo Guzman, described the report as "serene and balanced."

Mail Bomb Suspect Eludes, Baffles Cops (FREEP/AP)

By Heather Hollingsworth, Associated Press

Detroit Free Press, March 2, 2007

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- He calls himself the Bishop. Exactly why is just one of the many mysteries surrounding the increasingly menacing figure.

The man -- and investigators believe they are dealing with a man -- is suspected of sending at least a half-dozen threatening letters to financial institutions over the past 18 months and mailing two dud pipe bombs that arrived a day apart in Kansas City and Chicago in January.

In his letters, the Bishop has demanded that financial companies move the prices of certain stocks to certain levels, often $6.66 -- an apparent reference to the Antichrist, said corporate counterterrorism expert Fred Burton.

Burton, whose security firm in Austin, Texas, has been hired by financial companies to find the Bishop, said the pipe bombs were assembled with crucial components deliberately left out, in what was probably a warning. Next time, Burton said, the bombs could be real.

But catching the Bishop and figuring out exactly what his grudge is could require help from the public, Burton said.

The Bishop, like the Unabomber, is probably mentally ill, highly intelligent and a loner, Burton said.

Postal inspectors are offering a reward of up to $100,000 for information. The investigation also includes the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and local police.

Spokesmen for the FBI and the Postal Inspection Service would not comment in any detail on the investigation.

A sketch released Tuesday by postal authorities depicts him in his 30s or early 40s.

The pipe bombs, sent in white cardboard boxes, carried the same return address in Streamwood, Ill., and were postmarked Jan. 26 from Rolling Meadows, Ill. The sketch is based on the description of a witness who saw a suspicious-looking man in the post office there that day.

One package arrived Jan. 31 at American Century Investments' Kansas City mail center, a few blocks from company headquarters. A day later, a similar one was found at a business in a Chicago skyscraper.

Man Takes Plea Bargain In Bomb Case (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), March 2, 2007

A Flomaton man originally accused of making bombs has accepted a plea bargain, admitting to a misdemeanor.

Gregory Wendell Nichols pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Mobile on Wednesday to improper storage of explosives. He faces a maximum of one year's incarceration, but prosecutors have agreed to recommend probation. U.S. Magistrate Judge Bert Milling Jr. set sentencing for March 23.

A jury in January failed to reach a verdict in Nichols' case, and both sides were preparing to retry it this month. Jury selection had been scheduled for Monday.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis and Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden struck a deal prior to Wednesday's hastily called hearing. Neither could be reached for comment Thursday.

As recently as Tuesday, both lawyers expressed confidence about winning the second round.

Agents for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5 after getting a tip. Nichols permitted the agents to search his white Ford Ranger pickup truck, and they reported finding five homemade explosive devices.

Nichols admitted that he made the devices using spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He told jurors last month that he packed the cylindrical canisters -- which were about 2 inches long -- with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape and attached a firecracker fuse.

But Nichols insisted the devices were firecrackers, not bombs. He told jurors that he made them so that he and his fiancée could drop them into a river. He said he never intended to hurt anyone.

Prosecutors argued that Nichols' intent was irrelevant. The devices were themselves dangerous and illegal. They offered testimony from a ballistics expert who conducted tests he said proved the devices were dangerous.

A defense expert witness countered that the devices were weak explosives.

IMMIGRATION:

Bipartisan Opinions Sought On Immigration (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Far from being secretive, the top senator drafting the major Senate immigration bill this year says he has invited a host of senators to help out and has kept the Bush administration in the loop the entire time, despite accusations to the contrary.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and chairman of the immigration subcommittee, has held several meetings with lawmakers, including a recent one with top Republican and Democratic senators on the issue. He also talked with President Bush in January and last week spoke with White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten about the bill, Mr. Kennedy's office says.

"I look forward to introducing a comprehensive immigration reform bill with Sen. John McCain and our House colleagues in the coming weeks and continuing to work with the bipartisan coalition behind the legislation that passed the Senate last year," Mr. Kennedy said yesterday.

On Wednesday, Sen. Arlen Specter, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee, used the committee's first immigration hearing of the year to publicly accuse Mr. Kennedy of leaving him and his staff out of the process.

"I have been concerned about reading what is happening behind the scenes in the newspapers," Mr. Specter said. He called his comment a "word of caution" to Mr. Kennedy and said he needs to cooperate if he hopes to earn Republican support.

Democrats will need that Republican support to pass a bill in the Senate.

Mr. Kennedy is drafting a new measure with Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, and two House members: Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, and Rep. Luis V. Gutierrez, Illinois Democrat.

Mr. Kennedy's office says they are reaching out to the bipartisan coalition that helped pass a broad bill, 62-36, in the Senate last year. That bill offered a path to citizenship to most illegal aliens and created a new program for immigrant workers to come in the future.

House Republican leaders called it an amnesty and refused to consider it, instead forcing through a measure to build hundreds of miles of two-tier fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

In drafting the new bill, Mr. Kennedy's office said staffers are in regular contact with other offices, and have had three meetings with White House staff to go over bill details. In addition, Mr. Kennedy and Mr. McCain had a meeting Feb. 15 that included Mr. Specter and the Senate's Hispanic members: Sens. Mel Martinez, Florida Republican, Ken Salazar, Colorado Democrat and Robert Menendez, New Jersey Democrat.

Six other senators, all of whom supported last year's bill, were invited but did not attend: Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican; Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent; Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat and Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and the chairman of the full Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Kennedy's spokeswoman, Laura Capps, said the senators did discuss specific provisions at the recent meeting. She also said the sponsors plan to circulate a draft before they officially introduce a bill, but said the final version will be the work of the four chief sponsors.

Yesterday, though, Mr. Specter repeated his accusation.

"We have not been a party to the drafting of the bill. It's surprising and disquieting," he said. He also said he tried to work in a bipartisan way when he was chairman of the Judiciary Committee last year to try to get a bill done.

But one staffer involved in the negotiations said Mr. Specter had "zero consultation" last year before he, as chairman of the committee, drafted his own bill and dropped it on the committee.

"It's completely hypocritical," the staffer said.

The Path To Citizenship (NYT)

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

On Wednesday, Congress took its first crack at immigration reform since the great nothing of 2006. The Senate Judiciary Committee invited Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez to testify on the issue. With a new Congress and a new comprehensive immigration bill expected to be introduced in the Senate within days, the hearing could have been the first spark of a rejuvenated campaign by an alliance of Congressional Democrats, moderate Republicans and the Bush administration to finally solve a problem that has festered for too long.

It wasn't. That's because both Mr. Chertoff and Mr. Gutierrez slunk away from a central pillar of comprehensive reform: a path to citizenship that would give illegal immigrants — the ones who wait and prove they deserve it — the chance to participate fully and proudly in the life of this country.

Polls show that most Americans would let illegal immigrants get right with the law and become Americans, too, if they have clean records, learn English and pay back taxes and fines. Weighed against keeping the shadowy status quo or deporting 12 million people, a citizenship path strikes them as a proper blend of justice and common sense. Last year's stalled Senate bill took this approach, and it will surely be central to any new legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0139036

But the idea sticks in the craws of the members of a vocal, mostly Republican faction that wants every door to opportunity for illegal immigrants shut and locked, except the one marked "guest workers." Those they would keep because they don't mind having an underclass of docile, ill-paid foreigners who do America's dirtiest jobs and then go home.

There is a place for some temporary workers in the American economy. But such programs are highly prone to abuse and are not a solution for the vast numbers of illegal immigrants already here.

Mr. Gutierrez and Mr. Chertoff enthusiastically talked up guest-worker programs on Wednesday, but pointedly left citizenship off the table. They could have been talking tactically, working at President Bush's behest to soothe the passions of skeptical Republicans. But there must be a limit to the accommodations given to anti-amnesty ideologues. If Mr. Bush has the stomach to fight for the real reform he says he wants, he is hiding it well.

Mr. Bush said nothing about a path to citizenship in his State of the Union address in January. If he is too weakened to stand up for comprehensive reform, then Democrats and Republicans in Congress need to unite and do it for him.

Colorado's Immigration Policy Backfires (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

IN THE 2004 SATIRICAL film "A Day Without a Mexican," California wakes up to discover that its Latinos have mysteriously vanished, and a society deeply reliant on migrant labor starts to crumble. Life is imitating art in Colorado. After passing what might be the nation's toughest anti-immigrant laws, the state is having its beleaguered day with fewer immigrants.

With no one left to pick them, crops are rotting in the fields, and the construction industry and other businesses that rely on low-skilled labor are experiencing a worker shortage. The situation is so bad for the state's growers that officials plan to send prison inmates out to harvest crops. How very 19th century.

Immigrants are fleeing Colorado because of harsh laws passed during a special session of the Legislature last summer that require state identification for government services and allow police to check suspects' immigration status. The ID laws have raised the ire even of many native-born people, who complain about hassles for those trying to get a driver's license.

If chasing away immigrants has caused problems in Colorado, imagine the economic chaos it would bring to California, where immigrants make up about a third of the workforce and the agriculture industry dwarfs Colorado's. The Rocky Mountain blues are also demonstrating that, contrary to nativist rhetoric, there really are jobs that Americans won't do. In Pueblo, Colo., desperate farmers are offering up to $9.60 an hour for pickers — well in excess of the federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour and more than they have paid migrants in the past — but there are few takers.

Turning prisoners into farmers is no solution. People aren't sentenced to hard labor anymore, so only volunteers are available for prison work programs. And not too many inmates will do backbreaking field work for 60 cents a day — the going rate for prisoners under Colorado's pilot program.

Colorado is learning a painful lesson about the foolishness of a piecemeal, state-by-state response to illegal immigration and about the economic effect of a strictly punitive approach. The only solution with a chance of working is comprehensive federal legislation that would document immigrants already in this country as guest workers and provide them with a path to citizenship, as well as tightening border security. Election-year politics torpedoed President Bush's efforts to pass such reforms last year. To see the result of the opposite approach, look no further than Pueblo.

TAX:

SEC Scrutinises Google's Tax Methods (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Google's method of accounting for income taxes has come under the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission, the first time since its 2004 initial public offering that it has attracted the attention of securities regulators.

The internet search company disclosed the informal inquiry in its latest 10K annual report, which was filed on Thursday. The SEC had first approached it for information about its tax accounting in March last year, the company said, leading to an exchange of letters that is still ongoing.

The SEC's initial approach came just weeks after Google had surprised Wall Street with the news that its tax rate had climbed unexpectedly in the final quarter of 2005. That, in turn, dented its profits, contributing to a slide in its share price that persisted for much of last year. It took nine months for Google's shares finally to climb decisively back above their level of early January.

DOJ_NMG_0139037

Google blamed the high tax charge on a shift in its business mix, which had seen more of its investment spending move to faster-growing international markets and away from the US. As a result, a higher proportion of its profits were attributed to its operations in its domestic market, where it generally faces a higher tax rate than elsewhere.

The extent of the swing in the company's tax liabilities took investors by surprise, particularly since it was considerably sharper than Google's own forecasts had indicated just weeks before.

The SEC's inquiry into Google's tax accounting, contained in a series of four comment letters to the company, marks the first public sign of the agency's interest in the company since its market debut. An extensive interview with the company's founders in Playboy magazine, published during the "quiet period" ahead of its IPO, was one of a number of events that delayed the share sale for some months.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Army Fires Commander Of Walter Reed (WP)

By Steve Vogel And William Branigin

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The commander of Walter Reed Army Medical Center was fired yesterday after the Army said it had lost trust and confidence in his leadership in the wake of a scandal over outpatient treatment of wounded troops at the Northwest Washington hospital complex.

Army Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who assumed command of Walter Reed in August, will be temporarily replaced by Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley. But the appointment of Kiley, who had earlier been the facility's commander, surprised some Defense Department officials because soldiers, their families and veterans' advocates have complained that he had long been aware of problems at Walter Reed and did nothing to improve its outpatient care.

The action came 10 days after a Washington Post series exposed the squalid living conditions for some outpatient soldiers at Walter Reed and bureaucratic problems that prevented many from getting the care they need.

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said in a statement. "When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

A senior Defense Department official said Gates had demanded quick action to show that the Pentagon was serious about improvements at Walter Reed. But the official said that Gates was not involved in the appointment of Kiley.

Now surgeon general of the Army and commander of the U.S. Army Medical Command, Kiley will take over temporarily as commander of Walter Reed "until a general officer is selected for this important leadership position," the Army said in a statement.

Kiley was commander at Walter Reed until 2004. He has called the Post stories a "one-sided representation" of conditions at the facility. "While we have some issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure at Walter Reed," he said.

Weightman, an easygoing, open Army leader, is well respected in the military medical community and well liked among the staff at Walter Reed. He took command in August and instituted some changes to improve outpatient care. The defense official said his firing and replacement by Kiley are likely to be demoralizing to the staff at the medical center.

The Army is already cracking down on some staff members after the reports of poor care. A number of soldiers have been reassigned from their duties at Walter Reed, including a captain and several sergeants, according to an Army official. More than 100 soldiers will arrive at Walter Reed later this month to permanently reinforce the medical brigade responsible for overseeing outpatient care.

Yesterday, an independent review panel appointed by Gates to investigate outpatient care at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda held its first meeting at the Pentagon.

The group will "identify any critical shortcomings and opportunities to improve the rehabilitative care, administrative processes, and quality of life for injured and sick members of the armed forces" at Walter Reed and -- though there have been no complaints of poor care there -- at the Navy hospital, said William Winkenwerder Jr., assistant secretary of defense for health affairs.

The Army said the decision to relieve Weightman was made Wednesday after several days of consideration. Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey consulted with Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, and Gen. Richard A. Cody, the vice chief of staff, according to Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0139038

"Maj. Gen. Weightman was informed . . . that the senior Army leadership had lost trust and confidence in the commander's leadership abilities to address needed solutions for soldier-outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center," the Army statement said.

Weightman, a West Point graduate, served with the 82nd Airborne Division during the invasion of Panama and the Persian Gulf War. During the early stages of the Iraq war, he served as command surgeon for coalition land forces. As commander of Walter Reed, Weightman also headed the North Atlantic Regional Medical Command.

Last Friday, Weightman published an open letter in the hospital newspaper responding to the Post series, "The Other Walter Reed," disputing its criticisms.

"First and foremost, I want to assure all the staff that I do not believe that there is the 'other' Walter Reed," Weightman wrote. "I firmly believe that we deliver the same level of world-class healthcare to all our patients and their families, regardless of whether they are inpatients or outpatients."

Shortly after noon yesterday, Weightman sent out an e-mail to the entire Walter Reed garrison announcing his relief. "I am confident that you will continue to do a great job . . .," he wrote. "You're a great team and I have been honored to work with you."

Chief Of Walter Reed Hospital Fired Over Troop Treatment (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

Poor outpatient care for soldiers injured in Iraq and Afghanistan is cited.

The general in charge of the Walter Reed Army Medical Center was stripped of his command Thursday after revelations that wounded soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan were receiving slipshod outpatient treatment at the prestigious facility.

Senior Army officials said they had "lost trust and confidence" in Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who led the medical center for six months, after a series of articles in the Washington Post.

The stories detailed the substandard facilities and confusing bureaucracy that wounded troops faced once they were released from their initial treatment.

Weightman acknowledged the problems in interviews after the shortcomings were disclosed, saying the center's outpatient system was overwhelmed by the unexpectedly high number of wounded soldiers returning from war.

But he said that most of the problems predated his tenure, and that he had spent most of his time overseeing an increase in case workers and military officers who handled outpatient services.

Veterans groups welcomed Weightman's dismissal, but noted that the officer chosen to replace him on an interim basis — Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the head of all Army medical programs — was Weightman's predecessor at Walter Reed and that he might be responsible for some of the hospital's problems.

"It's good to see someone held accountable," said Paul Rieckhoff, executive director of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America. "But you can't just drop one person and make him the scapegoat."

One military official said the Army was continuing to examine Kiley's oversight of Walter Reed to determine whether he knew of the problems in the outpatient facilities.

"Those questions are being looked at," said the official, who spoke on condition on anonymity. "Is this it? We don't know. Potentially, there could be other heads that roll."

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey, meeting with Pentagon reporters before announcing Weightman's dismissal, declined to answer questions about the Walter Reed investigation. His spokesman told reporters that any discussion about the medical center's problems was "off the table."

In a statement, the Army said Harvey had set up an "action plan" to find any additional shortcomings.

"We'll fix as we go; we'll fix as we find things wrong," Harvey said in the statement.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates endorsed Harvey's move.

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," Gates said in a statement.

"When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

White House spokesman Scott M. Stanzel, traveling with President Bush in the Gulf Coast, praised the decision.

"We agree with the Army's decision to make a change at Walter Reed," he said. "Our returning servicemen and women deserve to receive the best treatment possible."

The Army secretary's action was designed to send a message about how seriously the Pentagon took the problems at Walter Reed. Although the Navy has routinely dismissed senior commanders because of accidents, it is rare for an Army general to be relieved of command.

"The decision to do this is not taken nonchalantly; the results are final," the military official said. "It is career-ending."

In addition to Weightman, a captain and four noncommissioned officers were relieved of duty, military officials said.

Lawmakers in Washington applauded the move, saying it marked a change from previous Pentagon practice, including its response to prisoner abuse scandals.

"This step was decisive," said Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.). "We can look back over the last several years for incidents, including Abu Ghraib, where senior commanders were not held accountable properly."

Last week, Gates announced the formation of an independent commission to investigate problems at Walter Reed and to find out if similar issues existed at other medical facilities. Commission members, who met for the first time Thursday at the Pentagon, will report to Gates by mid-April.

The problems at Walter Reed, first reported in the Post articles last month, are found mainly in the outpatient treatment of soldiers who have left Walter Reed's hospital, which has received almost universal praise for saving the lives of troops who would have died from similar injuries in previous conflicts.

In one outpatient housing facility at Walter Reed, the Post detailed a building full of mold and insects.

The newspaper also alleged that poor outpatient oversight resulted in wounded soldiers who slipped through medical and bureaucratic cracks.

When the reports first surfaced, Weightman acknowledged that the system had been overwhelmed for two years, when the number of outpatients peaked at 872 from a prewar level of about 100. But he insisted that, since taking command, he had ramped up the number of case workers and military officers responsible for overseeing outpatients.

Weightman, a family physician by training, is a graduate of the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. He served in the Army as an infantry officer for five years before going to medical school.

He was the chief medical officer for the Pentagon during the buildup to the war in Iraq and was in charge of all medical planning until the end of large-scale operations in May 2003.

peter.spiegel@latimes.com

Times staff writer Julian E. Barnes contributed to this report.

Army Removes Chief Of Walter Reed Hospital (USAT/AP)

By Robert Burns

USA Today, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Army on Thursday fired the general in charge of Walter Reed Army Medical Center, saying he was the wrong person to fix embarrassing failures in the treatment of wounded soldiers that have soiled the institution's reputation as a first-class hospital.

Less than a week after Defense Secretary Robert Gates visited Walter Reed and said those responsible would be "held accountable," the Army announced it had relieved Maj. Gen. George Weightman of command. He is a physician who had headed the hospital for only six months.

In a brief announcement, the Army said service leaders had "lost trust and confidence" in Weightman's leadership abilities "to address needed solutions for soldier outpatient care." It said the decision to fire him was made by Army Secretary Francis Harvey.

The Army and the Defense Department began investigations after The Washington Post published stories last week that documented problems in soldiers' housing and in the medical bureaucracy at Walter Reed, which has been called the Army's premier caregiver for soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The problems at Walter Reed pertain not to the quality of medical care for wounded soldiers but rather to the treatment of those who are well enough to be outpatients, living in Army housing at Walter Reed. One building was singled out in the Post reports as being in bad repair, including having mold on interior walls.

Gates issued a brief statement Thursday endorsing Harvey's action against Weightman.

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," Gates said. "When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

In an interview with several reporters two days before the first Post story was published, Weightman acknowledged shortcomings at Walter Reed but also said the problems were magnified because of the facility's location in the nation's capital. "We're a fishbowl," he said, adding that it's easier for complaining patients and families to attract Congress' attention.

General Is Fired Over Conditions At Walter Reed (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — The two-star general in charge of Walter Reed Army Medical Center was relieved of command on Thursday, following disclosures that wounded soldiers being treated as outpatients there were living in dilapidated quarters and enduring long waits for treatment.

The officer, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, a physician and a graduate of West Point, was fired because Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey "had lost trust and confidence" in his ability to make improvements in outpatient care at Walter Reed, the Army said in a brief statement.

The revelations about conditions at the hospital, one of the Army's best-known and busiest centers for treating soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan, have embarrassed the Army and prompted two investigations, several Congressional inquiries and a rush to clean up the accommodations for outpatients, where residents lived with mold on the walls, stained carpets and other problems.

A series of disclosures published prominently in The Washington Post about the living conditions, the red tape that ensnarled treatment, and other serious problems have challenged the notion promoted for years by the Army — especially since the war in Iraq — that wounded soldiers receive unparalleled care at Walter Reed.

Army officials have defended the treatment provided to most patients at Walter Reed, especially the most serious cases, those admitted to inpatient wards on the hospital's campus a few miles from the center of Washington.

But they have acknowledged that the large number of wounded from Iraq and Afghanistan, currently around 650 patients, has taxed doctors, nurses and other care providers and forced them to rely more heavily on overflow facilities to house outpatients who must remain near the hospital for treatment.

Officials refused to provide the specific reasons for General Weightman's firing.

The Army has admitted in recent weeks that the system it uses to decide whether wounded soldiers who have been moved to outpatient status will be able to return to active duty often takes too long and has promised to change the system. At Walter Reed the process has taken an average of over 200 days, a source of frustration to soldiers and families who are awaiting decisions about what benefits they will receive if they retire.

Treatment of wounded soldiers has also been spotlighted recently in a documentary recounting the treatment received by the ABC News anchorman Bob Woodruff, who was wounded in Iraq last year. Mr. Woodruff contrasted his care with that of soldiers, finding that Veterans Administration regional medical centers provide retired soldiers with good care but that local V.A. hospitals are less skilled at dealing with complex problems like traumatic brain injuries.

Mr. Harvey told reporters Thursday that the Army was also examining conditions at other medical facilities, both in the United States and abroad. "We'll fix as we find things wrong," he said.

Paralleling the Army effort, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates appointed a panel last week to examine conditions at Walter Reed and other Defense Department hospitals it chooses, including the Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md.

Mr. Gates endorsed the decision to relieve General Weightman in a statement Thursday.

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," he said. "When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

Mr. Gates had signaled earlier, after a visit to Walter Reed, that senior officials would probably be relieved of command.

A Pentagon official said that, in addition to General Weightman, a captain, two noncommissioned officers, and an enlisted soldier involved in outpatient treatment were being reassigned. He said he could not provide further information because of Defense Department confidentiality rules.

General Weightman assumed command of the North Atlantic Regional Medical Command and Walter Reed Army Medical Center on August 25, 2006. He oversees medical facilities in seven other states in addition to Walter Reed and is one of the most senior officers to be relieved in connection with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. He could not be reached for comment.

The Army said that command of Walter Reed would be taken over temporarily by Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the Army's top medical officer.

A 1973 graduate of the United States Military Academy, General Kiley received a medical degree in 1982 from the University of Vermont and has held a series of medical commands in the past two decades, including "land component command surgeon" during the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

In comments to reporters on Feb. 16, just before the first of a series of articles was published by The Post, General Weightman conceded that there were problems with outpatient care at Walter Reed, but said that improvements were being made.

"The family members get a little frustrated because, I mean, we are really disrupting their lives," The Associated Press quoted him as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0139041

In the last year, General Weightman said, Walter Reed had increased to 17 from 4 the number of caseworkers charged with helping outpatients with the paperwork and other requirements of the patient disability evaluation system, which determines whether soldiers can remain in the military or retire with full benefits.

He said that the process often took months or years at Walter Reed because the hospital handled some of the most complex medical cases, involving head trauma and other conditions that made gauging recovery difficult.

Outpatients at Walter Reed have received initial treatment but require further care or rehabilitation before retiring from the armed forces or returning to active duty.

Addressing reports that recovering soldiers were asked to attend daily inspection, even when under medication, Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman, said that there would be periodic inspections in the outpatient facilities. Mr. Boyce added that soldiers who are able were asked to attend a daily morning meeting where treatment options and other information were discussed but that the sessions were not inspections.

Mr. Boyce said the worst conditions in the outpatient residences had been corrected but added the Army was planning to make more repairs, like replacing a faulty heating and air-conditioning system that was the cause of the mold on the walls.

Head Of US Military Hospital Dismissed (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The Pentagon on Thursday dismissed the head of Walter Reed military hospital for providing abysmal living conditions for wounded soldiers returning home from Iraq and Afghanistan.

Robert Gates, US defence secretary, relieved Major General George Weightman as commander of the military facility following a recent Washington Post investigation, which revealed that many soldiers were housed in sub-standard, rodent-infested housing, some were being refused disability benefits, while others with drug and alcohol problems were not receiving adequate care.

"The care and welfare of our wounded men and women in uniform demand the highest standard of excellence and commitment that we can muster as a government," Mr Gates said yesterday. "When this standard is not met, I will insist on swift and direct corrective action and, where appropriate, accountability up the chain of command."

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have claimed the lives of 3,525 US troops. But the number of non-fatal casualties is far higher, almost 25,000. More than 11,000 of the wounded soldiers have not returned to the battlefield.

Military analysts say the ratio of soldiers wounded to killed in Iraq and Afghanistan – at about 7:1 – is much higher than for previous conflicts. They attribute the increase to several factors, including improvements in body and vehicle armour, and the fact that the military has better medical facilities in conflict zones. The military has also increased the speed with which it can transfer injured soldiers back to hospitals in the US.

The Pentagon has been quick to condemn the conditions at Walter Reed, which were revealed as President George W. Bush attempts to shore up moribund support for his military "surge" in Iraq. A recent ABC News/Washington Post poll showed that public support for the conflict in Iraq continues to slide. A total of 67 per cent of respondents disapprove of Mr Bush's handling of Iraq, while another 67 per cent oppose the surge of 21,500 troops.

The Walter Reed scandal has generated bi-partisan criticism from lawmakers who have in recent weeks been more busy debating the merits of the surge.

"Our nation has a duty to honour and support those who have served and sacrificed so much in the defence of our nation," said Hillary Clinton, the New York Democratic senator who is running for president in 2008. "Yet these recent news reports indicate that for nearly four years since the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq began, not enough has been done to assist these courageous men and women in recovering from the wounds of battle." The Pentagon has appointed Lieutenant General Kevin Kiley, the army surgeon-general, as temporary commander of Walter Reed.

The Washington Post on Thursday reported that Lt Gen Kiley was warned as early as 2003 of problems in the hospital. Senator Barack Obama, another Democratic presidential hopeful, on Thursday accused the administration of underestimating the resources needed to support veterans of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

The response from the Pentagon stands in contrast to the aftermath of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Donald Rumsfeld, the former secretary of defence, came under criticism for not firing any senior officers over the scandal which tainted the US image worldwide.

Freshman Senator Takes Lead On Hot Controversy (MCT)

By David Goldstein

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139042

WASHINGTON - Sens. Claire McCaskill and Barack Obama led the charge this week on one of the hottest war-related controversies since Abu Ghraib.

They introduced legislation that would ensure that wounded soldiers are housed in clean conditions, have quick access to care and face an easier time claiming their disability benefits.

Their bill resulted from recent stories in The Washington Post about outpatients at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, one of the nation's premier military hospitals, who lived in squalor even as they battled the military bureaucracy for their benefits.

"This is about a system that is not trying to make it easy for the wounded to get what they deserve," McCaskill said during a news conference Thursday with Obama, an Illinois Democrat.

How did McCaskill, a freshman Democratic senator from Missouri who's been on Capitol Hill barely long enough for a cup of coffee, seize the spotlight on such a highly charged issue? And with Obama no less, a megawatt celebrity candidate for president who draws attention like wool draws lint.

This is the latest in an occasional series examining how novice McCaskill tries to translate the hopes of voters who sent her to Washington into becoming an effective operator in Congress. She's climbing a learning curve.

McCaskill didn't get a single question at their news conference

"He uses most of the oxygen," she said, laughing. "But one of the reasons I'm here is that he agreed to do it. I'm the last to complain about all the clicks being for him. The guy moves his hand and 1,000 shutters go off."

Their partnership started Presidents Day weekend.

Early word that an issue was brewing led Obama's staff initially to assume that it involved the Department of Veterans Affairs. Obama serves on the Senate Committee on Veterans Affairs, so the issue seemed squarely in his wheelhouse.

It was actually more in McCaskill's. She serves on the Senate Armed Services Committee, and the Army runs Walter Reed, which treats active-duty soldiers.

On reading the newspaper reports, "I felt sick," McCaskill said.

"Somewhere along the line, someone saw this and said to themselves, `We're not supposed to complain.' Any fresh set of eyes looking at rotting ceilings and peeling mold, and realizing our battle-weary men and women are being forced into those circumstances would say, `Whoa. This is wrong.' Somebody ought to have pounded the table somewhere."

She decided that she would. She directed her staff to collect information about the problems, which the online magazine Salon first reported more than a year ago, and how she could help fix them.

In the Senate hierarchy, McCaskill knows her place: fourth from the bottom in seniority. She figured that more senior colleagues would wade quickly into the controversy. The outrage level was blinking red, after all. Still, there was no harm in being prepared.

When McCaskill and Obama aides spoke that Sunday and realized that their bosses had the same idea, a flurry of e-mails and phone calls ensued over the next 24 hours.

"Next thing I know," McCaskill said, "I got a call ... (reporting that) `Obama's office will drop a bill the first of the week. Do you want to work with him?' I'm beginning to learn this culture of the staff and how active and how on top of it they are."

About 8 o'clock Presidents Day evening, the two staffs posted a heads-up to their colleagues in other Senate Democratic offices that McCaskill and Obama planned to sponsor a bill to fix the problems at Walter Reed.

McCaskill was at a disadvantage. Obama had three aides who work on veterans' issues and knew the problems that wounded soldiers face. McCaskill was still gearing up. Until recently she'd had only one legislative assistant to handle her entire portfolio of issues involving the military, homeland security, commerce and Indian affairs.

She'd since hired more, and by chance it was the first week on the job for her new military expert, a former infantry captain who'd helped invade Iraq. He toured Walter Reed with other Senate aides.

This week, McCaskill and her top aides gathered in her small, temporary office to prep her to tour Walter Reed on Wednesday. A key question to the hospital brass would be: In light of the problems, where's the accountability going to be in the senior chain of command?

McCaskill was cynical: "It's going to be like the prison," she told them, referring to the scandal over Abu Ghraib, a U.S. military prison in Baghdad where Iraqi prisoners were tortured. "The guys at the bottom will be held accountable and the guys at the top will not."

After her tour, she said most of the top officials she'd met recognized how steep a climb they face to restore trust. But some "seemed very closed-minded and defensive," she said. "One bragged this process has to be dispassionate, which seems to me to be oxymoronic."

Her bill with Obama has begun to draw bipartisan support. Hearings on Walter Reed will start next week.

DOJ_NMG_0139043

It's pretty heady stuff for a senator who's just a few months removed from the state capital where she'd been the state auditor. She just might make a difference.

"Introducing legislation is not anything exceptional," said Ross K. Baker, an expert on the Senate at Rutgers University. "What is exceptional is if it eventually improves the conditions at Walter Reed. She would be in a charmed circle. Very few freshmen are able to author a major piece of legislation."

Not 'A Good-News Story' (WP)

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

YESTERDAY THE Post reported that Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley heard years ago from a veterans advocate and even a member of Congress that outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center was distressingly squalid and disorganized. That commander proceeded to do little, even though he lives across the street from the outpatient facilities in a spacious Georgian house. Also yesterday, the Army announced that Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, the head of Walter Reed since August, had been relieved of his command. His temporary replacement? None other than Gen. Kiley.

Here's where the story stops making sense. Much of The Post's article detailed the abuse by omission that Gen. Kiley, not Gen. Weightman, committed, first as head of Walter Reed, then in his current post as Army surgeon general. Gen. Weightman, who very well might deserve his disgrace, has commanded Walter Reed for only half a year, while Gen. Kiley, now back in charge of Walter Reed, headed the hospital and its outpatient facilities for two years and has led the Army's medical command since. Rep. C.W. Bill Young (R-Fla.) and his wife say they repeatedly told Gen. Kiley about unhealthful conditions in outpatient facilities.

While Gen. Kiley was ignoring Walter Reed's outpatients, he was assuring Congress that he was doing just the opposite. A staffer for Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) told us yesterday that Gen. Kiley told the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform in 2005 that the performance of the medical holdover program, which covers 69 of the 76 residents of Building 18, "is a good-news story." In response to questions Mr. Davis submitted, Gen. Kiley stated, "the Army Surgeon General has made their care the medical treatment facilities' top priority." At best, Gen. Kiley was ignorant of the conditions at Walter Reed.

We are glad that the Army is finally taking the issue of outpatient care seriously enough to effectively end the career of a major general for presiding over the disgraceful condition of Building 18. But the evidence compiled so far suggests that Gen. Kiley has been more complicit in the scandalous neglect of Walter Reed's outpatient facilities for longer than Gen. Weightman has been. It also indicates that the Army's reshuffle is really about projecting the appearance of accountability, not punishing those most responsible. As Mr. Young said yesterday of Gen. Weightman, "I don't know him. But I know he's the fall guy."

Rice Names Critic Of Iraq Policy To Counselor's Post (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has tapped Eliot A. Cohen, a prominent writer on national security strategy and an outspoken critic of the administration's postwar occupation of Iraq, as her counselor, State Department officials said yesterday.

Cohen would replace Philip D. Zelikow, a longtime Rice associate who left the administration earlier this year to return to teaching history at the University of Virginia. Despite Cohen's sometimes caustic views on administration policies, officials said he has impressed both Rice and President Bush with his writings, especially "Supreme Command," a study of the relationship between civilian commanders in chief and their military leaders.

In hiring Cohen, a professor at the John Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies whose son served a tour of duty as an Army officer in Iraq, Rice has lured a leading figure of the neoconservative movement as her policies toward North Korea and Iran draw fierce attack from the Republican Party's right wing. Cohen has connections in that circle and deep roots in the military establishment, and he is likely to concentrate initially on Iraq and Afghanistan and on reshaping the State Department to better handle post-conflict environments.

The counselor position is unique to the State Department. It was once one of the top jobs at Foggy Bottom -- formerly held by such luminaries as George F. Kennan, Robert Lansing and Helmut Sonnenfeldt -- but it laid dormant during Bush's first term until it was resurrected by Rice. Zelikow played a critical role for Rice as an intellectual sounding board, operating as a one-person think tank who churned out policy papers on a variety of issues and took on special tasks while unencumbered with managerial responsibilities.

Cohen, in an interview, said Rice's job offer surprised him. "I have known her for a long time, but we did not have a close relationship," he said. He received a call from her office that Rice wanted to discuss policy, but once he arrived at her office, she got straight to the point and said she was interested in hiring him.

DOJ_NMG_0139044

Cohen said he made sure to discuss his views on a range of issues but Rice appeared to value his different perspective and was unbothered by the prospect of internal disagreements. He declined to discuss his opinions yesterday, saying he planned to provide "unvarnished and discreet advice" to Rice. "I already have teeth marks on my tongue," he said, though he acknowledged his long paper trail will provide fodder for journalists.

"I'm sure you guys will have fun with that," Cohen said.

In a 2005 article for The Washington Post titled "A Hawk Questions Himself as His Son Goes to War," Cohen wrote that while the decision to invade was sound, "what I did not know then that I do know now is just how incompetent we would be at carrying out that task." He derided what he called "cockamamie schemes" in creating the Iraq army and the "under-planned, under-prepared and in some respects mis-manned Coalition Provisional Authority."

"The scholar in me is not surprised when our leaders blunder, although the pundit in me is dismayed when they do," Cohen wrote. " What the father in me expects from our leaders is, simply, the truth -- an end to happy talk and denials of error, and a seriousness equal to that of the men and women our country sends into the fight."

When Rice was named secretary of state after four years as national security adviser, Cohen wrote in the Wall Street Journal that the administration's foreign policy had "backbone and clarity of vision" but also "sheer stubbornness, culpable tactlessness and more dangerously, a lack of realism." He described the decision-making circle overseen by Rice as a "small, intimate coterie," saying such "policy-making groups become contemptuous of disagreement, indifferent to contrary arguments and at the end, impervious to reality itself."

But Cohen was also fiercely critical of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report, writing in the Wall Street Journal that "a fatuous process yields, necessarily, fatuous results." Cohen, who has described himself as sympathetic to Israel, also denounced a paper last year by two prominent professors on the influence of the "Israel Lobby" as "inept, even kooky academic work" that was undeniably anti-Semitic.

Cohen is a member of Defense Policy Advisory Board and has on several occasions met with Bush to provide advice on Iraq, but he said he generally has been "perched on the margins [of government] for some time." He said he felt an obligation to serve when the country is at war, "when family is serving, students are serving and friends are serving."

The job does not require Senate confirmation. Cohen is expected to formally take the post in April, after finishing classes at SAIS, though he will begin working as a consultant to Rice before then.

House Eases Rules On Union Organizing (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, March 2, 2007

Democrats rewarded organized labor Thursday for helping them retake control of Congress, passing a House bill that would make it easier for workers to start unions against companies' wishes.

The legislation, passed 241-185 on a nearly party-line vote, would take away the right of employers to demand secret-ballot elections by workers before unions could be recognized.

"It's simply about establishing fairness in the workplace," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md. Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio said the real issue was "taking care of union bosses."

The House action was the second triumph for labor following the Democratic takeover of Congress. The House and Senate also have voted on separate bills to raise the minimum wage.

Labor groups saw the Employee Free Choice Act as one way of halting the downward trend of union membership, now about 12 percent of the work force.

The celebrations may be short-lived. Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., has pledged to block the bill and the White House says President Bush will veto the measure if it reaches his desk.

The House vote was short of the two-thirds majority that would be needed to overturn a veto. Thirteen Republicans voted for the measure; two Democrats voted against it.

Labor groups contend that secret-ballot elections have become a means for employers to intimidate workers into rejecting unions.

"In the past few decades, labor law has been so twisted by corporations and their union-busting hired guns that it is now virtually impossible to form a union against an employer's wishes," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said.

Business groups campaigned against the bill, saying it is an affront to democratic principles and would give high-pressure organizers unimpeded access to workers.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said the bill was "the most important labor law reform legislation of this generation."

"It is about basic labor rights, about the rule of the majority free from intimidation and about protecting jobs," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0139045

Boehner said the bill really was about "taking care of union bosses. ... This is an effort to help them get more members, to make it easier for them to sign them up and to intimidate them to sign cards."

The legislation, also called the card check bill, would certify a union as soon as a majority of workers at a plant signed cards authorizing it. Currently, employers can require elections, overseen by the National Labor Relations Board, on whether a union should be recognized.

The labor rights group American Rights at Work said that, in the run-up to such elections, 80 percent of employers hire union-busting consultants and 90 percent force employees to attend one-on-one anti-union meetings with their supervisors.

The legislation would toughen penalties against employers who violate worker rights during organizing drives and set up a binding arbitration process to prevent companies from thwarting a new union by bargaining in bad faith on an initial contract.

"In many places, when you exercise your right to organize, you get fired, you get intimidated, you get harassed, you get followed home," said Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee.

But Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon of California, top Republican on the committee, said the bill would take away basic rights to a secret ballot. "That right is squarely in the cross hairs and this chamber is about to pull the trigger," he said before the vote.

McKeon offered a substitute guaranteeing rights to a secret ballot, but it was defeated 256-173.

Labor Secretary Elaine Chao, in a statement issued after the final vote, said it was a sad day when the House "votes to deprive workers of their basic right to a private ballot election."

Labor organizations cite employer coercion as a major factor in the steadily falling percentage of workers who are organized. Union membership has dropped from 20 percent of wage and salary workers in 1983 to 12 percent in 2006. Discounting civil servants, that percentage is 7.4 percent, the Labor Department says.

Unions lost 300,000 dues-paying members last year alone, said one opponent of the bill, Rep. Mark Kirk, R-Ill. "But just because only 12 percent of Americans now choose to pay into a union is no reason to attack our rights as Americans to a secret ballot."

The White House made a similar argument Wednesday in issuing a veto threat. "It is a fundamental tenet of democracy that individuals are able to vote their conscience, privately, free from the threat of reprisal," the White House said.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., sponsor of similar legislation in the Senate, said he would introduce it soon.

McConnell, in a statement, indicated Senate Republicans would make every effort to stop its progress. "We will not allow the progress already made on behalf of U.S. workers to be undone," he said in a statement.

House Vote On Organizing Workers First Of Many Labor Battles (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Amid fierce pressure from business groups and organized labor, the House of Representatives passed legislation making it easier for unions to organize workers, setting the stage for coming battles over labor's legislative agenda.

The Employee Free Choice Act passed 241-185, with 13 Republicans supporting the measure and two Democrats voting against it, and most lawmakers falling into predictable union and business camps. The bill faces a likely Republican filibuster in the Senate, avoiding the need for a presidential veto, which the White House has promised. Both labor and business have said they will use the votes to help them decide whom to back in 2008.

The vote and continuing furor over the legislation, which is organized labor's top priority, highlight how attitudes about unions have become even more polarized in Washington. A massive voter outreach led by the AFL-CIO last fall helped Democrats win control of Congress, a favor labor wants returned. At the same time, a decline in overall union membership has given labor less clout with a more conservative Republican party that is being prodded by business leaders who fear unions will make them less competitive globally.

Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon, a senior Republican, criticized the vote as little more than "big labor's big payoff" for its support of Democrats in the fall election, and said "it's the American workers who are truly paying the price."

Yet Democratic support was nearly universal, and included many lawmakers who in the past have parted ways with labor on issues such as trade. "People did not see this as a labor-management issue. They saw this as a middle-class issue," said Rep. Robert Andrews (D., N.J.).

The Employee Free Choice Act would let workers choose to join a union once a majority sign cards, a process that would be quicker and less open to employer opposition than a traditional secret-ballot election. Union officials believe it would help reverse labor's decline. Union membership currently stands at 7.4% of the private-sector work force, down from roughly 20% in the early 1980s.

DOJ_NMG_0139046

The legislation also toughens penalties against employers who violate labor law during organizing drives and has a provision that makes arbitration mandatory if a first contract isn't reached between a union and an employer. Opponents say the "card-check" method would lead to union coercion.

Labor leaders celebrated the vote. "Because of today's vote, the future looks a little brighter to all Americans who have watched corporations celebrate record profits, but have themselves been shut out of the party," said John Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO.

House Passes Bill That Helps Unions Organize (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Defying a veto threat from the White House, the House of Representatives yesterday approved legislation that would make it far easier for unions to organize workers.

The bill, whose prospects for enactment are troubled at best, would enable employees at a given workplace to unionize as soon as a majority signed cards saying they favored a union. Under current law, companies have a right to insist on a secret-ballot election determining their workers' choice. Labor leaders and many Democrats say such elections are often poisoned by employer coercion and intimidation.

Yesterday's vote, which followed a fierce debate, was 241 to 185, largely along party lines. Thirteen Republicans voted for the bill, and two Democrats against.

The measure is organized labor's No. 1 legislative priority, and Democrats call it vital to rebuilding unions and bolstering the nation's middle class.

But several Republicans described it as little more than a Democratic reward for labor's help in last November's elections. The Republicans argued that the bill, the Employee Free Choice Act, was a betrayal of workers' access to a secret-ballot election. Some called it the "employee intimidation act," maintaining that the process of majority sign-up could well entail union organizers' bullying workers into signing pro-union cards.

Republican leaders are already prepared to block the measure in the Senate, and the White House said Wednesday that President Bush would veto it should it emerge from Congress. Yesterday's vote fell short of the two-thirds majority that would be needed to override.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi called the bill "the most important labor law reform legislation of this generation," adding: "But this legislation is about more than labor law. It's about basic workers' rights. It's about majority rule."

The measure has other provisions as well. Under one, federal officials would appoint an arbitrator to set wages and benefits for workers who did not obtain a contract within 120 days of unionizing. The bill also calls for significantly increasing penalties when employers, contrary to law, fire workers who support a union.

House Bill Would Aid Union Organization (USAT)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Democrats rewarded organized labor Thursday for helping them retake control of Congress, approving 241-185 a House bill that would make it easier for unions to organize workplaces. The legislation would certify a union as soon as a majority of workers at a plant signed cards authorizing it. Current law allows employers to demand that a union win a secret-ballot election by workers before unions are recognized.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called the bill "the most important labor law reform legislation of this generation." Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said Democrats were "taking care of union bosses." Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., has pledged to block the bill in the Senate.

Four fired U.S. attorneys subpoenaed

The House Judiciary Committee issued subpoenas for four federal prosecutors who were fired last year by the Justice Department. The committee wants to know if the prosecutors were ousted improperly.

The subpoenas seek testimony from former U.S. attorneys David Iglesias of New Mexico, Carol Lam of California, Bud Cummins of Little Rock and John McKay of Seattle. Eight prosecutors were dismissed. Last month, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that all the prosecutors except Cummins had been dismissed for performance-related reasons. — Kevin Johnson

Report: Obama's ancestors owned slaves

The ancestors of the mother of presidential candidate Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., owned slaves, according to a researcher quoted in The (Baltimore) Sun. William Addams Reitwiesner, who works at the Library of Congress and practices genealogy in his spare time, said a "first draft" of genealogical and Census records shows Obama's great-great-great-great grandfather,

DOJ_NMG_0139047

George Washington Overall, owned two slaves in Nelson County, Ky. The records also show one of Obama's great-great-great-great-great-grandmothers, Mary Duvall, owned two slaves, he said. The report could not be independently verified. Bill Burton, an Obama spokesman, did not dispute the claim. He said Obama's ancestors "are representative of America."

Bill Easing Organization Of Unions Passes House (WP)

By Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

In the most contentious clash between business and labor groups of the new Congress, the House yesterday passed legislation that would make it easier for workers to organize unions -- a measure that President Bush has promised to veto and that Senate Republican leaders have vowed to filibuster.

Continuing in the populist tone of its first 100 hours, the House's Democratic majority pushed through legislation to remove the right of employers to demand secret-ballot elections and to require employers to recognize unions once a majority of workers sign cards saying they want to organize.

Democratic and labor leaders argued that the existing system has become so tilted in favor of employers that it no longer protects workers' rights. Republicans accused Democrats of trying to eliminate a cornerstone of democracy -- the secret ballot -- as a payback to "union bosses" for the labor movement's support in the 2006 election.

"The Employee Free Choice Act puts democracy back in the workplace so the decision to join a union can be made by the workers the union would represent," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told colleagues. "This is the standard right that we routinely demand for workers around the world. We should accept no less a standard here in America."

The measure would represent one of the most significant revisions of federal labor law in 60 years. It is the top legislative priority of the labor movement, which represents a record low 12 percent of the workforce, compared with 35 percent in the 1950s. Major business lobbies have mobilized against it to a level not seen since the fight over Bush's 2001 tax cuts, according to a Chamber of Commerce official. Yesterday's 241 to 184 vote was largely along party lines, with 13 Republicans voting for the measure and two Democrats opposing it.

Republicans took issue with every aspect of the bill, including its name, the Employee Free Choice Act, which they called "mischievous," "misleading" and "Orwellian." Republican Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) suggested it be called, "The American Worker Compulsion Act," arguing that union organizers could bully workers into signing cards.

The White House took the same tack in promising a presidential veto, should the bill pass the Senate. "It is a fundamental tenet of democracy that individuals are able to vote their conscience, privately, free from the threat of reprisal," its statement read.

The vote fell short of the two-thirds majority required to override a veto.

The lobbying campaign leading up to the vote featured AFL-CIO ads highlighting workers who were fired during union-organizing campaigns, and who waited years to get jobs back or to receive back pay.

In yesterday's debate, Democrats cited National Labor Relations Board statistics showing that more than 31,000 workers were awarded back pay in 2005 for unfair labor practices. The numbers have risen steadily in the past three decades, from 7,393 in 1975 to 18,434 in 1985 and 26,197 in 1995, according to NLRB annual reports. The House measure would also impose stiff penalties on employers for unfair labor practices and would require federal arbitration to reach labor contracts if newly certified unions and employers do not reach agreement within 90 days.

The business community's campaign was led by a coalition of 300 business organizations in all 50 states, calling itself the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace. The group aired radio ads calling the legislation anti-worker and antidemocratic, and said its efforts generated 27,000 contacts of House members from within the targeted districts.

Democrats and labor leaders hailed the vote yesterday as an answer to the declining fortunes of middle-class workers and the growing income divide. "Because of today's vote, the future looks a little brighter to all Americans who have watched corporations celebrate record profits but have themselves been shut out of the party, left with stagnant wages and facing soaring costs," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said.

Business leaders and Republicans argued otherwise. "Organized labor is not winning [union-organizing] elections because they're not able to articulate a fundamental value proposition to the vast majority of American workers," said Michael J. Lotito, a lawyer who represents employers in labor relations cases. "They're trying to change the process to increase their market share."

House Backs Bill To Ease Unionizing (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139048

Organized labor scored a major victory yesterday as House members voted in favor of a measure to make it easier for workers to join unions.

The House voted 241-185 for the Employee Free Choice Act, which would allow workers to unionize by simply signing a card or petition stating their interest in joining a union, as opposed to the long-standing practice of secret-ballot elections.

Two Democrats voted against the bill, with 13 Republicans supporting it.

"This is the most important labor-law reform legislation of this generation," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

But the bill faces a tough challenge in the Senate, where Democrats have only a slight majority.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, vowed to fight the bill.

"We will not allow the progress already made on behalf of U.S. workers to be undone, nor will we allow coercion by employers or unions," Mr. McConnell said.

The Bush administration also has vowed to veto the bill.

The pending legislation has pitted labor activists and union foes in a fierce lobbying and public-relations campaign the past few months.

Organized labor says the bill is crucial for helping defend itself from anti-union employers and lawmakers.

Opponents say the pending law is nothing more than political payback by Democrats to the unions, which significantly supported the party during the 2006 congressional elections.

Supporters of the bill say the card-signing -- or "card-check" -- method is more fair than holding a secret-ballot election because it's a simpler, more-direct approach for workers to decide if they want to unionize.

And because card-check organizing is considerably quicker than conducting secret-ballot elections, which typically take weeks or longer, proponents say it reduces the potential for employers to harass and intimidate workers against joining a union.

"Today, when workers want to form a union, their employers can force them to undergo a National Labor Relations Board election process, and that process is broken because it allows irresponsible employers to harass, coerce, intimidate, reassign and even fire workers who support a union," said Rep. George Miller, California Democrat and the bill's main sponsor.

Unions have helped make the United States "the most prosperous, most productive nation in the world, with a vibrant middle class," Mr. Miller added.

Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said the bill is "simply about establishing fairness in the workplace."

But opponents say the bill is a desperate attempt by organized labor to stay relevant.

Union membership peaked in the late 1950s and early 1960s, with more than 35 percent of U.S. workers belonging to a union.

Last year, overall union membership was 12 percent nationally -- down from 12.5 percent in 2005.

The bill would strip workers of their right to vote anonymously when deciding whether to be involved in a union, opponents say.

"We are standing on this floor, considering this bill, and ultimately, casting our votes at the end of this debate because of the power of the secret ballot," said Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon, California Republican. "The privacy and sanctity of the secret ballot is the beauty and the backbone of this democratic process."

Republican opponents accused Democrats of being hypocrites for supporting the bill.

"It's ironic that Democrats who campaigned last November on promises to protect America's privacy rights are now supporting a bill that will strip workers of the right of secret-ballot voting," said Rep. Eric Cantor, Virginia Republican. "This is clearly a Democrat payoff to unions instead of good policy for America."

Rep. Jeb Hensarling, Texas Republican, called the bill the "worker-intimidation act" and said it was a payback by Democrats.

"This bill is a full frontal assault on American workers," Mr. Hensarling said. "What is more fundamental to American democracy than the secret-ballot election?"

But even if the bill is defeated, Democrats almost certainly would raise the issue again if the party captures the White House in 2008, said Peter Morici, a University of Maryland business professor and a former chief economist at the U.S. International Trade Commission.

"This issue isn't going away because the Democrats are starting to believe in it," he said. "It's gaining momentum."

House OKs Bill Making It Easier To Form A Union (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139049

WASHINGTON — For the last dozen years, Capitol Hill hasn't been the friendliest place for organized labor. But that's changed with the new Democratic-controlled Congress, and labor is pressing its agenda.

That was apparent Thursday as the House approved a bill to make it easier to form a union — a longtime priority of labor, an important Democratic constituency. The vote was followed by a victory celebration in the House speaker's office attended by the president of the AFL-CIO.

The Senate, meanwhile, is considering a bill to give airport screeners collective bargaining rights. Another labor priority, the first increase in the federal minimum wage in a decade, is expected to clear Congress within weeks.

"This is just the beginning," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said in an interview Thursday. He listed planned labor offenses on healthcare, trade policy and an immigration overhaul.

After years of being shut out, union lobbyists say, they are being invited to meetings on Capitol Hill and asked their views on legislation.

"We were in a major defensive mode," said Charles M. Loveless, legislative director of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

It will still be extremely difficult for labor to get its agenda through a narrowly divided Congress — and past President Bush's veto pen.

What's more, the ranks of labor are dwindling nationally. About 12% of workers belong to a union. That's down from 20% in 1983 and 40% in 1955, said Nelson Lichtenstein, a history professor at UC Santa Barbara.

Unions, faced with globalization, outsourcing and illegal immigration, have become ideologically divided in ways they never were in the 1950s.

Older, industrial unions like the United Auto Workers have for the most part been fighting for labor protections from international trade, whereas the Service Employees International Union and their labor coalition, Change to Win, have focused on organizing growing segments of the workforce, such as immigrants and temporary workers.

To the extent that there is a unified labor agenda in Washington, it includes legislation to expand paid sick leave, child care, healthcare and pension protections.

Democrats have proposed new bankruptcy legislation that would protect workers' health and pension benefits. They also want to expand the 1993 Family and Medical Leave Act to provide at least six weeks of paid leave for workers to care for themselves, their children or other immediate family.

Democrats also are drafting legislation to reinforce workplace safety and prevent corporations from avoiding pension obligations.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, has talked about reviving a workplace safety bill that would strengthen protections for whistle-blowers and increase penalties for those who repeatedly violated workplace regulations. Kennedy also has proposed legislation that would require employers of 15 or more workers to provide seven paid sick days annually.

Democratic leaders are hoping to wring concessions from Republicans before they consider renewing Bush's trade promotion, or "fast track," authority, which expires July 1. The free-trade wing of the Democratic Party appears to be shrinking, with more legislators like Sen. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) demanding that the administration incorporate labor protections into trade agreements.

All but three of the 42 House Democratic freshmen recently sent a letter to their leadership calling for a new direction on trade, including an end to what they describe as "job-killing agreements."

GOP leaders have indicated a willingness to compromise on trade, but they will probably oppose legislation on union organizing and workplace rights along the lines of the bill that passed the House on Thursday, 241 to 185. Unlike the federal minimum wage increase or changes to trade agreements, the proposed Employee Free Choice Act doesn't come with sweeteners for business interests.

"Senate Republicans are committed to defeating this proposal," said Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), chairman of the Senate Republican Conference. Sen. Michael B. Enzi of Wyoming, the top Republican on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, promised to "work aggressively" to defeat the bill.

The legislation would certify a union as soon as a majority of workers signed cards authorizing it. Under current law, after cards are signed an employer can call for a separate secret ballot — overseen by the National Labor Relations Board — on whether a union should be recognized.

Republicans say the bill would let employers and union officials intimidate workers during organizing campaigns because it would change the process for union elections from a secret ballot to a card check where votes were recorded.

DOJ_NMG_0139050

"We respect a worker's right to organize and to join a union, but clearly they ought to have the right to have a secret ballot election," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). "We're fighting to protect workers from intimidation of any kind, whether it be from employers or from those who seek to organize them."

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) has called the proposed Employee Free Choice Act "nothing more than an attempt to pay back big labor, which helped finance Democrat campaigns across America."

But it's not necessary for unions to get legislation past Republicans, the Senate or the president's desk to score a victory with workers and middle-class voters, said Lichtenstein of UC Santa Barbara.

"Whether you pass this stuff is secondary to whether you change the conversation, and I do think that is happening," Lichtenstein said. "The Democrats understand now that labor is indeed their backbone."

Checkmate (WSJ)

By Kimberley Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

For Big Labor, this week's "card check" victory marked the ultimate payoff for past Democratic election support. For House Democrats, it marked the end of the honeymoon.

Democrats won in November in part by playing down their special interest patrons -- unions, environmentalists, trial lawyers -- and by playing up a new commitment to the moderate middle class. The big question was whether the party had the nerve to govern the way it campaigned, and card check was the first test. The answer? AFL-CIO chief John Sweeney isn't smiling for nothing.

Up to now, Speaker Nancy Pelosi had kept her troops in line and her party's liberal wing in check. The vaunted first "100 hours" was run like a military operation, and revolved around a carefully chosen legislative agenda that would unify every faction in her party. It was small potatoes, but it worked, and it was a lesson in how Democrats can practice smart politics.

The card check, in contrast, is a lesson in how the party's liberal base forces Democrats to back political losers. The legislation's only purpose is to give unions an unfair advantage in organizing, namely by eliminating the secret ballot in union elections and instead allowing thugs to openly bully workers into joining up. Americans understand and despise this, with polls showing 90% of the public thinks card check is a racket.

Democrats therefore left themselves wide open for their first public drubbing. The card check gave Republicans a rare opening to beat the daylights out of the new majority, successfully accusing it of trashing democratic elections and shutting down free speech. It unified the business community, which put aside its disagreements on health care and immigration to instead team up to make the vote as painful as possible for Ms. Pelosi's moderate wing. Even the liberal press jumped ship.

And all this, meanwhile, for a vote that was largely symbolic. President Bush has vowed that a card check law is dead on arrival. And that assumes the legislation could even make it through a Senate filibuster -- which it can't. As low points go, this was the lowest the new majority has had so far.

The issue for Ms. Pelosi is that this will undoubtedly not be the only low point. The card check is instead the first illustration of the biggest dilemma Democratic leaders will face over the next few years. Savvier party members understand the threat special interests pose to Democrats' ability to commune with more of America. Yet the party is completely dependent on those left-wing interest groups to finance and man their electoral victories. They want a return on their investment.

For years now, unions have provided thousands of volunteers for get-out-the-vote efforts. More important, they've provided a huge purse to get Democrats elected. This time they handed over the money on condition that Democrats support what has become their biggest priority. This week they called in their chits.

Many Democrats also see the card check as vital to their political survival. Union membership has been nosediving for years. In 2006 it dropped to just 12% of workers. The reigning belief is that if Democrats don't do their part to reverse this decline, they'll see a huge source of manpower and cash for future elections disappear. The card check might be terrible politics, but it is the best shot they have to force more Americans into unions that will spend the dues to re-elect Democrats.

Whatever the motivation, enough Democrats were willing to take a hit if it meant getting card check through. Not that they didn't attempt to lessen the sting. One reason this was the first major domestic legislation up for a vote was that Democrats were anxious to get it out of the way quickly, and put space between it and next year's election. House insiders were this week referring to that strategy as the "Rip Off the Band-Aid" approach: This is gonna hurt, so do it fast.

It also explains the pains House Labor and Education Committee Chairman George Miller took to put the bill through as quietly as possible. The card check will be the biggest change in labor law in decades, yet Mr. Miller allowed but a single hearing and markup on the issue. That hearing was held in the middle of the House's very public Iraq debate, the better to avoid any notice.

DOJ_NMG_0139051

The issue exploded nonetheless, and it was the party's moderate wing that got caught in the crossfire. Big Labor, to its credit, had approached the card check with a lot more political savvy than is usually the case. In particular, it started approaching Democratic moderates several years ago, demanding they co-sponsor a card check bill. While many in the Blue Dog wing wouldn't normally agree to such an anti-business measure, they saw this as a useful opportunity to score some union points. After all, Republicans weren't about to bring up the legislation. The problem came when Democrats won, and they had to stand behind their previous support.

The unions' other big coup was to get to this year's Democratic freshmen early in the electoral game. Labor explained that any union support they received in their tight races in GOP-leaning districts would be entirely conditioned on their later vote for card check. Most of them signed up for this devil's bargain, since, as one Democratic aide admitted: "We didn't have a choice."

The business community this week made sure that those Democratic moderates felt the burn. The Coalition for a Democratic Workplace -- a group of more than 300 business outfits against the card check -- earlier this week laid out a six-figure radio buy for just three House districts, targeting North Carolina's Heath Shuler, Florida's Tim Mahoney and Kansas's Nancy Boyda. All three ran as conservative Democrats, and have only tenuous grips on their seats. The Chamber of Commerce spent another $400,000 on radio ads targeting 51 Republicans and Democrats who are also vulnerable next year. The ads had an effect. Card-check supporters had been hoping to get as many as 290 votes; instead they mustered just 241.

Ms. Pelosi might remember that she only won last year's election because of the success of these moderate candidates. They were the ones who benefited most from Democrats' new promises to focus on "middle class" America. And it is the Democratic Party as a whole that will suffer if those promises aren't kept.

Bush Picks Executive As Consumer Watchdog (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday that he would nominate a senior executive of the largest organization representing the nation's manufacturers to head the government agency assigned to protect consumers from dangerous products.

Bush's choice of Michael E. Baroody, executive vice president of the National Assn. of Manufacturers, to be chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission drew an angry response from consumer advocates and predictions of a tough battle for Senate confirmation from the Democratic majority.

Critics, noting Baroody's work for an organization that aims to ease restrictions on a long list of companies making consumer goods, said the nomination would reflect an administration effort to restrict government regulations by executive order and action, rather than by congressional approval.

"I think it's shocking," said Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, a watchdog group founded by Ralph Nader. "It's the fox in the chicken coop."

Claybrook, who led the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration under President Carter, said, "They wanted a hard-liner in the agency to push it into the deregulation mode."

The Consumer Product Safety Commission, established in 1974, issues safety standards for a wide range of products, including lawn mowers, toasters, toys, clothing and furniture — nearly all consumer products except motor vehicles and guns.

It investigates reports of dangerous products, issues recalls and shapes regulations. It also has the option of taking no action on complaints or investigations.

The panel has not had a chairman since July; only two of its five seats are filled. Under its regulations, the commission is unable to take formal action after more than six months without a quorum. It hit the mark in January.

Baroody, 60, was an assistant secretary of Labor and director of public affairs under President Reagan. He also was a speechwriter for Bob Dole when the Kansas senator was chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Both in government and out, Baroody has tangled with advocates of greater government regulation to protect public health and safety:

· In 1988, as assistant secretary of Labor, he defended the Reagan administration's record in protecting workers despite delays in issuing safety rules and efforts to weaken regulations.

· In 2000, he fought an ergonomics rule — put into place by the Clinton administration — that the Occupational Safety and Health Administration said was intended to prevent 300,000 workplace accidents and injuries.

· In 2001, speaking for the National Assn. of Manufacturers, he criticized a Supreme Court ruling rejecting arguments that the Environmental Protection Agency had acted unconstitutionally when it issued standards for limiting smog and soot.

Baroody's nomination must be considered by the Senate Commerce Committee before being voted on by the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0139052

"I intend to give his nomination thorough scrutiny," Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), a Commerce Committee member, said in a statement.

"Here was a golden opportunity to put a true champion of consumers onto a very important commission, and instead President Bush selected someone who represents the special interests," she said. "This administration seems incapable of doing anything in the public interest."

Republican lawmakers did not return calls seeking comment.

The Consumer Product Safety Commission has received no increases in funding, according to Democratic staff members on the Senate Commerce Committee, forcing it to reduce staff and workload because its budget mandates cost-of-living increases for employees.

One staff member, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Democratic senators were concerned that the commission's staff had been deprived of its expertise by what amounted to budget cuts imposed by the Bush administration.

Baroody also was president of the now-defunct National Policy Forum, a Republican-oriented policy research group. He is a graduate of the University of Notre Dame.

Kerry Getting Some Payback For Swift Boat Campaign Of '04 (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — Senator John Kerry may get his parting shot after all.

After his having name sullied during the 2004 presidential campaign by the opposition group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, Mr. Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat, got the chance on Tuesday to sharply question Sam Fox, a major Republican donor who was recently nominated to be ambassador to Belgium, about his $50,000 contribution to the group.

In addition, some of Mr. Kerry's Democratic colleagues on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee now say they will consider voting against Mr. Fox's nomination.

Senator Bill Nelson, Democrat of Florida, said about the donations: "I suspect that other than Senator Kerry, there will be some senators that will not look too kindly for his support of that vicious kind of personal attack."

Mr. Kerry declined on Thursday to say how he would vote. On Tuesday, however, he bore in on Mr. Fox with the zeal of the former prosecutor that he is.

Mr. Kerry asked him to explain why he had donated $50,000 to the Swift boat group and pressed him to identify who had asked him to give. Mr. Fox said he could not remember, explaining that he gave large sums to a variety of groups.

Mr. Kerry continued to hammer him, as Mr. Fox squirmed. Finally the senator asked, "Do you think this should matter to me?"

"I'm sorry?" Mr. Fox asked.

"Do you think this should matter to me?" Mr. Kerry repeated.

"Yes, I do. I do," Mr. Fox said.

A Tug Of War On Presidential Papers' Release (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A bipartisan proposal targeting White House rules on the release of presidential papers would claw back power over public records from the executive branch, advocates of the bill say.

The House measure, introduced yesterday, would overturn President Bush's 2001 executive order adding layers of review before presidential papers are made public. Historians and archivists say the order has kept thousands of documents from public view.

Bush's order "gave current and former presidents and vice presidents broad authority to withhold presidential records or delay their release indefinitely," Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee and a bill sponsor, said in a statement yesterday. Waxman's co-sponsors include Reps. Todd R. Platts (R-Pa.), William Lacy Clay (D-Mo.) and Dan Burton (R-Ind.).

Bush issued the order after the White House held up the release of 68,000 pages of Ronald Reagan Presidential Library documents in 2001. Under the previous system, the president, former presidents or designees had 30 days to review documents and lodge objections. Bush added reviews by the families of former presidents to the process, and removed the 30-day deadline. He also broadened the rules to encompass vice presidential papers.

DOJ_NMG_0139053

Thomas S. Blanton, chief of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, said that waiting time for documents from the Reagan Library has soared from 18 months to more than six years since the Bush order, because of the review process and factors such as understaffing at the National Archives.

Bush's order "has added to the endemic problem of delay," Allen Weinstein, the national archivist, said in his testimony. Since the order, White House review time has grown to approximately 210 days, he said.

Cheney Rallies His Base With A Fiery Speech (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney yesterday fired up hundreds of conservatives at their annual conference in Washington, drawing cheers when he upbraided Democrats for not realizing an "inconvenient truth" -- that Iraq is the central front in the global war on terrorism.

In a pointed potshot at his Democratic predecessor, Mr. Cheney took direct aim at former Vice President Al Gore, who starred in the film "An Inconvenient Truth" that won an Academy Award last week for best documentary.

"In these circumstances it's worth reminding ourselves that, like it or not, the enemy we face in the war on terror has made Iraq the primary front in that war. To use a popular phrase, this is an inconvenient truth," the vice president said to laughter and applause.

Addressing the Conservative Political Action Conference on its opening night at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Northwest, Mr. Cheney entered to a standing ovation, complete with yells of approval. His boss, however, did not fare as well.

"I always do appreciate the warm reception I receive at CPAC, and I bring personal greetings to all of you from our president, George W. Bush," he said, but the applause was tepid, far short of that offered when John R. Bolton, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, took his seat at the head table before Mr. Cheney entered.

But the vice president, a favorite among staunch conservatives, kept hold of his audience, ripping Democrats for their anti-war stance and obstinance during the first two months in control of Congress.

"With a divided government and strong feelings on both sides of the aisle, getting things done is a bit more of a challenge than it was before. But the American people expect results, and the president and I are committed to working with Congress for the good of the country. What we will not do is abandon the conservative principles we ran on in 2000 and 2004," he said to cheers.

Mr. Cheney served up red meat to the roomful of conservatives, pushing the president's tax cuts and health care proposal. The vice president also chastised Democratic senators for moving to trim funding for the war and deliver a vote of no-confidence against Mr. Bush, as when the House passed a nonbinding resolution criticizing Mr. Bush's troop "surge" proposal.

"The fact is that every statement we make has multiple audiences," he said. "The enemy listens, and so do the Iraqi people. A watching world needs to know that the United States is determined to prevail because we're a nation that keeps its word, and because we understand the consequences of failure," he said to applause.

Mr. Cheney hit a score of hot-button conservative issues; drilling for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve -- "had they passed legislation when we asked, this nation would be well on its way to receiving up to 1 million barrels per day of new supplies" -- and the foot-dragging by Democrats on the president's judicial nominees.

"During President Clinton's last two years in office, the Republican Senate confirmed dozens of district judges and 15 appellate judges. The current Democratic majority should proceed in that same spirit," he said, citing Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., which brought robust applause.

But he closed with Iraq, making a case for continued support of the war, which a majority of Americans now oppose.

"Very soon both houses of Congress will have to vote on a piece of legislation that is binding -- a bill to provide emergency funding for the troops. And I sincerely hope the discussion this time will be about winning in Iraq, not about posturing on Capitol Hill," Mr. Cheney said.

Conservatives Irate At Current Crop Of Presidential Candidates (BOS)

By Susan Milligan

The Boston Globe, March 2, 2007

Leading conservatives Thursday attacked the Republican Party as big-government, free-spending coddlers of illegal immigrants, and said the country's conservatives should withhold support from the GOP's current slate of presidential nominees to force them to the right.

"I feel very angry and betrayed" by the GOP, some of whose elected officials have backed a "guest worker" immigration plan, abortion rights and tax increases, said Richard Viguerie, chairman of Conservative-HQ.com. "We should withhold support from all major Republican [presidential] candidates today. Not one of them deserves our support today," he told a ballroom full of activists at the Conservative Political Action Conference annual meeting Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0139054

Further, he said, conservatives should withhold "all support" from GOP national committees, which Viguerie said have not produced federal candidates who adhere to conservative principles.

Ken Blackwell, a failed GOP candidate for Ohio governor last year, agreed that conservatives should at least wait to endorse a presidential candidate. "The Republican party -- our natural home in a two-party system -- is in disarray," Blackwell lamented.

At least one conference attendant sported a sticker that featured a circle with a line drawn through the words "Rudy McRomney" -- broadcasting the wearer's opposition to the early leaders in polls for the GOP nomination, former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, Arizona Senator John McCain and former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney.

Conservatives said they are frustrated and angry, blaming the GOP's massive losses in the 2006 elections on Republicans who deviated from a hard-line conservative agenda. The mood also puts added pressure on a slew of GOP presidential candidates set to speak to the CPAC meeting Friday.

Social conservatives are leery of Giuliani, who supports abortion rights, and of McCain, who authored a campaign finance law that limits interest groups' financial influence in political campaigns. Romney's evolution to a socially conservative agenda pleases some religious conservatives, but some are still unhappy with his earlier, softer positions on gay rights and abortion rights.

Former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee has disappointed fiscal conservatives for signing tax hikes on gas and cigarettes when he was governor, while Kansas Senator Sam Brownback has been criticized for his support of an immigration reform bill conservatives claim would give "amnesty" to illegal immigrants. Phyllis Schlafly, a longtime opponent of gay rights and the Equal Rights Amendment, won loud cheers when she derided programs to provide bilingual drivers' tests and to provide low-wage jobs to immigrants instead of "our own high school dropouts."

All of the GOP candidates except McCain are scheduled to appear Friday before the conference. Representative Duncan Hunter, a lesser-known California Republican running for president, will also speak before the conservative activists.

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Romney, acknowledged that conservatives are frustrated because of the election losses of 2006. But he said the party -- including its conservative wing -- needed to come together around an agenda and a candidate who can win.

"The conservative movement is going through a certain degree of reflection and renewal," Madden said. "We need to come together and find some unifying themes."

Bush Brings Fundraising Gold For GOP (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush insists that he will stay out of the race over who will succeed him, at least until a Republican nominee is chosen. But that isn't keeping him from becoming the chief fundraiser for Republicans, his low poll ratings notwithstanding.

Bush helped raise $10.4 million for the Republican Governors Association earlier this week, and he will be the star attraction at a fundraising dinner Friday in Louisville for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, a Kentucky Republican, and the National Republican Senatorial Committee. It is expected to bring in more than $2 million.

Republican activists and advisers say the president is likely to speak at several fundraising events a month in each of the coming months, showing that Bush still has considerable power to help his party even though his approval ratings have averaged well below 50 percent throughout his second term.

Bush's fundraising skills underscore a key fact of modern political life, according to several Republican consultants and a major fundraiser: Political division is not necessarily a bad thing when it comes to breeding political loyalty, and loyalty translates into contributions.

During the first two years of his presidency, Bush's approval rating reached 90 percent in the Gallup Poll, shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, and they remained above 60 percent as the 2002 election approached.

In that time period -- 2001 and 2002 -- Bush raised $192 million for Republican candidates, according to the Republican National Committee.

By contrast, only 38 percent of people surveyed by Gallup approved of Bush's job performance when voters went to the polls last November. But Bush's fundraising numbers were unchanged: During the two years leading to the 2006 election, he raised $194 million, the party reported.

In short, his popularity sank; his fundraising touch remained golden.

DOJ_NMG_0139055

That, said Frank Donatelli, a White House political director under President Reagan, illustrates a central factor at the intersection of politics and cash: "Intensity raises money."

"The dirty little secret of all this is that being a polarizing figure -- whether you are George Bush or Bill Clinton -- your popularity with the base is a tremendous financial asset and resource" for your party, said Wayne Berman, a Republican fundraiser.

Senate, House and gubernatorial races are drawing Bush's focus, too, and candidates are ready to take advantage of his 76 percent approval rating among Republicans, as measured by Gallup during the second week of February.

Even as his overall approval rating shows no sign of rebound, Republicans expect Bush to head to friendly territory to help pad the bank accounts of Republican campaigns, or to conduct low-visibility events in Washington for the party's candidates running in contested states where Bush's popularity lags.

"Helping safe incumbents have good, solid treasuries so they won't have problems next year is smart," said Ron Kaufman, a Bush family political adviser for nearly three decades. "The best thing a president can do for any candidate, whether he is at 40 percent or 90 percent, is fundraising."

Poll Shows Bush Is Losing Support Of Republicans (NYT)

By Marjorie Connelly

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

In the months since the Congressional elections, President Bush has lost substantial support among members of his own party, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News Poll.

Mr. Bush's approval rating dropped 13 percentage points since last fall among Republicans, 65 percent of whom now say they approve of the way he is handling his job as president, compared with 78 percent last October.

Over all, Mr. Bush's job approval remains at one of its lowest points, with 29 percent of all Americans saying they approve of the way he is doing his job, compared with 34 percent at the end of October. Sixty-one percent disapproved, compared with 58 percent in October, within the margin of sampling error.

Twenty-three percent of those polled approved of the way Mr. Bush is dealing with the situation in Iraq. Twenty-five percent approved of his handling of foreign policy.

Even the president's campaign against terrorism, long his signature issue, is seen positively by only 40 percent of those polled, while 53 percent disapprove.

Three-quarters of those polled say things are going badly for the United States in Iraq, and only 23 percent say the efforts to bring stability and order to Iraq are going well.

Seventy percent, including 52 percent of Republicans, say there is not much the United States military can do to reduce the sectarian fighting in Iraq.

Over all, 23 percent of the public say the country is going in the right direction and 68 percent see it as "on the wrong track."

The nationwide telephone poll was conducted Friday through Tuesday with 1,281 adults and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points. The margin of sampling error for Republicans is plus or minus five percentage points.

Music Of The Spheres (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

You might not have noticed, but we broke another U.S. space record last month when astronaut Michael Lopez-Alegria logged his 67th hour of spacewalking. If you consider that the equivalent of the Guinness record for pogo-stick bouncing (23.11 miles in 12 hours and 27 minutes) -- amazing but pointless -- I agree with you. There's nothing quite as beautiful as the space station and the shuttle that services it, and nothing quite as useless.

Now, that can be said of many things: a balance-beam dismount, a Shakespeare sonnet, a chess problem by Nabokov. But none of these is financed by taxpayers, and none makes a claim to utility. They are there for reasons of aesthetics, and perhaps amusement.

You cannot justify a $17 billion NASA budget or $6 billion for manned exploration on such grounds. There has to be more than that, and the space shuttle never was. It will be remembered as one of the most elegant, most misbegotten detours in the history of technology. It was our Spruce Goose, Howard Hughes's gigantic, eight-engine plane that flew only once.

DOJ_NMG_0139056

But the Spruce Goose didn't cost $4 billion in tax money to operate. Which is why the coming retirement of the shuttle is so welcome. Even more welcome was the Bush administration's decision to redirect the entire manned space effort toward establishing a moon base.

Not until about 2020, mind you, half a century since we first reached the moon. Future generations will have a hard time understanding the hiatus. But for two sets of critics -- the Luddite left and the science purists -- 50 years is not nearly long enough. They would not build a moon base at all.

The Luddites have long opposed manned exploration as a waste of resources when, as the mantra goes, we have so many problems here on Earth.

I find this objection incomprehensible. When will we stop having problems here on Earth? In a fallen world of endless troubles, that does not stop us from allocating resources to endeavors we find beautiful, exciting and elevating -- opera, alpine skiing, feature films -- yet solve no social problems.

Moreover, the moon base is not pointless. The shuttles were on an endless trip to the nowhere of low Earth orbit. The moon is a destination. The idea this time is not to go to plant a flag, take a golf shot and leave, but to stay and form a real self-sustaining, extraterrestrial human colony.

Sure, Mars would be better. It holds open the possibility of life and might even have water on its surface today. But the best should not be the enemy of the good. Mars is simply too far, too dangerous, too difficult, too expensive. We won't go there for a hundred years.

Nor is it true that there is nothing of use or even of interest on the moon. There are all kinds of materials to be exploited, observations of the cosmos to be made and knowledge to be gained on how best to live off the land away from Earth.

A century ago there seemed to be nothing in Antarctica, either. We went there first for adventure, then for discovery. The concrete scientific advances Antarctica has yielded (regarding climate change and the ozone layer, for example) have been as important as they were unexpected.

A more serious critique of returning to the moon comes not from the Luddites but the purists. They want science, and they are right that robotic exploration is a more cost-effective way to get it. The science yielded by unmanned vehicles, such as past and future probes of the ice surface of Europa and the hydrocarbon lakes of Titan, is indeed thrilling. And pound for pound, dollar for dollar, manned exploration does bring back less science than robots.

But it still brings back science. Humans can discover things through intuition and pattern recognition that machines thinking in algorithms cannot. Imagine the scientific possibilities if today we had humans patrolling Mars rather than the brilliantly programmed but still limited golf carts now roaming the surface.

And then there's the glory. If you find any value, any lift of the spirit in a beautiful mathematical proof, in an elegant balletic turn, in any of the myriad human endeavors that have no utility but only breathtaking beauty, then you should feel something when our little species succeeds in establishing new life in a void that for all eternity had been the province of the gods. If you don't feel that, you are -- don't take this personally -- deaf to the music of our time.

OTHER NEWS:

A Steadier Day For Stock Markets, But A Sense Of Unease Lingers (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

What is bothering investors? No one thing in particular and yet everything.

From a slowing American economy to a faltering mortgage market and the tightening of historically easy credit, a caldron of concerns has been bubbling up over the last year and appears to have set off the wave of selling that rocked world financial markets this week.

Though each of the fears has a distinct origin and quality, a common strain runs through them: that after four years of strong growth, low interest rates and relative prosperity, investors appear to have become too complacent about risks.

After some wide swings yesterday, stock markets appeared to have steadied from Tuesday's rout. Asian and European markets slumped yesterday, and the Dow Jones industrial average opened down 208 points. But the Dow recovered and traded in positive territory for brief periods before ending the day down 34.29 points, or 0.3 percent. The volatility was a reminder that concerns persist.

"Risk needs to be reassessed," said Marc D. Stern, chief investment officer at Bessemer Trust, an investment firm in New York. "And that doesn't happen in three days, no matter how interesting those three days are."

DOJ_NMG_0139057

Like many other market specialists who share his view, Mr. Stern believes that the outlook for the economy is generally positive, but he worries that investors are paying too much for assets like stocks and bonds in developing countries; securities backed by American mortgages; and junk-rated bonds. He acknowledges that his concerns are neither new nor unique.

These fears have been simmering on the back burner for much of the last two years. Alan Greenspan, the former Federal Reserve chairman whose comments this week about the possibility of a recession have put him back in the spotlight, highlighted them in several speeches before he stepped down last year.

In May, markets around the world sold off broadly on these same concerns as well as worries that the Fed would raise interest rates to levels that would restrict economic growth significantly. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 7.7 percent in a little over a month beginning in early May, before rallying in the second half of the year to gain 13.6 percent for the full year.

Many market specialists note that the market historically goes through such periods of stress, and that the recent period of relative calm is extremely unusual. Liz Ann Sonders, the chief investment strategist for Charles Schwab, calculates that typically the market moves more than 2 percent — up or down — eight days each year. Before the fall on Tuesday, the market had not had a 2 percent move in more than three years.

Tuesday was a "a healthy reminder, especially to individual investors, that markets don't go straight up," Ms. Sonders said.

The VIX index, which measures expectations of future volatility of stock prices based on the prices of options, jumped to 18.31 on Tuesday from 11.35; it has since fallen back to 15.82. By comparison, the index averaged 19.13 during the last six years.

It remains too early to draw any broad conclusions about the current market jitters, whether they will be of a similar short-lived variety as the swoon from last spring or whether they will take a broader and more sustained toll on the markets.

"This is a case of a lot of investors looking for a correction," said Todd Salamone, vice president for research at Schaffer's Investment Research. "There was enough news out there to have that prophecy fulfilled."

Economic reports this week showed that orders for goods that last more than three years fell almost 8 percent in January and that the economy grew far more slowly in the fourth quarter than had been believed.

Yesterday, some of those concerns were alleviated when a monthly survey by the Institute for Supply Management suggested that manufacturing activity picked up speed in February. The report's release at 10 a.m. bolstered stocks. The S.& P. 500 closed down 0.3 percent, or 3.65 points, at 1,403.17, and the Nasdaq composite index lost 11.94 points, or 0.5 percent, to close at 2,404.21.

Unlike the slump last year, the recent drop in stock prices has not been accompanied by any notable movements in the prices of commodities like crude oil or gold, both of which also tumbled in May. Oil futures were up about 1 percent for the week yesterday and the price of gold, which is typically seen as a safe haven during times of uncertainty, was down 2.9 percent.

"A bunch of pieces to the puzzle fit," said Ryan Larson, senior equity trader at Voyageur Asset Management who is based in Chicago. "But other pieces — the gold, the oil — don't really fit together. It causes us to question what's really going on."

Other measures of sentiment also suggest that the talk of reassessing risk has not resulted in meaningful changes in investor behavior.

The difference, or spread, between the yields of United States Treasury securities and high-yield corporate bonds, for instance, has not increased significantly in the last few days, said Kingman Penniman, chairman and chief executive of KDP, a bond research firm. Wider spreads suggest that bond buyers are demanding more return for lending money to companies that may not be able to pay back the debt.

Similarly, the spreads on developing country bonds have not widened from historic lows.

"If I'd gone away for the week and looked at prices, I wouldn't have noticed anything," said Andrew Feltus, a vice president and bond portfolio manager at Pioneer Investments in Boston.

Certainly, spreads on bonds backed by mortgages to people with weak, or subprime, credit have widened significantly in the last two months, and the cost of insuring the lowest-rated portions of those bonds has jumped this week.

In an indication that the market may be in for a tough road, Countrywide Financial, the nation's largest stand-alone mortgage company, disclosed in a securities filing that 22.6 percent of the subprime mortgages it services for other lenders were in default or foreclosure at the end of last year, up from 17.2 percent in 2005.

Another strong signal has come through in the value of the Japanese yen, which has risen 2.9 percent, to 117.61 yen to the dollar, this week.

Some market specialists say the increase is a result of investors unwinding the "carry trade," a trading strategy in which managers borrow money at low rates in Japan and invest it in other markets where returns are greater.

It is unclear how much money has been invested this way, but some suggest it could be in the billions of dollars, given that the difference between short-term interest rates in Japan and the rest of the world is so great.

DOJ_NMG_0139058

The rise in the yen would support the idea that investors are indeed becoming more risk-averse, by buying up yen to pay off their debts in Japan. But skeptics say it is just too early to declare the end of the carry trade, because the Bank of Japan's benchmark rate, even with a recent increase, is 0.5 percent while the Fed's short-term rate is 5.25 percent.

"I don't think two days is enough to tell us" that the carry trade is being unwound in a big way, said Douglas M. Peta, a market strategist at J.& W. Seligman & Company. But "that's absolutely something that should flash a yellow light."

Following are the results of yesterday's Treasury auction of 13-day cash management bills:

Stocks Take 34-Point Dip After Early Plunge (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

An early selloff briefly echoed Tuesday's stock-market tumble, but strong economic data and soothing words from former central bank chief Alan Greenspan spurred buying that kept the market's losses in check.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average briefly broke into positive territory late in the day but finished down 34.29 points, off 0.3%, at 12234.34. It is down 1.8% on the year.

As happened earlier in the week, an overnight selloff in Asian shares spilled into U.S. markets when they opened. At its intraday low just a few minutes into the trading session, the Dow was off 209.09 points.

The mood improved as investors digested fresh data from the Institute of Supply Management, which said its index of manufacturing activity throughout the U.S. economy rose to a monthly reading of 52.3 in February, up from 49.3. A reading above 50 indicates expansion of the manufacturing sector.

In a speech via satellite to Tokyo, Mr. Greenspan clarified comments earlier in the week that had raised investors' fears of a recession in the U.S. this year. In the latest remarks, the former Federal Reserve chairman said he believes a recession is "possible" but not "probable."

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index ended the day off 0.3%, or 3.65 points, to 1403.17, down 1.1% on the year.

The technology-focused Nasdaq Composite Index dropped into the red for the year, off 11.94 points to close at 2404.21. It was off 0.5% both for the day and for 2007.

Binky Chadha, chief U.S.-equity strategist at Deutsche Bank, said he remains confident that stocks will show solid gains for the year. But he thinks investors should hold off buying for now, since the market has entered a particularly risk-averse phase in which it will tend to overreact to any unexpected bad economic news.

In particular, he said that any nasty surprises in next Friday's employment report by the U.S. Labor Department could produce another sharp selloff.

"We think the fundamentals haven't changed for the market," said Mr. Chadha, who noted that Deutsche Bank is sticking to its prediction that the S&P 500 will rise nearly 9% this year.

"That obviously implies you should buy on dips," Mr. Chadha said. "It's just a question of timing."

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 0.89%, or 2.18 points, to 244.12.

In major U.S. market action:

Stock and bond prices fell: The 10-year note shed 1/32 point, or 31.25 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.556%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 117.59 yen, compared with 118.41 yen. The euro fell to $1.3186, compared with $1.3234.

Investors May Need To Keep Dow Tumble In Perspective (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, March 2, 2007

That sums up this week's violent price swings on Wall Street — and poses the biggest unanswered question haunting jittery investors: Are stocks still vulnerable and susceptible to yet another free fall?

"Investors should always be prepared mentally for market volatility," says Alan Skrainka, chief market strategist at Edward Jones.

That's sage advice. The Dow Jones industrial average's 416-point plunge Tuesday, its tepid 52-point rebound Wednesday, and comeback from a 209-point nose dive early Thursday to close down just 34 points was enough to result in a nervous breakdown for even the most unemotional investors.

Skrainka insists that the Dow's downdraft does not change the bright outlook for the USA's greatest companies or the fact that the economy remains sound. "The only thing that changed," he says, "was the psychology of the market."

DOJ_NMG_0139059

The mood turned dark Tuesday when China's highflying stock market — which doubled in value last year — suffered a 9% drop, spooking investors around the globe who had been loading up on risky investments. The selling pressure intensified amid fears that the U.S. economy could fall into recession. The 3.3% sell-off also ended the Dow's longest run without a 2% correction since 1954, which kicked off yet another wave of computer-generated selling. After a relatively calm Wednesday, panic selling hit again early Thursday before buyers surfaced in search of bargains.

During the three-day period the Dow swung down more than 550 points and as much as 4.5% from its record.

Despite the financial pain, a dose of perspective is needed to place the week's carnage in some historical context. The price correction was sizable, but the event was not unusual. Since 1900, the market has suffered corrections of 10% or more 116 times, which equates to roughly one correction per year, Skrainka notes. Other facts that might ease investors' minds:

·Rarity factor. Big daily declines are rare. In the 21,250 trading days ended in December 2006, the Dow has suffered a daily decline of 3.4% or more on only 131 occasions, or 0.6% of the total days. "The odds of a day like Tuesday are between 1-in-400 and 1-in-500," notes Marc Reinganum, director of quantitative research at Oppenheimer Funds.

·Quick, yet "modest" decline. While the recent free fall has injected fear back into the market, the Dow has corrected only 4.5%, more than 3 percentage points less than its downdraft last summer.

·Reasonable P-Es provide a floor. Stocks are not richly priced as they were back in early 2000, when the Standard & Poor's 500 was trading at a price-to-earnings ratio of 28. Now, the S&P's P-E is 15 on estimated 2007 earnings, in line with historical norms.

"More reasonable valuations act as an important shock absorber," says Ed Keon, chief investment strategist at Prudential Financial Group.

Keon says shocks come along from time to time. But the key question is whether the market is braced to deal with the shock. "When stocks are priced for perfection, you get crashes like 1987 and bear markets like 2002," Keon says. Fortunately for investors, stocks were priced low enough to avoid a bigger meltdown.

Most Wall Street pros say more rough days can't be ruled out. But panicking will only make things worse.

"It would be a mistake for investors to view this week as a reason to get out of the stock market," says Jason Trennert, head of Strategas Research Partners.

Stock Market Settles Down After Another Sharp Sell-Off (WP)

By David Cho And Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Stock prices on Wall Street made a jittery recovery yesterday from a steep early morning fall that sent the Dow Jones industrial average plummeting more than 200 points.

The Dow closed down 34.29 points, or 0.3 percent, to 12,234.34. But the market's bungee jump, in which it plunged deep into the red just after the opening bell, recovered into positive territory and then fell again, was a sign of the anxious mood on Wall Street.

Many analysts said the wild week of trading, which included a 416-point drop by the Dow on Tuesday and a modest upswing Wednesday, could alter the economic landscape. Going forward, there simply may not be the same tolerance for risk, a shift that would have huge consequences for the United States and economies around the world.

Trading worldwide was generally grim yesterday. East Asia's largest markets dropped, with a key exchange in China falling nearly 3 percent. Europe's main indexes were down almost 2 percent before trimming losses.

"There certainly is a lot more fear in the market, there's no doubt about that," said Steven R. Howard, a partner at Thacher, Proffitt & Wood, a financial advisory firm. "The markets are much more volatile in terms of where emerging countries are going right now."

For years, because it was easy to borrow money, investors were able to make high-risk investments in the developing world and lend mortgages to credit-challenged home buyers in the United States. Private-equity firms were able to borrow tens of billions of dollars to buy out big companies.

Such borrowing and investing may have reached a turning point, some analysts said. For individual investors, that could mean smaller profits from their portfolios or difficulty obtaining a mortgage with poor credit. Globally, it could mean tighter business loans for companies as well as new struggles for promising economies such as Thailand, Indonesia, the Philippines and developing countries in Latin America.

Signs of a reversal in the availability of what is called "cheap debt" emerged this week.

One warning of this was when the Japanese yen yesterday hit an 11-week high against the dollar. That followed a 2.3 percent ascent -- a huge climb for a currency on a single day -- on Tuesday as stock markets around the world were plunging.

DOJ_NMG_0139060

The connection between the markets and the value of the yen lies in what is known as the "carry trade." The term refers to investors who borrow money in Japan because it has one of the lowest interest rates in the world and invest the funds elsewhere. Often they invest in emerging markets or buy U.S. Treasurys that pay higher interest rates.

A little math may help explain the concept: If traders borrow 1,000 yen from a Japanese bank, convert the funds into U.S. dollars and buy bonds for the equivalent amount, they would profit off the difference in interest rates. So if the U.S. bond pays 5.25 percent in interest, and the traders only have to pay 0.5 percent in Japan, they would stand to make a profit of 4.75 percent, as long as the exchange rate between the countries does not change.

No one knows how large the carry trade is, but estimates have ranged as high as $1 trillion. Economists say this trade has been a major factor in keeping borrowing rates in the United States low because it has increased the purchase of bonds and notes in the United States This, in turn, keeps interest rates on the bonds low.

But many hedge funds and investors also are using the carry trade to make high-risk investments in the developing world. Emerging countries have never been so popular with U.S. investors, several investment groups report. And most of the best-performing mutual funds over the past few years were invested in emerging markets.

"It's not just the hedge funds and the leveraged players who . . . are involved" in the carry trade, said Kathy Lein, chief strategist of DailyFX.com, which provides information on currency markets. "A lot of regular people now are invested in the foreign markets."

Axel Merk, portfolio manager at the Merk Hard Currency Fund, said that in 2006, the market rose in a nearly straight line for eight months. "People became more courageous. . . . You say, 'Lets go for it, let's take a gamble.' Now, with more volatility, people are saying, 'Oops, wait a minute, I better be more careful.' "

Merk added that investors had to "become more cautious. That applies to the carry trade, that applies to equities, that applies to everything."

This week, as the carry trade showed indications of unwinding, money flowed in the opposite direction, from the emerging markets back to Japan. That pushed up the value of the yen. The first to sell investments in the developing world were speculators and hedge fund traders who can move their money quickly, analysts said.

Others decided to weather the storm and have seen their investments take a huge hit. "Every time there is a threat to the carry trade, we get a big, very quick reaction as speculators close out their trades," said Harvey Sawikin, co-founder of Firebird Funds, a $3 billion hedge fund mostly invested in emerging markets. "You could see a painful hit for a short period of time."

But Sawikin, who is invested in Russia and other places in Asia, decided not to move his money. He said many large emerging countries such as India and Brazil can absorb short-term blows from the stock market and are much healthier than they were in 1998, when a currency crisis roiled the developing world. But smaller economies in Asia, Africa and Latin America could suffer the most from the carry trade unraveling.

"There's indications that the emerging market has reached its peak and is going to fall off," said Howard, of Thacher Proffitt. "But it depends on which part of the emerging market you are referring to."

Tse reported from New York.

Manufacturing Shows Some Vigor (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse And Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

The U.S. manufacturing sector showed signs of recovering from a recent slump, striking a positive note that boosted stocks and eased concerns the nation's economy could be headed for recession.

The Institute for Supply Management, a trade group for corporate purchasing managers, reported yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity rose to 52.3 in February from 49.3 the previous month. The index for new orders, an indicator of future activity, rose to 54.9 from 50.3. Any reading above 50 suggests the sector is expanding.

· The News: The latest data on manufacturing show the sector doing better than expected.

· The Background: Its weakness had raised worries about a long decline that could hurt the economy.

· The Bottom Line: Manufacturers still face head winds, but the data suggest recent output cuts were needed to work off an excess of unsold goods, and the sector could soon be poised to expand.

Housing-related manufacturers, such as furniture makers, remained among the sector's most sluggish segments, while producers of petroleum, coal, plastics and rubber led the rebound.

The ISM survey caught some economists and investors by surprise, because other recent indicators had shown manufacturing faltering. Tuesday, for example, the Commerce Department reported that orders for durable goods plunged 7.8% in January. That report helped trigger Tuesday's stock-market selloff, which ended with the Dow Jones Industrial Average down 416.02 points, its seventh-largest point decline ever. The next day, the department reported that economic activity in the fourth quarter was weaker than previously thought.

DOJ_NMG_0139061

But the ISM report, which covers the month of February and provides a more current look at business conditions, signaled that industrial activity is regaining momentum. "This gives some hope that manufacturers are working off excess stocks and should be poised to start growing again," said Daniel Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, a policy and research group in Arlington, Va.

He said the report indicates that the weakness in the fourth quarter and in January "is not an indication that the manufacturing sector is entering a recession" that could drag down the broader economy.

Yesterday's manufacturing news had an immediate effect on investors, helping the Dow Jones Industrial Average erase much of its 209-point drop earlier in the day. The Dow industrials closed at 12234.34, down 34.29 points, or 0.3%

Adding to yesterday's assessment, the Commerce Department reported that consumer spending rose 0.5% in January from the previous month, down from December's 0.7% growth rate but still a healthy pace. The January spending growth was fueled, in part, by a 1.0% rise in personal income, which reflected rising wages, but also the nonrecurring effect of bonuses and executives cashing in on stock options.

To be sure, manufacturers face head winds. They still have plenty of unsold inventory, and the latest data show businesses cutting back on investments in big-ticket capital goods -- all of which could slow production. Still, yesterday's reports offered reason for optimism, economists said. The data suggest consumer spending, which makes up two-thirds of the economy, is on track to grow at an annualized, inflation-adjusted rate of well more than 3% this quarter. That could help manufacturing turn around.

"Consumption entered the first quarter on a pretty strong note," said Mike Englund, chief economist at Action Economics, a consultancy in Boulder, Colo. "As long as the consumer remains healthy, production has to catch up."

Roger Douglas, president of Douglas Manufacturing Corp., Crete, Neb., a maker of products like voting booths and metal storage boxes, said it "seemed like everyone was on a long holiday vacation" at the end of last year and the first month of 2007. "But everything seems to be waking up right now -- inquiries, orders, everything seems to be taking a sudden upturn."

Not everything in yesterday's reports was positive. Americans are still spending beyond their immediate means: In January, their spending exceeded their disposable income by $116.4 billion, or 1.2%. As falling housing prices make consumers feel poorer, they may yet decide to cut back and save more. Though the latest data from the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight showed house prices up 1.1% in the fourth quarter from the third, most economists believe prices have a way to fall.

The personal-income report also contained a whiff of inflation. The Fed's preferred gauge of inflation -- the price index for personal consumption, excluding food and energy -- rose 0.3% in January after rising only 0.1% in December, and was up 2.3% from the year earlier. That is above the Fed's comfort range of 1% to 2%. Meanwhile, the housing slump keeps weighing on construction activity, which fell 0.8% in January from the previous month, the Commerce Department said. Construction of houses and other residential properties fell 1.8%.

In recent months, manufacturers in sectors tied to housing and autos have been among the hardest hit. But Norbert Ore, a procurement executive at Georgia-Pacific LLC, who oversees the manufacturing report, said signs of life in some sectors, such as wood products and textiles, suggest the worst may have passed.

Paulson Sees 'healthy' Outlook For US (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The outlook for the US economy is healthy, though concerns remain about domestic protectionism and the slow pace of Chinese currency appreciation, US Treasury secretary Hank Paulson said on Thursday.

The remarks, in a speech to the Economic Club of Washington, followed positive figures on US personal incomes and manufacturing, which helped lift the Dow Jones index from an earlier 209-point drop. "I am watching developments carefully, and I believe that the US economy is healthy," he said.

But the turbulence in US markets indicated investors remain worried about the economy, with concern centred on doubts about what will happen next in two sectors that are important contributors to growth: housing and manufacturing.

The Federal Reserve expects these sectors to work off the bulk of the oversupply in the first half of this year and allow the economy to grow at a reasonable rate.

Central bankers expect consumer spending to hold up during this economic adjustment, with the support of strong job creation in the service sector and gains in personal income, which rose a blistering 1 per cent last month, according to fresh figures released by the Commerce Department on Thursday.

But there are persistent voices of dissent on Wall Street – which garner particular attention during a market wobble.

DOJ_NMG_0139062

David Rosenberg, chief economist at Merrill Lynch, said: “It seems to me that the Fed’s view is that the housing recession is coming to an end. I have some serious doubts about that.”

He argues that the key is the gap between starts to construction of homes – which have started to ease as builders retrench – and completions, which remain elevated and suggest large volumes of new houses are hitting the market at a time when demand is weak.

“We have a starts at 1.4m and completions at 1.9m. That is a big gap that must be closed for equilibrium to be restored. This means we are entering a phase between now and the end of the year when the declines in production are going to be the most pronounced and we will start to see knock-on effects elsewhere in the economy,” he said.

Ethan Harris, chief economist at Lehman Brothers, has a more sanguine outlook for the housing sector but he cautioned that data on the housing market was notoriously flawed and that it “was too early to call a bottom”.

The Lehman economist said rising defaults by homeowners at the high-risk end of the mortgage market was introducing new uncertainty. “We don’t know how many homes are going to be dumped back into the market by homeowners who default on subprime loans. A lot of those homes could come back on the market and that would mean a new round of pressure on prices.”

It is this kind of unforeseen downward lurch in house prices later in the year that poses the greatest risk to consumer spending, according to Merrill Lynch.

Mr Rosenberg at Merrill Lynch is more optimistic about the manufacturing sector. “Manufacturing is not out of woods yet, but appears to be emerging,” he said.

Clouds Added To Many Economic Forecasts (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A few weeks ago, Wall Street was praising the Federal Reserve for cooling the economy just enough to tame inflation without chilling it into a recession. Now, after several days of financial market turmoil and conflicting economic reports, analysts are having second thoughts.

Yesterday, several said they saw rising risks of higher inflation and much weaker economic growth.

Consumer prices jumped in January, while home construction fell sharply, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. That combined with falling stock prices, distress in some credit markets and declining business investment to sour many forecasts.

"I think the odds of a recession have gone up in the last two weeks," said David Shulman, a senior economist with the Anderson Forecast at the University of California at Los Angeles.

But more-optimistic observers pointed yesterday to a Commerce Department report that consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of the nation's economic activity, rose briskly in January, while incomes climbed even more rapidly.

The nation's factories also produced more goods, hired more workers and booked more new orders in February, the Institute for Supply Management, a business association, said yesterday.

And the labor market remains tight, with unemployment at a low 4.6 percent in January, though many forecasters expect that rate to edge higher in coming months.

"I think that overall the economy is in great shape," said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, who argues that buoyant consumer spending will more than offset the economy's soft spots.

The disagreement is typical of a time when the figures are mixed, and it is unclear how consumers will respond to falling stock prices. If consumers pull back now, the economy is likely to falter, several analysts said.

That hasn't happened yet. Consumer spending rose 0.3 percent in January, after adjusting for inflation, fueled by a 0.5 percent increase in after-tax income.

Before adjusting for taxes and inflation, personal income rose 1 percent in January, the fastest rate in a year, partly reflecting big bonus payments, stock market gains and pay raises for federal workers, the Commerce Department said.

This fits with Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's statement Wednesday that the central bank still foresees moderate economic growth this year -- about 2.5 to 3 percent. That would be slower than last year's 3.3 percent expansion but enough to keep unemployment low.

Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, said Monday in remarks to a private group that a recession is possible later this year -- words that contributed to the stock market sell-off Tuesday. On Wednesday, he stressed to another group that he does not see a recession as likely -- a view similar to the Fed's and many other forecasts.

And in a speech in Washington, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. said, "I am watching developments carefully, and I believe that the U.S. economy is healthy."

DOJ_NMG_0139063

The latest inflation figures, however, did not match the Fed's forecast of diminishing price pressures. Core inflation, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, rose 0.3 percent in January, the fastest rate since August, and was up 2.3 percent from a year earlier, the Commerce Department said. Bernanke and other Fed policymakers have said they prefer to keep price increases in a range of 1 to 2 percent annually.

The Institute for Supply Management's report also showed that manufacturers paid higher prices for raw materials in February.

Rising inflation and a danger of slower economic growth put the Fed in a bind. Central bank policymakers restrain price increases by raising interest rates, making it harder for businesses and consumers to borrow and spend, which dampens demand; it responds to weak growth by cutting rates, which has the opposite effect.

Bernanke told Congress last month that the Fed thought it could probably hold its benchmark short-term interest rate steady for a while because it expects slower growth to lower inflation. But he also warned that if price pressures pick up, he and his colleagues would raise the rate.

Raising the short-term rate now, however, would make it harder for borrowers with adjustable-rate mortgages to refinance their loans. That would exacerbate the credit crunch in the market for loans to subprime borrowers, who have lower incomes and poor credit histories. Delinquencies and defaults on those loans have risen sharply in recent months, causing some lenders to go out of business.

The UCLA Anderson Forecast is lowering its expectations for economic growth primarily because it thinks the turmoil in the subprime mortgage market will prolong and deepen the housing slump, Shulman said. The group won't release its updated forecast until April but anticipates that defaults will rise, increasing the number of homes for sale, while lenders make fewer loans, reducing the number of buyers.

Investors in futures contracts increased their bets yesterday that the central bank will cut interest rates by summer, which might help the subprime market.

But cutting rates might also spur inflation higher, a danger that may strengthen the Fed's case for leaving policy on hold for now.

The Fed does not have to do anything to lower long-term interest rates, such as on fixed-rate mortgages, which are determined in global financial markets. Long-term rates are already falling because investors are moving their money out of stocks and into much safer Treasury securities, pushing down their yields, which serve as benchmarks for private debt. For example, the interest rate on a 30-year, fixed-rate mortgage is linked to the yield on the 10-year Treasury bond, which has tumbled over the past week.

Interest rates have been historically low in recent months but not low enough to stimulate business spending on new plants, equipment and computers. Such capital investment spending declined in late 2006 and in January, according to two recent Commerce Department reports.

The institute's report on increased factory orders in February may signal a rebound in business spending but not a lot of momentum overall, said Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight. He attributes this to caution among the nation's chief executives because of the economic slowdown, rising prices and uncertainty about whether customer demand will hold up.

These factors "have got those

CEOs on tenterhooks right now," Bethune said.

Weak business investment and declining stock prices are among the reasons Global Insight now sees the odds of a recession as 15 to 20 percent, up from about 10 percent last week, Bethune said.

These odds, he said, "are not high, but they're not trivial."

Greenspan Now Says Economic Slowdown Isn't 'Probable' (WSJ)

By Sai Man And Kenneth Mccallum

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

TOKYO -- Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan toned down his warning that the U.S. might slip into a recession later this year, saying he doesn't think such a slowdown is "probable," according to investment bank CLSA Asia-Pacific Markets, which hosted Mr. Greenspan's speech.

"It is possible we can get a U.S. recession toward the end of this year, but I don't think it's probable," Mr. Greenspan was quoted by CLSA as telling the audience here. Mr. Greenspan spoke via satellite from the U.S. Associates of Mr. Greenspan in Washington confirmed the remarks.

The former Fed chief's comments Monday that a U.S. recession was "possible" toward the end of 2007 were cited as one trigger for a decline in stocks Monday and Tuesday, a drop in U.S. bond yields, and growing expectations for an interest-rate cut by the Fed. (See related article1.)

DOJ_NMG_0139064

Mr. Greenspan had said a recession was possible, though he added it was difficult to predict the timing of any recession. Speaking yesterday to CLSA's Japan Forum, Mr. Greenspan appeared to want to hedge his bets on his prediction.

"Things look reasonably good in the short run for the U.S. and the world," he was quoted as saying. But, "we can't just assume that this extraordinary period of recovery can extend indefinitely."

Mr. Greenspan also said the U.S. has "gone through the major part of adjustment" in housing prices and "the worst is over," though the housing market is expected to remain weak, according to CLSA. The weak housing market has had only limited impact on consumer spending because American consumers have been encouraged by the decline in gasoline prices, CLSA quoted him as saying.

Greenspan Is Still Able To Move Markets (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — They are marketed as “intimate conversations” with Alan Greenspan, and groups pay about $150,000 to hear his economic outlook.

But on Thursday, for the second time this week, these private chats went public, jolting financial markets around the world and upstaging Ben S. Bernanke, Mr. Greenspan’s successor as chairman of the Federal Reserve.

First on Monday and then again on Thursday, Mr. Greenspan upset stock markets merely by uttering the word “recession” and saying that one might but probably would not occur by the end of this year.

Few people have the power to move markets like a Fed chairman. Except, maybe, a retired Fed chairman. Mr. Greenspan’s use of the R-word helped push down the Dow Jones industrial average by about 200 points on Thursday morning, though shares later recovered and closed only slightly lower for the day.

The tone if not the substance of the comments seemed to conflict with, and even undermine, Mr. Bernanke’s soothing message on Wednesday that the economy still seemed poised for “moderate” growth and perhaps even a slight acceleration later this year.

It also raised several questions. Did the old Fed chairman, who has been hailed as the maestro of the economy, disagree with the new Fed chairman? For a man who had worked assiduously to keep markets calm while he ran the Fed, why was Mr. Greenspan now using an incendiary word-bomb? At almost 81, did he secretly miss the limelight? Or was he trying to build up advance interest in his new book?

In some ways. the attention given to Mr. Greenspan’s remarks reflects the contrast in personal styles between him and Mr. Bernanke. To many investors, Mr. Greenspan, after 18 years of running the Fed, has star status, and remains the ultimate authority on economic issues. Mr. Bernanke, by contrast, is still an unknown. Where Mr. Greenspan had a fondness for colorful phrases, from “irrational exuberance” to the “frothiness” of the housing market, Mr. Bernanke has brought a plain-speaking openness that is often easier to understand but less catchy.

The difference in style reflects a deeper difference: where Mr. Greenspan guarded his autonomy as a decision-maker and bucked conventional wisdom, Mr. Bernanke has tried to make Fed policy less personalized and more grounded in consensus.

Fed officials declined to comment on the remarks, but noted that Mr. Greenspan has avoided any comment about monetary policy, speaking only about the economy itself.

To be clear: Mr. Greenspan did not, as some analysts incorrectly inferred, predict that a recession was imminent. In fact, he said few forecasters anticipated one. But he did caution that the United States appears to be at the end of an expansion and that such times usually bring with them the seeds of a recession.

His first comments were on Monday, in a private chat over satellite to an investor group in Hong Kong. On Wednesday, he tried to clarify his views while speaking to a group in Tokyo.

“By the end of the year, there is a possibility, but not a probability, of the U.S. moving into a recession,” Mr. Greenspan was quoted as saying by Bloomberg News, which based its report on interviews with people who attended the CLSA Japan Forum in Tokyo.

Several analysts said Mr. Greenspan’s comments, if read in context, did not conflict nearly as much as they seemed with the current Fed’s view. But the comments highlight the delicate line Mr. Greenspan has drawn in defining his post-Fed activities. He has adamantly refused to comment on monetary policy, saying that a Fed chairman has enough problems without being second-guessed by his predecessor.

But he has also restarted his earlier career as an economic consultant and forecaster, speaking to groups of institutional investors, on average, twice a week for a fee of up to $150,000. He is represented by the Washington Speakers Bureau, whose clients include celebrities and political figures like Colin L. Powell, the former secretary of state.

DOJ_NMG_0139065

On Thursday, Mr. Greenspan was in Palm Springs for a talk to another conference. He has spoken in cities around the United States, Canada, Europe and Asia, often to institutional investors at conferences sponsored by banks or trade associations.

According to the Speakers Bureau, Mr. Greenspan offers "thoughtful, in-depth question-and-answer sessions." The sessions are off-limits to the media, and recording devices are prohibited. But in practice, word gets out, and it can have a big impact.

Acquaintances of Mr. Greenspan say he has been puzzled by the reaction to his comments. In his comments on Monday, he restated his long-held caution that investors are in danger of being too complacent and too confident that the benign mix of low inflation and steady economic growth would continue. When asked whether he expected a recession later this year, Mr. Greenspan said it was impossible to rule out the possibility but went on to say that most forecasters did not expect one.

Carl Tannenbaum, chief economist at LaSalle ABN Amro in Chicago and president of the National Association for Business Economics, said Mr. Greenspan's comments were consistent with a consensus.

The National Association for Business Economics' most recent survey of members found an average prediction that the United States economy would expand 2.4 percent in 2007 and that the chances of a recession were about 15 percent — not probable, but not impossible.

Some analysts were less charitable, speculating that Mr. Greenspan had intentionally allowed himself to sound more provocative in order to increase his appeal on the lecture circuit and perhaps build excitement for his new book. The book, for which he is to be paid about $8 million, is due out in September and is to be both a memoir and a treatise on economic issues.

To be sure, Mr. Greenspan is hardly the only former Fed official to offer his views on the economy. Laurence Meyer, a former Fed governor, resumed his career as a forecaster for Macroeconomic Advisers and now offers clients detailed interpretation of the Fed's thinking.

But Paul A. Volcker, who preceded Mr. Greenspan as Fed chairman, has been silent on Fed policy and has only rarely offered his views on the economy.

Mr. Greenspan, according to people who have spoken with him, is intent on remaining active as an economic consultant and forecaster. It is what he has done for more than 50 years, he has told people, and he sees no reason his role as a former Fed chairman should bar him from continuing to earn money at it once again.

The Big Meltdown (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

FEB. 27, 2008

The great market meltdown of 2007 began exactly a year ago, with a 9 percent fall in the Shanghai market, followed by a 416-point slide in the Dow. But as in the previous global financial crisis, which began with the devaluation of Thailand's currency in the summer of 1997, it took many months before people realized how far the damage would spread.

At the start, all sorts of implausible explanations were offered for the drop in U.S. stock prices. It was, some said, the fault of Alan Greenspan, the former chairman of the Federal Reserve, as if his statement of the obvious — that the housing slump could possibly cause a recession — had been news to anyone. One Republican congressman blamed Representative John Murtha, claiming that his efforts to stop the "surge" in Iraq had somehow unnerved the markets.

Even blaming events in Shanghai for what happened in New York was foolish on its face, except to the extent that the slump in China — whose stock markets had a combined valuation of only about 5 percent of the U.S. markets' valuation — served as a wake-up call for investors.

The truth is that efforts to pin the stock decline on any particular piece of news are a waste of time.

Wise analysts remember the classic study that Robert Shiller of Yale carried out during the market crash of Oct. 19, 1987. His conclusion? "No news story or rumor appearing on the 19th or over the preceding weekend was responsible." In 2007, as in 1987, investors rushed for the exits not because of external events, but because they saw other investors doing the same.

What made the market so vulnerable to panic? It wasn't so much a matter of irrational exuberance — although there was plenty of that, too — as it was a matter of irrational complacency.

After the bursting of the technology bubble of the 1990s failed to produce a global disaster, investors began to act as if nothing bad would ever happen again. Risk premiums — the extra return people demand when lending money to less than totally reliable borrowers — dwindled away.

For example, in the early years of the decade, high-yield corporate bonds (formerly known as junk bonds) were able to attract buyers only by offering interest rates eight to 10 percentage points higher than U.S. government bonds. By early 2007, that margin was down to little more than two percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0139066

For a while, growing complacency became a self-fulfilling prophecy. As the what-me-worry attitude spread, it became easier for questionable borrowers to roll over their debts, so default rates went down. Also, falling interest rates on risky bonds meant higher prices for those bonds, so those who owned such bonds experienced big capital gains, leading even more investors to conclude that risk was a thing of the past.

Sooner or later, however, reality was bound to intrude. By early 2007, the collapse of the U.S. housing boom had brought with it widespread defaults on subprime mortgages — loans to home buyers who fail to meet the strictest lending standards. Lenders insisted that this was an isolated problem, which wouldn't spread to the rest of the market or to the real economy. But it did.

For a couple of months after the shock of Feb. 27, markets oscillated wildly, soaring on bits of apparent good news, then plunging again. But by late spring, it was clear that the self-reinforcing cycle of complacency had given way to a self-reinforcing cycle of anxiety.

There was still one big unknown: had large market players, hedge funds in particular, taken on so much leverage — borrowing to buy risky assets — that the falling prices of those assets would set off a chain reaction of defaults and bankruptcies? Now, as we survey the financial wreckage of a global recession, we know the answer.

In retrospect, the complacency of investors on the eve of the crisis seems puzzling. Why didn't they see the risks?

Well, things always seem clearer with the benefit of hindsight. At the time, even pessimists were unsure of their ground. For example, Paul Krugman concluded a column published on March 2, 2007, which described how a financial meltdown might happen, by hedging his bets, declaring that: "I'm not saying that things will actually play out this way. But if we're going to have a crisis, here's how."

Most Support U.S. Guarantee Of Health Care (NYT)

By ROBIN TONER And JANET ELDER

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

A majority of Americans say the federal government should guarantee health insurance to every American, especially children, and are willing to pay higher taxes to do it, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll.

How the Poll Was Conducted (March 2, 2007) While the war in Iraq remains the overarching issue in the early stages of the 2008 campaign, access to affordable health care is at the top of the public's domestic agenda, ranked far more important than immigration, cutting taxes or promoting traditional values.

Only 24 percent said they were satisfied with President Bush's handling of the health insurance issue, despite his recent initiatives, and 62 percent said the Democrats were more likely to improve the health care system.

Americans showed a striking willingness in the poll to make tradeoffs to guarantee health insurance for all, including paying as much as $500 more in taxes a year and forgoing future tax cuts.

But the same divisions that doomed the last effort at creating universal health insurance, under the Clinton administration, are still apparent. Americans remain divided, largely along party lines, over whether the government should require everyone to participate in a national health care plan, and over whether the government would do a better job than the private insurance industry in providing coverage.

Looking ahead to the presidential campaign, 36 percent of Americans polled said they had confidence in the ability of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, to "make the right decisions on health care," while 49 percent said they were uneasy about her.

But Mrs. Clinton retained the confidence of nearly 6 in 10 Democrats on the issue, despite the politically devastating collapse 13 years ago of the national health initiative she helped develop early in her husband's presidency.

The poll helps explain why health care already looms large in the presidential campaign, and in statehouses from California — where Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, has proposed a sweeping coverage plan — to Massachusetts, now instituting a program passed under Mitt Romney, the former governor and current Republican presidential candidate.

John Edwards, the Democratic presidential candidate and former senator from North Carolina, recently unveiled his own attempt at a consensus plan, one that would require everyone to have insurance and require employers to provide it or pay into a fund that would do so. Nearly 4 in 10 said that was a good idea; nearly half said they were unsure.

While Democrats are traditionally strong supporters of expanding health coverage, this survey found many Republicans and independents in agreement.

"I think everybody should have some kind of health care available to them," said Diane Manning, 66, of Vancouver, Wash., who described herself as an independent.

"I don't necessarily think that socialized medicine is the answer, but I think everyone should have that right," said Mrs. Manning, who participated in the poll and agreed to a follow-up interview. "And there are so many people that don't."

DOJ_NMG_0139067

Nearly 47 million people in the United States, or more than 15 percent of the population, now go without health insurance, up 6.8 million since 2000.

The poll also found overwhelming support behind the Children's Health Insurance Program, which covers many low- and moderate-income children and is up for renewal in Congress this year. Eighty-four percent of those polled said they supported expanding the current program to cover all uninsured children, now estimated at more than eight million. A similar majority said they thought the lack of health insurance for many children was a "very serious" problem for the country.

The nationwide telephone poll of 1,281 adults was conducted Feb. 23- 27, and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

The poll found Americans across party lines willing to make some sacrifice to ensure that every American has access to health insurance. Sixty percent, including 62 percent of independents and 46 percent of Republicans, said they would be willing to pay more in taxes. Half said they would be willing to pay as much as $500 a year more.

Nearly 8 in 10 said they thought it was more important to provide universal access to health insurance than to extend the tax cuts of recent years; 18 percent said the tax cuts were more important.

"I wouldn't want to pay a lot of taxes, but if it was spread out and everyone paid their fair share, it would be fine," said Don Galvan, 50, a computer programmer from Ringwood, N.J., who considers himself an independent. "Everybody should have some kind of medical coverage, in case they or their children get sick. Especially children."

Most participants said they were satisfied with the quality of their health care, but there was widespread concern about costs. Nearly half of those with insurance said an employer had cut back on benefits or required them to pay more for their benefits in recent years.

How the Poll Was Conducted (March 2, 2007) A quarter of those with insurance said someone in their household had gone without a medical test or treatment because insurance would not cover it. Six in 10 of those without insurance said someone in their household had gone without care because of the cost.

More people now see guaranteeing health insurance as important than did so at the end of the Clinton efforts in 1996. At that time, 56 percent polled said it was the government's responsibility to do so, and 38 percent said it was not. In the current poll, 64 percent said the government should guarantee health insurance for all; 27 percent said it should not.

Moreover, an overwhelming majority in the current poll said the health care system needed fundamental change or total reorganization, just as they did in the early 1990s, when a deep recession and soaring health care costs galvanized the public and spurred the Clinton drive.

But now, as then, this concern did not translate into a consensus on what should replace it.

One question offered a choice between the current system and a national health insurance program covering everyone, administered by the government and financed by taxpayers. Thirty-eight percent said they preferred the current system, 47 percent the government-run approach.

Robert Blendon, an expert at Harvard on public opinion and health, said politicians had to find some compromise between these philosophical divisions on the role of government, which are deep-seated in American culture, or "we're going to have the same train wreck we did before."

The Clinton plan, itself an attempt at a compromise, collapsed under attacks from an array of interests, including the insurance industry, which warned that the plan amounted to a big government takeover.

Mr. Blendon noted that many politicians were seeking a blend between the private market and the government in their health plans.

McCain And Obama In Deal On Public Financing (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — Senator John McCain joined Senator Barack Obama on Thursday in promising to accept a novel fund-raising truce if each man wins his party's presidential nomination.

The promises by Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Mr. Obama, Democrat of Illinois, are an effort to resuscitate part of the ailing public financing system for presidential campaigns.

In every election since Watergate, candidates have received limited sums of taxpayer money on the condition that they abstain from raising or spending any more. But this year, the leading candidates are all sidestepping the system in a competition to raise far more in private donations, more than $500 million each, according to most projections, compared with $150 million in potential public financing.

DOJ_NMG_0139068

But there is a chance that the obituaries for the public system may be premature. On Thursday, a spokesman for Mr. McCain said that he would take up Mr. Obama on a proposal for an accord between the two major party nominees to rely just on public financing for the general election.

Such a pact would eliminate any financial edge one candidate might have and limit each campaign to $85 million for the general election. The two candidates would have to return any private donations that they had raised for that period.

Mr. Obama laid out his proposal last month to the Federal Election Commission, seeking an opinion on its legality. The commissioners formally approved it on Thursday.

The manager of Mr. McCain's campaign, Terry Nelson, said he welcomed the decision.

"Should John McCain win the Republican nomination, we will agree to accept public financing in the general election, if the Democratic nominee agrees to do the same," Mr. Nelson said.

A spokesman for Mr. Obama, Bill Burton, said, "We hope that each of the Republican candidates pledges to do the same."

Mr. Burton added that if nominated Mr. Obama would "aggressively pursue an agreement" with whoever was his opponent.

Mr. McCain and Mr. Obama have backed changing campaign finances.

McCain Ups The Ante Over Campaign Finance (POL)

By Kenneth P. Vogel

The Politico, March 2, 2007

John McCain raised the stakes Thursday in an emerging campaign finance showdown among the major presidential candidates.

In move similar to Democrat Barack Obama's last month, McCain, a Republican, pledged to accept public funding in a general election, provided the Democratic nominee does the same. McCain's announcement came hours after the Federal Election Commission granted presidential candidates increased fundraising flexibility.

The moves by McCain, the senior senator from Arizona, and Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, seemed designed to solidify their positions as the field's leading advocates for reducing the influence of money in politics. But their pledges will also put some pressure on the other leading candidates from both parties to follow.

The leading Republican candidates had refrained from actively pursuing general election funds, which kept open the possibility of accepting public funds later.

The leading Democratic candidates have already announced they would not curtail their pursuit of general election funds in order to comply with the public funding system's limits. But the commission's decision gives them the chance to reconsider should they win the nomination.

Democrats Hillary Rodham Clinton, the junior senator from New York, and John Edwards, a former senator from North Carolina, both indicated they might take that newly open option. But neither went as far as Obama or McCain.

Among the GOP contenders, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani plans to start collecting general election money, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is considering it. Neither would match the pledges made by McCain or Obama.

Clinton's spokesman rejected the suggestion that his senator's position was less demonstrative than either Obama's or McCain's.

"I don't think it's less than what anybody else is saying because we don't know what the situation is going to be," said spokesman Phil Singer. "Obviously, given the current state of affairs, we're going to consider what our options are should we become the nominee."

Giuliani's campaign issued a statement saying, "We are raising private money for the primary and will begin raising private money for the general as allowed by the FEC ruling. We have not decided at this time whether we will accept public funding if we win the nomination."

Edwards' deputy campaign manager, Jonathan Prince, echoed that stance.

"We'll make a decision at the time about the best way to ensure we have the maximum possible resources to win," he said.

The commission's decision, prompted by a request from Obama, allows candidates to seek the maximum $4,600 donation – technically $2,300 for the primary election and $2,300 for the general election – from each donor and maintain the option of returning the general election funds. That would allow them to take public financing. Previously, candidates who intended to seek public financing for the general election – as President Bush and Democrat John F. Kerry did in 2004 – were limited to accepting $2,300 per donor.

"John McCain welcomes the FEC's ruling that presidential campaigns can accept general election funds with the option to return the funds and participate in public financing once the general election phase of the campaign has begun," McCain campaign manager Terry Nelson said in a statement. The campaign will begin collecting general election funds, he said, adding

DOJ_NMG_0139069

“should John McCain win the Republican nomination, we will agree to accept public financing in the general election, if the Democratic nominee agrees to do the same.”

The moves might prove significant only if Obama and McCain win their respective parties’ nominations, since election lawyers and political analysts say the fiscal and political landscape of the 2008 campaign cycle make it unlikely that other major party candidates will sacrifice the spending ability necessary to participate in the program.

It provides roughly $85 million in taxpayer funds for the general election campaigns of candidates who agree to abide by spending limits. That’s a fraction of the tally the leading candidates would be expected to raise and spend in private donations in a campaign that experts predict could top $1 billion in spending.

McCain May Opt Out Of Financing System (EX)

By JIM KUHNHENN,

DC Examiner, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Republican presidential candidate John McCain, a longtime advocate of limiting the influence of money in political campaigns, will opt out of the post-Watergate presidential public financing system unless the Democratic nominee agrees to campaign under the same financial restrictions, his campaign said Thursday.

The McCain camp's decision came after the Federal Election Commission eased some political fundraising rules in hopes of salvaging the tattered presidential financing system in the 2008 campaign.

By a 5-0 vote, the commission said presidential candidates may solicit private contributions for the general election now and still be eligible for public financing if they become their party's nominee.

The decision - a response to a request for advice from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama - would permit the two major party nominees to strike a deal and limit their campaigns to the public money available in a presidential campaign fund. In return, the candidates would have to return any private contributions they raised for the general election to their donors.

"The McCain campaign will now begin the process of accepting these general election funds, following the new FEC guidelines," McCain campaign manager Terry nelson said. "Should John McCain win the Republican nomination, we will agree to accept public financing in the general election if the Democratic nominee agrees to do the same."

FEC commissioners hailed their decision Thursday as one way to help preserve a public financing system that is in danger of becoming obsolete.

"We all know the public financing system rests on a very fragile base," said one commissioner, Hans A. von Spakovsky.

The FEC action comes as front-runners from both parties have decided to forgo public funds in primaries because acceptance of the money would require candidates to abide by spending limits. Several candidates also have said they will bypass public money in the general election, believing they could raise far more than the $85 million available for each party's nominee.

Such a development would be the first time a presidential election would operate entirely outside the public financing system created in the wake of the Watergate scandal more than 30 years ago. Campaign strategists and election money experts predict the two party nominees could end up spending $500 million each in the primary and general elections, far more than would be available if they simply took public financing.

In addition to Obama, Democrats Hillary Clinton and John Edwards have also said they will raise general election contributions now. The decision by McCain, however, was especially significant because he has been a champion of legislation to restrict the role of money in elections. The 2002 law that bans wealthy donors, unions and corporations from giving unlimited contributions to the national parties bears his name.

Taxpayers contribute to the public finance system by selecting whether to direct $3 of their tax liability to the presidential fund in their tax returns. Legislation pending in Congress seeks to retain the public financing system by increasing the amount that taxpayers would set aside and by removing spending restrictions for primary candidates who accept the public money.

Obama's lawyers, in seeking the FEC's opinion, said he wanted to be able to raise private money for the general election while retaining the option of seeking a bipartisan agreement to only accept the public money.

The FEC on Thursday said he and the other candidates could do that provided they keep the general election money separate and return it to donors if they decide not to use it.

The question remains whether candidates would even consider such a spending armistice, especially if an accelerated primary schedule results in a lengthy and expensive general election campaign.

In their request to the FEC, Obama's lawyers said only that Obama would not "rule out" a publicly financed campaign and stressed that "both major parties' nominees" would have to agree to such a step.

On Thursday, Obama spokesman Bill Burton said: "If Senator Obama is the nominee, he will aggressively pursue an agreement with the Republican nominee to preserve a publicly financed general election."

DOJ_NMG_0139070

The FEC's decision could have gone in another direction. At issue was a provision in campaign finance law that nominees are eligible for public financing if "no contributions have been or will be accepted by candidate or his or her authorized committee."

But commissioners said strict adherence to that provision would simply force candidates to forgo the public financing system entirely.

"It would be wrong for the agency to stand on a wooden interpretation of its regulations and of the statute while the public financing system crashes and burns," Commissioner Ellen Weintraub said.

Analysis: High Hurdles Set Before McCain (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, March 2, 2007

This time a Republican heavyweight not an underdog, John McCain embarks on his second presidential run facing numerous challenges in courting a GOP establishment he once spurned at nearly every turn.

In a move meant to spark his campaign, the Arizona senator chose a late-night talk show to make clear Wednesday what long had been anticipated — "I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States."

But a day after he disclosed his plans on CBS' "Late Night With David Letterman" to formally enter the race in April, McCain found himself on the defensive for saying during the appearance that U.S. lives had been "wasted" in Iraq.

"I should have used the word 'sacrificed' as I have in the past," the former Vietnam prisoner of war said amid some Democratic complaints.

The episode underscored the intense scrutiny in store for McCain — the freewheeling candidate of 2000 — while he seeks the presidency as one of the GOP's strongest contenders and as the country wages an unpopular war to which McCain is perhaps forever linked.

Projecting an air of invincibility, McCain spent more than a year laying the foundation for another White House bid and ended 2006 as the front-runner for the GOP nomination. He added veterans of President Bush's campaigns to his own experienced staff, recruited proven fundraisers and collected early endorsements from senators and local elected officials alike.

But over the past few months, McCain has put most of his efforts into Iraq and shepherding Bush's unpopular troop increase through Congress. Meanwhile, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani made it clear he was running and enthusiasm for his candidacy grew while ex-Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts formally entered the race and set the pace in fundraising.

Recently, Giuliani's edge in national popularity polls has widened considerably over McCain, even among white evangelicals who make up a core of the GOP base. All that has caused some Republicans in Washington to question — mostly in private conversations — whether McCain's campaign needed a jump start.

"McCain is on target, on schedule, but maybe is suffering a bit from Giuliani being the flavor of the month," said Ken Duberstein, a GOP consultant in Washington. Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster in Alexandria, Va., was more blunt: "He doesn't seem to have made any progress lately, let's put it that way."

Countering that perception, McCain told The Associated Press earlier this week: "We've had very good movement ... It's not only not stalled, it's that we've seen significant progress."

Regardless, 10 months before the first primary votes, McCain's work to woo the GOP base — and become the party's standard-bearer — is just beginning, and he must overcome a spate of hurdles to get the Republican nomination.

The feisty McCain long has been known in Congress as an independent Republican unafraid to buck the party or speak his mind — and he reveled in his rebel reputation in his bitter and ultimately unsuccessful 2000 race against George W. Bush.

Then, much of the GOP establishment lined up behind Bush early on so McCain had no choice but to run as an anti-establishment candidate — and he did so with fervor, said Kenneth Sherrill, a political science professor at Hunter College in New York.

"This time, McCain has worked very hard to identify himself as the heir apparent and to be as closely aligned as possible to the forces that vanquished him in 2000, but he does face a couple of problems," Sherrill said.

McCain must convince Republican primary voters that they can trust him to be a loyal party champion who will adhere to GOP's core principles — and not waver.

Some conservatives, who make up a critical part of the Republican base, are skeptical of his veracity given that he once derided their leaders as "agents of intolerance" but now has sought to repair relations with them.

In what is being perceived as another slight, McCain decided to skip a major annual gathering of conservatives in Washington this weekend even though most in the crowded GOP field were attending.

As he campaigns, he likely will have to answer for conflicts on certain issues that give conservatives pause:

DOJ_NMG_0139071

_On taxes, McCain voted against Bush's tax cut in 2001, but now says he favors extending the cuts. He says doing otherwise would amount to a tax increase.

_On abortion, McCain said once in 1999 that he didn't think Roe v. Wade, the landmark decision legalizing abortion, should be overturned but now he advocates its repeal.

McCain also may find himself having to explain other actions that further rankled the base — spearheading the law that reformed the campaign finance system, backing Bush's call for an eventual path to citizenship for some of the millions of illegal immigrants in the U.S., and his collegial working relationship with liberal lion Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

At the same time, McCain could end up fighting the perception that he's the past. Giuliani and Romney are fresh faces to GOP primary voters, who largely know McCain from his previous run — and have deep-seated feelings for him, for better or worse.

McCain's age and his health also might become an issue. Should he win this nomination and then the presidency, McCain, 70, would be the oldest president ever sworn into office for a first term. He also is a cancer survivor.

He bristles at the notion that voters may see him as unfit to serve, telling AP: "I work seven days a week, 16 plus hours a day. I'm fine. I'm healthy."

Oddly, Iraq — the four-year-old war a majority of Americans oppose — could end up being McCain's ticket to winning the Republican nod.

Although he has criticized how Bush handled it, McCain's unflinching support for the war and Bush's troop increase could endear him to hard-core Republican voters — and, perhaps, prove they can count on him.

Senators Regret Remarks On Troops (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — They come from different parties and have opposite views on what should be done in Iraq. But both Senator John McCain and Senator Barack Obama have now had to express regret for saying that American lives have been “wasted” in battle.

Mr. McCain, the Arizona Republican who has been a big supporter of the war and has backed President Bush’s call for more troops, made his remarks Wednesday in an appearance on “Late Night With David Letterman” while criticizing the White House’s management of the war.

“Americans are very frustrated, and they have every right to be,” he said. “We’ve wasted a lot of our most precious treasure, which is American lives, over there.”

Mr. Obama, the Illinois Democrat who has been a critic of the war from the start, made a similar remark in a visit to Iowa after announcing his candidacy. “We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged, and to which we now have spent $400 billion and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted,” he said.

Mr. McCain was criticized on Thursday by the Democratic National Committee for making the remark, just as Mr. Obama had been criticized by conservative groups.

“How is it that John McCain now believes American lives are being wasted, yet he so stubbornly supports the president’s plan to escalate the war in Iraq and put more American lives in harm’s way?” asked Karen Finney, a spokeswoman for the Democratic committee.

Mr. McCain and Mr. Obama responded to the criticisms the same way: by recanting remarks they said they regretted.

“I should have used the word ‘sacrificed,’ as I have in the past,” Mr. McCain said. “No one appreciates and honors more than I do the selfless patriotism of American service men and women in Iraq.”

McCain Apologizes For Gaffe On Troops (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Sen. John McCain yesterday apologized for saying the lives of the troops killed fighting the war in Iraq were "wasted," becoming the latest White House hopeful recanting his word choice within hours of announcing 2008 candidacy.

Less than 24 hours after telling CBS' David Letterman he would seek the Republican presidential nomination, the Arizona senator was forced to issue a statement clarifying his remarks.

"Last evening, I referred to American casualties in Iraq as wasted. I should have used the word 'sacrificed,' as I have in the past," said Mr. McCain, a decorated Vietnam War veteran and a key ally of President Bush on Iraq policy.

DOJ_NMG_0139072

"No one appreciates and honors more than I do the selfless patriotism of American servicemen and women in the Iraq War," he said in the statement, which did not use the word "apology."

Mr. McCain told Mr. Letterman on Wednesday: "Americans are very frustrated, and they have every right to be. We've wasted a lot of our most precious treasure, which is American lives."

The Democratic National Committee immediately called on Mr. McCain to apologize to American military families.

"How is it that John McCain now believes American lives are being 'wasted,' yet he so stubbornly supports the President's plan to escalate the war in Iraq and put more American lives in harm's way?" DNC spokeswoman Karen Finney fired off in a statement, saying he was "insulting our brave troops."

A similar semantic scuffle erupted following Sen. Barack Obama's official presidential announcement last month, when he told Iowans, "We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized, and should have never been waged, and on which we've now spent $400 billion, and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted."

The Illinois Democrat later apologized for a "slip of the tongue," telling the Des Moines Register, "I was actually upset with myself when I said that, because I never use that term. Their sacrifices are never wasted."

"What I meant to say was those sacrifices have not been honored by the same attention to strategy, diplomacy and honesty on the part of civilian leadership that would give them a clear mission," he said.

Mr. McCain's apology was similar and welcomed by his colleagues, who said he should be forgiven for misspeaking.

"This is life with constant media exposure," said McCain friend Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican.

"He is in the spotlight and every thought is analyzed and every word is subject to criticism," he said. "Presidential aspirants are human, and they are all going to go through this."

Indeed, few 2008 wannabes remain without a gaffe.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr.'s first day as a candidate was dominated by a verbal flap for which he was compelled to apologize by early evening.

His announcement was overshadowed by a New York Observer article in which he said Mr. Obama as a candidate was the "first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

The Delaware Democrat's apology said he meant no offense to Mr. Obama or past black presidential candidates.

John Edwards, a former Democratic senator from North Carolina, was embarrassed when his official announcement was leaked on the Internet the day before he intended to declare his presidential intentions.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton did her announcement via Web video, eliminating the possibility of an error. But a week later, she faced less-than-friendly headlines for a joke she tried to make in Iowa about "evil" men.

A supporter asked Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, how she was equipped to fight "evil men" such as terrorist Osama bin Laden. As she repeated the question, pausing at the words "evil men," she made the audience laugh, prompting reporters to speculate she was making a joke about either her husband, former President Bill Clinton, or former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

"I've made a lot of mistakes, fortunately they've been in places that you guys aren't located," said presidential contender Sen. Sam Brownback, referring to reporters. The Kansas Republican joked that he'd rather not share them now.

On a serious note, Mr. Brownback defended Mr. McCain as a "patriot," noting, "I don't think anybody thinks the troop lives have been wasted."

Mr. Obama agreed, telling reporters, "As somebody who has had the same phrase in a speech, you know, I think that nobody would question Senator McCain's dedication to our veterans."

He also speculated Mr. McCain meant to express a similar sentiment to his own, that lawmakers have a "sacred duty to make sure that we are honoring their sacrifice by giving them missions in which they can succeed."

In his statement, Mr. McCain acknowledged U.S. mistakes in Iraq.

"We have paid a grievous price for those mistakes in the lives of the men and women who have died to protect our interests in Iraq and defend the rest of us from the even greater threat we would face if we are defeated there."

Anyone But McCain, Santorum Says (POL)

By Carrie Budoff

The Politico, March 2, 2007

Former Sen. Rick Santorum has drawn at least one conclusion about the Republican presidential primary field: Anybody but John McCain.

The Pennsylvania Republican, who signed a contract Thursday as a Fox News contributor, said that he has spoken with every GOP candidate except the senator from Arizona but that it's still too early for him to endorse.

DOJ_NMG_0139073

"The only one I wouldn't support is McCain," Santorum said during an interview in his office at the Ethics and Public Policy Center in Washington, where he is a senior fellow.

"I don't agree with him on hardly any issues,'' Santorum said. "I don't think he has the temperament and leadership ability to move the country in the right direction."

Responding, McCain spokesman Danny Diaz said McCain was a "well-known and respected conservative."

Santorum lost his Senate seat last fall in a landslide to Democrat Bob Casey but remains a prominent voice in the conservative movement – a voting bloc in search of a presidential candidate.

Santorum's critical appraisal of McCain contradicts a seemingly cordial relationship, at least in the last year. McCain had headlined a fundraiser for Santorum, and they co-authored an ethics overhaul proposal.

For More Info Visit Our Candidates Page

Over the years, however, Santorum said they have clashed on campaign finance reform, environmental policy, tax cuts, immigration and other issues.

Santorum suggested that McCain also wasn't as solidly anti-abortion as he would like. "He may be pro-life, but I served with him for 12 years, and I know how pro-life he is," Santorum said.

Diaz said McCain favors overturning Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court ruling that legalized abortion, and has picked up support from other conservative senators.

"He has been a lonely voice for fiscal discipline in the nation's capital," Diaz said, "and has fought to protect life and build a strong defense."

Santorum has spent the last two months building a new life outside of Congress, where he served for 16 years in the House and Senate.

He will begin appearing soon on Fox News shows. He also is writing a book and producing a documentary on a theme he began pressing in the final months of his campaign: the threat of radical Islam on the nation's security.

He said he's weighing an offer from The Philadelphia Inquirer to write an op-ed column,and will start his own communications consulting business – but do no lobbying.

"That's not me," Santorum said.

Besides, he added, "I want to keep my political options open."

FEC Rules On Presidential Campaign Funding (CHIT)

By John McCormick

Chicago Tribune, March 2, 2007

The Federal Election Commission said Thursday that presidential candidates may accept private contributions for potential general election campaigns and still remain eligible for public financing if they ultimately win their party's nomination.

The ruling came after a request for clarification from Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who has suggested he would like the option of running a publicly financed general election campaign — with its associated spending limits — if he could convince a future Republican opponent to do the same.

Political observers, however, say the ruling is likely a moot point since a financial truce is highly unlikely in an era where political advertising, organization and travel are extremely expensive and both parties will be ferociously fighting for a White House with no incumbent.

The decision, in a 5-0 vote, comes as front-runners from both parties have forgone public funds and spending limits for the primaries.

Obama had requested the ruling, stating that two of his top rivals for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), have indicated they likely would reject the public financing system that has governed presidential elections for more than three decades.

The system, started in the wake of the Watergate scandal, gives presidential candidates money for campaign expenses, if they agree to certain spending limits. In 2008, the allocation is expected to be about $80 million, a small portion of what observers suspect each candidate will actually spend.

The commission said Obama may solicit and receive contributions for the general election if he meets certain conditions, including that the money be kept in a separate escrow account and that the funds not go for anything but general election activities.

If Obama were to win the Democratic nomination and then decide to accept public funding for the general election, he would also need to refund all general election contributions within 60 days of certifying his eligibility for public funds.

DOJ_NMG_0139074

"Sen. Obama is pleased the FEC took this important step in preserving the public financing system," Obama spokesman Bill Burton said. "If Sen. Obama is the nominee, he will aggressively pursue an agreement with the Republican nominee to preserve a publicly financed general election."

Panel Upholds Obama Funding Request (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The US Federal Election Commission yesterday unanimously upheld a request by Barack Obama, one of the leading Democratic presidential candidates, to continue to raise private funds without closing off his right to public financing if he were nominated as his party's candidate.

Mr Obama, who polls say is closing in on Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, said he would do all that he could to preserve the US's virtually broken system of public election financing.

His stance contrasts sharply with that of Mrs Clinton, who announced in January that she would rely solely on private sources of money for both the party primaries and the general election.

In a statement from his campaign headquarters in Chicago, Mr Obama said that if he was nominated as the Democratic party's 2008 presidential candidate he would "aggressively pursue" a deal with his Republican counterpart to forgo private funding in favour of the public system. He also said that he had sought the FEC's opinion in order to try to preserve public financing.

The first-term senator from Illinois, who has based his candidacy on a promise to bring a new tone to US politics, has surprised many in his party by offering a sharp and direct challenge to Mrs Clinton, whom many saw as unsurpassable a few months ago.

Mrs Clinton, who yesterday announced she had raised $1m over the past week from online donors, is expected to raise more money during the 2008 campaign than any previous candidate in US history. The FEC has projected that the two party nominees will have spent $500m apiece by the end of 2008 - more than double that of 2004.

Almost all the leading candidates of both parties, including Mr Obama, have opted to rely solely on private money for the party primary campaigns, which conclude when the official nominations take place at the party conventions in August 2008. But Mr Obama, who last week raised $1.3m at a Hollywood fundraising event, is the only leading candidate to say that the system of public financing is worth preserving.

Obama Ruling Could Prove Moot, Backfire (POL)

By Kenneth P. Vogel

The Politico, March 2, 2007

Prompted by Barack Obama, a federal panel Thursday granted unprecedented fundraising flexibility to presidential candidates.

But the unanimous ruling by the Federal Election Commission is likely to have little practical long-term impact. And it could leave Obama, the junior senator from Illinois and among the front-runners for the Democratic nomination for president, in a tricky spot.

The senator earned kudos when he asked the commission for permission to pursue an innovative fundraising strategy that his lawyer suggested would pave the way for a clean election and save the struggling presidential public financing system.

In explaining his vote to approve Obama's request, commission Vice Chairman David Mason said, "The overall enterprise I think all of us are about and all of us agree on is preserving the flexibility of candidates to get back into the public financing program for the general election if they chose to do that.''

Election lawyers and political analysts, however, say the fiscal and political landscape of the 2008 campaign make it unlikely that either major party nominee will use that flexibility.

"If I had to bet, I would bet that they'll wind up not taking public money and going with what they raise," said Brett Kappel, a Democratic campaign finance lawyer with Vorys, Sater, Seymour and Pease.

Together, the nominees are expected to spend upwards of $1 billion on their campaigns. By that calculation, nominees who go the new route could be required to return roughly $165 million each soon after their respective conventions – typically the start of an expensive advertising blitz that continues through the November general election – in order to qualify for $85 million in matching public funds.

Many of the leading contenders for the Democratic and Republican nominations have already either said they will opt out or are considering opting out of the system.

DOJ_NMG_0139075

Before the decision, candidates were required to opt out to seek the maximum $4,600 donation – technically $2,300 for the primary election and $2,300 for the general election – from each donor.

Now, candidates can raise $4,600 from each donor and still hold open the possibility of taking public financing. Previously, candidates who intended to seek public financing for the general election – as President Bush and Democrat John F. Kerry did in 2004 – were limited to accepting $2,300 per donor.

Obama himself is raising money for the general election, but his attorney sent a letter to the commission last month asking it to clear the following scenario: Obama would raise money for the general election and if he wins the nomination, he and the Republican nominee would return general election funds and decide to participate in public financing.

"Should both major party candidates elect to receive public funding, this would preserve the public financing system, now in danger of collapse, and facilitate the conduct of campaigns freed from any dependence on private fundraising," wrote Obama's attorney, Bob Bauer of Perkins Coie.

The request earned Obama accolades – including an editorial in the Miami Herald crediting him with "an idea that could keep the public financing system alive" – and enhanced the good government profile he's cultivated (he led the ethics reform charge in the Senate and sponsored a bill to overhaul the public system for the 2012 presidential election).

And the request gave Obama a rhetorical club to wield over both his Democratic competitors – particularly Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, the first to announce she was opting out of public financing – and potentially the Republican nominee.

It was carefully worded to stress that Obama would return general election contributions and take public financing only "if both major parties' nominees eventually decide, or even agree, on this course."

That may not entirely inoculate him against criticism for declining public financing, said University of Virginia political science professor Larry Sabato. "When you present yourself as a 'clean' candidate, you are often held to a higher standard, whether that is fair or unfair," Sabato said. "Media and observers outside the arena may insist that Obama follow through on public financing in the general election, even if his opponent isn't doing so."

Obama's spokesman Bill Burton said that if Obama is the nominee, he would "aggressively pursue an agreement with the Republican nominee to preserve a publicly financed general election."

The newly approved course is open to any of the candidates, but the leading campaigns either did not respond to requests for comment or were noncommittal.

"It will be a consideration that will be part of any decision made at a point further down the road," said Kevin Madden, campaign spokesman for Republican Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts. "Right now, our concentration is focusing both our organizing and our fundraising efforts on the primary," Madden said.

The commission ruling allows the nominees to accept public financing provided they keep any general election contributions they raised in separate accounts, don't spend them and refund them within 60 days of winning the nomination.

That's not permitted under the law, said Paul Ryan, associate legal counsel for the Campaign Legal Center, a nonprofit organization that along with another group wrote the commission urging rejection of Obama's request. The route Obama proposed would neither free candidates from constant fundraising nor shield them from the "deleterious influence of large contributions," the groups wrote.

Still, their letter characterized the request as "a good faith effort by Senator Obama and his campaign to preserve, and have the opportunity to use, this extremely important and valuable system to our democracy and the American people."

Saving The System (WP)

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

THANKS TO an innovative request from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, the Federal Election Commission voted yesterday to try to salvage the endangered public financing system for presidential elections. Now it is up to presidential candidates who claim to support that system to put real commitment behind their rhetoric.

The FEC ruled that candidates can raise general election money now -- as most top-tier contenders are doing -- but change their minds down the road, return the private money and accept public financing instead. Candidates who are sincere supporters of public financing ought to be willing to pledge to stay within the system if they win their party's nomination and the other side's nominee promises to do the same.

So far, the indications are favorable. "If Senator Obama is the nominee, he will aggressively pursue an agreement with the Republican nominee to preserve a publicly financed general election," spokesman Bill Burton said after the FEC action. He was matched by the campaign of Arizona Sen. John McCain. "Should John McCain win the Republican nomination, we will agree to accept public financing in the general election, if the Democratic nominee agrees to do the same," said campaign manager Terry Nelson.

DOJ_NMG_0139076

The 2008 campaign had been shaping up to be the first in which both parts of the post-Watergate presidential financing system collapsed. By the 2004 race, the cost of campaigning and the capacity for fundraising had so outstripped spending restrictions for the primary campaign that none of the serious contenders agreed to accept matching funds in exchange for limiting his spending. This time around it looked as if the system of full financing for the general election -- each major party nominee would receive about $85 million in exchange for forgoing private funds -- would be obsolete as well.

But the FEC's approval of Mr. Obama's request would allow candidates to agree to call off the general election money race -- provided that other candidates follow the example of Mr. Obama and Mr. McCain. The campaigns of John Edwards and Rudolph W. Giuliani did not respond to e-mail inquiries; Mitt Romney's campaign said it was focused on the primaries. "We'll definitely consider it," said Phil Singer, a spokesman for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign.

Candidates who believe in public financing need to do more than consider Mr. Obama's challenge. They should just say yes and help save the system.

At Site Of '65 March, An '08 Collision (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Bill Clinton will join Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton at a commemoration of the 1965 civil rights march in Selma, Ala., on Sunday, bringing his star power and popularity among African Americans to a weekend of events that had been shaping up as a showcase for the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama.

It will be the former president's first major public appearance with his wife since she launched her campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination last month.

Obama (D-Ill.) announced several weeks ago that he would deliver the keynote speech at a service honoring the march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge, joining Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.) and other veterans of the civil rights movement in marking the historic event. Obama has gained significantly among black voters in recent months, according to a recent Washington Post-ABC News survey, jeopardizing Clinton's early lead in the Democratic primary field.

Reluctant to give any ground to Obama even at this stage of the campaign, Clinton (N.Y.) decided early last week that she, too, would go to Selma this weekend. She arranged a simultaneous appearance at a church just steps away from the one where Obama will speak Sunday morning, and she agreed to accept a civil rights award on behalf of her husband.

Late yesterday, after organizers initially said that the former president would not attend, the Clinton campaign announced that he would be making the trip after all.

The convergence of the Clintons and Obama in the small Alabama town that became the focus of national attention during a series of police beatings and civil rights demonstrations that ultimately helped pave the way for the Voting Rights Act of 1965 sets the stage for an extraordinary political showdown -- and media circus.

The imminent collision of the two candidates, who cross paths in the Senate but have avoided each other on the campaign trail, offers a vivid snapshot of how important the campaigns believe black voters will be in the primaries. And the swift move by the Clintons to try to claim the spotlight at the event demonstrated that the former first lady does not intend to cede the black vote to Obama.

"I think the Clinton camp is sending a signal that they will aggressively contest Barack Obama for the African American vote," said Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), who has endorsed Obama and whose district includes Selma. "It's a good thing the black vote will not be taken for granted and will be actively contested." Alabama, which has a large black electorate, has not locked in a primary date; it could come as early as Feb. 5, 2008, which is shaping up to be a national primary with contests from coast to coast.

Lewis -- an icon of "Bloody Sunday" whose skull was bashed by Alabama police as he helped lead a peaceful march from Selma to Montgomery on March 7, 1965 -- organizes a pilgrimage back each year, traditionally with a group of both Democratic and Republican members of Congress in attendance (though this year, few Republicans are expected to attend, in part because the event appears poised to become dominated by Democratic politics). Numerous other Democratic lawmakers are planning to join Lewis on his three-day pilgrimage, including Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who has close ties to the Clintons and Obama.

"I think it's gratifying to see that two of the leading contenders for the Democratic nomination would want to come to Selma 42 years after Bloody Sunday, and I think it dramatizes the changes that have occurred in American politics and black politics in particular," Lewis said in an interview.

He said he has not decided whom to support in the Democratic primary. "I have been talking with Mr. Obama, and haven't talked so much to Senator Clinton, but I've talked to President Clinton, and I think right now, I'm just trying to get through the weekend and make this journey successful," Lewis said. He described the black vote in general as "up for grabs."

DOJ_NMG_0139077

The main events this weekend will occur Sunday, when Obama speaks at a unity breakfast and then delivers the keynote address at Brown Chapel AME Church, the most historic church in Selma and the place where demonstrators organized for the 1965 march. Lewis plans to attend that service.

A short distance away, at precisely the same time, Clinton will speak at First Baptist Church.

Later that afternoon, Obama and Clinton are planning to participate in the crossing of the Edmund Pettus Bridge, where Lewis and his fellow demonstrators were turned back by baton-wielding police in 1965. President Clinton plans to fly in that afternoon for his induction into the Hall of Fame at the National Voting Rights Museum, where his wife originally planned to represent him.

"President Clinton is deeply honored by this recognition on an issue on which he and Senator Clinton care so deeply about, and he rearranged his schedule to be there on Sunday because this was an event he felt he couldn't miss," Clinton spokesman Jay Carson said.

How the joint Clinton trip came about was a subject of some debate: The senator's advisers dismissed the suggestion that the former president was rushing in at the last minute to help his wife's standing among black voters. But they admitted that the decision was made yesterday, more than a week after Hillary Clinton made her plans to go to Selma.

Obama spokesman Bill Burton said of the Selma showdown: "It's an important event. The more folks who commemorate and pay attention to it, the better."

Bill Clinton To Join Wife In Alabama (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK Mar 1, 2007 (AP)— In competition for a key Democratic voting bloc, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is enlisting the help of her husband, former President Clinton, at a weekend civil rights commemoration headlined by a formidable black rival, Sen. Barack Obama.

Clinton and Obama, the party's top 2008 presidential contenders, will be in Selma, Ala., Sunday to observe the 42nd anniversary of a civil rights march that helped end racial segregation in the South. Obama is scheduled to deliver the day's keynote address at a Selma church that morning, with Sen. Clinton speaking at another church nearby.

But late Thursday, the Clinton campaign announced that the former president would join his wife in a symbolic march across the Edmund Pettus bridge, where civil rights workers were beaten by state troopers in 1965. Obama also will participate in the march, along with civil rights activists and others.

Bill Clinton also will be inducted that day in the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame another high-profile opportunity for the Clintons to grab the spotlight from the charismatic Obama.

The joint appearance marks the first time the Clintons have appeared together publicly since she announced her candidacy in January.

Normally, Clinton might not worry much about the support of black voters after serving eight years as first lady in a White House that enjoyed legendary popularity among blacks. Bill Clinton was dubbed "the first black president" by author Toni Morrison, and Hillary Clinton has enjoyed strong support from black voters a critical Democratic constituency as a senator and presidential contender.

But that popularity is being challenged by Obama, a first-term senator from Illinois who some believe has a real chance at becoming the nation's first black president.

Obama spokesman Bill Burton said the more people who attend the anniversary events, the better.

A New Twist To An Intriguing Family History (BSUN)

By David Nitkin And Harry Merritt

The Baltimore Sun, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON // Many people know that Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's father was from Kenya and his mother from Kansas.

But an intriguing sliver of his family history has received almost no attention until now: it appears that forebears of his white mother owned slaves, according to genealogical research and Census records.

The records -- which had never been addressed publicly by the Illinois senator or his relatives -- were first noted in an ancestry report compiled by William Addams Reitwiesner, who works at the Library of Congress and practices genealogy in his spare time. The report, on Reitwiesner's Web site, carries a disclaimer that it is a "first draft" -- one likely to be examined more closely if Obama is nominated.

DOJ_NMG_0139078

According to the research, one of Obama's great-great-great-great grandfathers, George Washington Overall, owned two slaves who were recorded in the 1850 Census in Nelson County, Ky. The same records show that one of Obama's great-great-great-great-great-grandmothers, Mary Duvall, also owned two slaves.

The Sun retraced much of Reitwiesner's work, using Census information available on the Web site ancestry.com and documents retrieved by the Kentucky Department for Libraries and Archives, among other sources. The records show that Overall, then 30, owned a 15-year-old black female and a 25-year-old black male, while Mary Duvall, his mother-in-law, owned a 60-year-old black man and a 58-year-old black woman. (Slaves are listed in the 1850 Census by owner, age, "sex," and "colour," not by name.)

An Obama spokesman did not dispute the information and said that the senator's ancestors "are representative of America."

"While a relative owned slaves, another fought for the Union in the Civil War," campaign spokesman Bill Burton said tonight. "And it is a true measure of progress that the descendant of a slave owner would come to marry a student from Kenya and produce a son who would grow up to be a candidate for president of the United States."

The research traces the Duvalls to Mareen Duvall, a major land owner in Anne Arundel County in the 1600s. The inventory of his estate in 1694 names 18 slaves, according to a family history published in 1952.

The records could add a new dimension to questions by some who have asked whether Obama -- who was raised in East Asia and Hawaii and educated at Columbia and Harvard -- is attuned to the struggles of American blacks descended from West African slaves.

"The twist is very interesting," said Ronald Walters, a political scientist who is director of the African-American Leadership Institute at the University of Maryland, College Park. "It deepens his connection with the experience of slavery, even if it deepens it on a different side of the equation."

Gary Boyd Roberts, a senior research scholar at the New England Historic Genealogical Society who published a book on the family lineages of presidents, said he did not think the slave-holding history was "particularly unusual."

"If you have a white Southern mother, or a mother from the middle states who has ancestry in the South, it doesn't strike me that that should be very surprising," he said. While the majority of such families did not own slaves, many with some wealth did, Roberts said.

Reitwiesner's research identifies two other presidential candidates, Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Democratic Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, as descendants of slave owners. Three of McCain's great-great-grandfathers in Mississippi owned slaves, including one who owned 52 in 1860. Two ancestors of Edwards owned one slave each in Georgia in 1860.

It was unclear tonight whether Obama was aware of any slave-holding ancestors, but he makes no mention of them in his 1995 memoir, Dreams from My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance.

The book contains many approving references to his mother's side of the family. At one point, he writes that his mother "could give voice to the virtues of her midwestern past and offer them up in distilled form."

The memoir, however, comes close to confirming the Overall-Duvall lineage -- stopping a generation short. Census and other records complete the gaps.

In a reference to his American ancestry, Obama writes "while one of my great-great-grandfathers, Christopher Columbus Clark, had been a decorated Union soldier, his wife's mother was rumored to have been a second cousin of Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederacy."

Clark was actually Obama's great-great-great-grandfather, according to Reitwiesner's research and Census data available at ancestry.com. A 1930 Census document lists Clark, 84, living in the same El Dorado City, Kansas household as a 12-year-old great-grandson, Stanley A. Dunham. Dunham was Obama's grandfather.

Clark's wife, Susan, was the daughter of George Washington Overall, the latest known family slave owner.

Reitwiesner, the researcher, declined to be interviewed for this article. "I'll let my Web page [wargs.com] speak for itself," he said in an e-mail message. The Obama report contains a disclaimer that appears on all of Reitwiesner's work: "The following material … should not be considered either exhaustive or authoritative, but rather as a first draft."

Genealogical experts who reviewed the Obama family tree at the request of The Sun would not vouch for its findings.

Most of the historical entries lack citations of authenticating source material, such as birth and death certificates or marriage licenses, said Barbara Vines Little, past president of the National Genealogical Society in Virginia, adding that "he has nothing here that I can see that would allow you to make any logical link."

"You just can't casually throw some documents together and make a sophisticated analysis," said Tony Burroughs, author of Black Roots: A Beginners Guide to Tracing the African American Family Tree and a consultant on a project by the New York

DOJ_NMG_0139079

Daily News that found that relatives of former Sen. Strom Thurmond appear to have owned the ancestors of civil rights activist Rev. Al Sharpton.

But Roberts, the New England scholar, collaborated with Reitwiesner on a 1984 book about the American roots of Princess Diana, and calls him "exceptionally bright" and "quite a good researcher."

The online Obama family tree, Roberts said, is the work of "an informal team of genealogists" who specialize in Internet-based research and post their findings to test their validity.

"When you are gathering up things from the Internet, you can get fantastical -- by that I mean wild and unbelievable -- connections," Roberts said. "Many of them will fall; only a few of them will hold up. But some absolutely extraordinary things do hold up."

Assisting in the Obama research was Christopher Challender Child, a genealogist at the New England Historic Genealogical Society, who said that Reitwiesner culled fragments from a variety of sources. "There's a limit to what you can verify without a lot of money," Child said. "But from what I see, the line looks pretty good."

For some, the records may underscore Obama's unique racial heritage as a presidential candidate.

Author and essayist Debra J. Dickerson wrote in a January salon.com article that she had previously refrained from opining about the senator because "I didn't have the heart (or the stomach) to point out the obvious: Obama isn't black."

" 'Black,' in our political and social reality, means those descended from West African slaves," Dickerson said.

Walters, who was deputy campaign manager for Jesse Jackson in 1984 and the author of Black Presidential Politics in America, agreed that questions raised by Dickerson and others "is an important debate."

"What people are really asking is, 'Can I trust this guy? Do I have confidence in this guy? Does he understand my situation, and therefore [is he] able to take my issues into the political system?'" Walters said.

Romney Assails Rivals On National Issues (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, March 2, 2007

Republican Mitt Romney assailed his two leading presidential rivals Wednesday, criticizing John McCain's stance on immigration and dismissing Rudy Giuliani's support for gun control, abortion and gay rights as a losing combination in the GOP primary.

Running a distant third in national polls, Romney used a campaign stop in New Hampshire to challenge McCain's support for stronger border security paired with an eventual path to citizenship for some of the 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States.

Also, in an interview with the Christian Broadcasting Network, the former Massachusetts governor criticized Giuliani for his moderate stands on abortion, gays and gun control — even though Romney expressed similar views in previous campaigns.

Romney began a series of appearances in New Hampshire, the first presidential primary state, by targeting McCain on immigration.

"I don't agree with it; I think it's the wrong course," Romney said at the outset of four appearances in the first presidential primary state. "I do not believe amnesty is the right course for the 11 or 12 million illegal immigrant who are living here. It didn't work in the 1980s; it's not going to work in the 2000s either."

McCain, who announced Wednesday night that he will formally become a candidate next month, had pushed legislation with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., that categorized illegal immigrants and established different criteria for them to remain in the United States legally.

Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, said he opposes amnesty, favors securing the U.S.-Mexico border with a fence, and wants to institute an employment verification system through high-tech identification cards.

"If we can do that, then we can solve our problem with immigration. The answer is not amnesty," Romney said to hearty applause from an audience of more than 150 gathered at New Hampshire Technical College.

McCain spokesman Matt David cited the discrepancy in Romney's statements on the issue, citing his comment last March in which the former governor said he doesn't believe in rounding up 11 million people and forcing them at gunpoint from the country.

"At a time when Senator McCain is working with the White House to solve one of our nation's biggest challenges, factually inaccurate rhetoric might score short-term political points but it does nothing to solve the larger issue," David said.

In December, Romney was embarrassed when it turned out he had used a lawn care company that hired illegal workers.

In the interview posted on the CBN Web site, Romney said of Giuliani: "He is pro-choice, he is pro-gay marriage and anti-gun. That's a tough combination in a Republican primary."

DOJ_NMG_0139080

He also criticized in the interview McCain for opposing a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage. McCain has said marriage is between a man and a woman, but argues the issue should be left to the states.

In his criticisms, Romney drew renewed scrutiny to his own past positions.

In previous campaigns, Romney has said that regardless of his own personal beliefs, abortion should be safe and legal. He changed his position about two years ago and now describes himself as "pro-life." In 1994, he wrote a letter promising a gay Republican group he would be a stronger advocate for gays and their rights than his liberal opponent, Edward M. Kennedy, although Romney says he has always opposed gay marriage.

In the past, Romney emphasized his support of gun-control measures. In 1994, he said: "I don't line up with the NRA." In August, he became a card-carrying National Rifle Association member.

Responding to the criticism, Giuliani spokeswoman Katie Levinson said: "Mayor Giuliani has the utmost respect for Governor Romney. The mayor's position on gay marriage has been both clear and consistent — he does not support gay marriage and believes marriage should be between a man a woman."

During a New Hampshire news conference after his town hall meeting, Romney also sought to turn admitted flip-flops from a possible character flaw into a badge of honor. Romney, for example, likened his conversion on abortion to Ronald Reagan's change of heart on the issue.

"If you had somebody in the private sector who didn't change their mind when they knew they were wrong, you fired them because they were stubborn," said Romney, a former venture capitalist. "I'm happy to admit when I make mistakes and go on. And my experience is that to the voters, the response is overwhelmingly positive: 'We've got a guy who'll admit his mistakes, tell us what he's going to do and he'll honor that.' "

Giuliani Leads In Spartanburg County Straw Poll (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, March 2, 2007

SPARTANBURG, S.C. - In a sign of what die-hard Republicans may think of the field of presidential contenders, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani was leading 10 other candidates Thursday in a straw poll in conservative Spartanburg County.

With 81 of 92 precincts reporting, Giuliani garnered 158 votes. California Rep. Duncan Hunter was running in a close second with 152 votes and Arizona Sen. John McCain was third with 116 votes, according to county GOP officials.

Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback had 83 votes, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney had 80 votes and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee rounded out the front-runners with 21 votes.

The voting isn't binding and comes as the county party goes about the business of organizing precincts and ultimately sending people to its county convention and the state GOP convention in May.

People attending meetings starting at 7 p.m. could vote for one of 11 GOP candidates who have said they're running for the nomination or have set up exploratory committees.

Rick Beltram, the county's GOP chairman, said before the straw poll he expected fewer than 2,000 people to vote. After the voting, he blamed rainy weather for the low turnout and slow counting, which will resume Friday morning.

A spokesman for Giuliani said the numbers, while small overall, were encouraging.

"I think this is one small event of a very, very, long campaign, but it's a clear indication that the mayor's message of leadership and his proven track record is resonating," Elliot Bundy said.

Hunter's strong second-place showing proves his potential in a conservative area, his campaign said.

"What is such a relief to us is, we've always known we're the conservative alternative, and we kept hearing on the news that there's not a real conservative in the race," spokesman Roy Tyler said. "Well, there is now."

McCain's third place finish is not a reflection of his strength in South Carolina, campaign spokesman Adam Temple said.

"There's going to be many polls between now and election day," Temple said.

Romney's campaign said they were pleased with the former governor's finish.

"I think we outperformed where we've been, where all the public polls that had us at 5 and 6 percent," spokesman Terry Sullivan said.

Selective School Choice (WSJ)

By Clint Bolick

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

There's something about our nation's capital that converts many leading Democrats to school choice. Perhaps it's the glimpse that Washington, D.C. affords into inner-city public schools.

DOJ_NMG_0139081

But in most cases this appreciation of school choice extends only to their own children -- and not to the millions of children in failing public schools. Indeed, a nearly perfect correlation exists among Democratic presidential candidates who have exercised school choice for their own children and those who would deny such choices to the parents of other children.

When the Clintons came to Washington, D.C. in 1993, they could choose any public school for Chelsea. Being responsible parents of means, Bill and Hillary Clinton sent her instead to the elite private Sidwell Friends School. Two years later Mr. Clinton vetoed a bill that would have allowed low-income D.C. parents to use public funds to send their children to private schools. (A subsequent version of that program was signed into law by George W. Bush.)

And today presidential candidate Mrs. Clinton continues to stridently oppose school choice. In a speech to the National Education Association she vowed "never to abandon our public schools" -- speaking apparently as a politician, not a parent.

John Edwards, Mr. Populist, decries that "America has two school systems -- one for the affluent and one for everyone else." He should know. When he joined the U.S. Senate he sent his children to a religious school because, according to USA Today, the D.C. "public schools are deeply troubled." Mr. Edwards, however, opposes private school choice for low-income families on the curious grounds that this would "drain resources" from public schools. By such logic Mr. Edwards himself "drained" approximately $132,000 from the D.C. public schools.

Al Gore, who may yet join the presidential race, has said empathetically, "If I was a parent of a child who went to an inner-city school that was failing, I might be for vouchers, too." But he isn't, and so he is not. Mr. Gore sent all of his children to elite private schools in the nation's capital, like the one he attended growing up. But he militantly opposes school choice for low-income families.

There is only one Democratic aspirant who sent his children exclusively to public schools, and he was also the only one who signed a school choice bill into law in his own state: former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who withdrew from the race when his candidacy failed to gain traction. And there is only one candidate -- Sen. Joe Biden -- who has both sent his children to private school and supported school choice for others.

The mystery man is Sen. Barack Obama, who sends his child to a private school in Chicago yet once referred to school vouchers as "social Darwinism." Still, he says that on education reform, "I think a good place to start would be for both Democrats and Republicans to say . . . we are willing to experiment and invest in anything that works."

Well, school choice works. Every study that compares children who applied for school choice scholarships and received them with those who applied but did not shows improved academic performance. More important, every study that has examined the effect of school choice competition has found significantly improved performance by public schools.

Given their track records it is doubtful how many candidates will agree with Sen. Obama's professed openness to experiment. But as he might say, we can always have the audacity to hope.

Mr. Bolick is president and general counsel of the Alliance for School Choice and senior fellow at the Goldwater Institute.

Washington: Impeachment Resolution Urged (NYT)

By Martin Stolz

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Mayor Rocky Anderson of Salt Lake City appeared before a committee of the State Senate in Olympia in support of a resolution asking Congress to begin impeachment proceedings against President Bush. Mr. Anderson, a Democrat, said the case for impeachment was not partisan. He said the president should face impeachment for “heinous human rights violations, breaches of trust, abuses of power injurious to the nation, war crimes, misleading Congress and the American people,” among other reasons. Mr. Anderson also submitted a 22-page, heavily footnoted statement to legislators.

Latest Reports On Iran And North Korea Show A Newfound Caution Among Analysts (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — For more than three years, American intelligence officials have insisted that they learned from their mistakes in the months leading to the Iraq war, when murky information about Saddam Hussein’s weapons programs was presented as fact and inconclusive judgments were hardened into statements of near certainty.

The more calibrated intelligence assessments that have come to light in recent weeks, particularly on Iran and North Korea, appear to show a new willingness by American spy agencies to concede the limits of their knowledge.

The new caution reflects adherence to what some officials now call “the Powell Rule.” That rule is intended to avoid a repetition of former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell’s humiliation after the satellite photos and intercepted communications he presented to the United Nations Security Council as proof that Iraq was stockpiling banned weapons turned out to be nothing of the sort.

DOJ_NMG_0139082

It was in large part because of the Iraq intelligence debacle that top intelligence officials over the past year have overhauled the way in which they pass judgments about some of the world's most difficult spying targets, including Iran and North Korea. The new operating approach is intended to ensure that intelligence is solid before it is publicly presented, and even then, that clear distinctions are made between facts and inferences.

Intelligence professionals have several motivations for the new approach. Those include protecting their own credibility and ensuring that assessments can stand up to careful scrutiny in the wake of multiple government investigations condemning the prewar intelligence assessments about Iraq. Officials also said that greater caution had become ever more necessary because of increasing inexperience in the work force; about 50 percent of current intelligence analysts have less than five years of experience.

At the same time, the use of specific, careful language is seen by intelligence professionals as a barrier that can help to prevent intelligence assessments from being exaggerated, twisted or otherwise misused by policy makers to advance specific agendas.

Under the new guidelines, the assessments produced by intelligence agencies must include detailed descriptions of the subjects on which analysts disagree, and analysts must now "show their work" by including in their judgments the chain of logic that led them to their conclusions.

Intelligence analysis has always been more art than science, and in recent statements, American intelligence officials have laid bare the limits of what they believe they know about Iran and North Korea. Officials have said they are certain that Iranian paramilitary groups are providing lethal bomb material to Iraqi Shiite groups, but they do not know whether this support has been approved at the highest levels of government in Tehran.

In testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee this week, Mike McConnell, the new director of national intelligence, said that it was possible Iran could produce a nuclear weapon by the beginning of the next decade, but that it was also possible Iran would not develop a weapon until 2015. At the same hearing, another top official acknowledged publicly that the American intelligence agencies were less certain today than they were five years ago about whether North Korea was pursuing a clandestine uranium enrichment program.

John D. Negroponte formalized the new analytical procedures in a directive issued in January, one of his last acts as director of national intelligence. The directive stated that "the analytic process must be as transparent as possible" and that "analysis must be objective and independent of political considerations."

The pre-emptive war doctrine that President Bush has articulated since the Sept. 11 attacks holds that the United States has an obligation take action against security threats before they fully materialize. A corollary embraced by the White House has held that policy makers must assume the worst about the intentions of adversaries, even with imperfect intelligence about their intentions and capabilities.

That worst-case approach was very much on display when Mr. Bush said with certainty in 2002 and 2003 that Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons. On North Korea, Mr. Bush said in November 2002 that "contrary to an agreement they had with the United States, they're enriching uranium, with the desire of developing a weapon."

As intelligence agencies have backed away from those views, some former officials worry that the Iraq experience may cause the pendulum to swing too far in the direction of circumspection. They say that they hope the administration does not accept at face value the denials from North Korea and Iran about their banned weapons programs.

"I worry about that, but I am not willing to accept that doomsday is upon us," said John R. Bolton, who stepped down in December as ambassador to the United Nations after it was clear he would not win Senate confirmation. Mr. Bolton said he still believed that policy makers would not allow intelligence analysts' new caution to soften the United States' policies toward its enemies too much.

The intelligence community's renewed emphasis on debate and dissent has been reflected in decisions about which officials earned promotions in the aftermath of the Iraq intelligence failures.

Thomas Fingar, who once ran the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, is now in charge of all analysis for the director of national intelligence.

It was Mr. Fingar's State Department office in 2002 that produced one of the most significant dissents to that year's National Intelligence Estimate, now discredited, challenging the majority view that Iraq had bought aluminum tubes to build up its nuclear weapons program.

During an interview late last year, Mr. Fingar said it was now his job to ensure there was as much competitive analysis as possible before intelligence reports were completed, if only to avoid a repeat of the 2002 N.I.E. findings, which were pivotal to the Senate vote that authorized the Iraq war.

"The basic idea is to avoid a premature rush to an artificial consensus," Mr. Fingar said. "The interesting thing is not when analysts agree. It's when they disagree."

DOJ_NMG_0139083

Analysis: U.S. Intel On Nukes In Doubt (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, March 2, 2007

New doubts are arising about the accuracy of U.S. intelligence on the nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran, only a few years after faulty warnings about weapons of mass destruction helped President Bush justify the invasion of Iraq.

North Korea agreed earlier this month to dismantle its plutonium-producing nuclear facilities in exchange for economic aid and security assurances from the United States and four other world or regional powers. The pact successfully put aside for now the possibility of military action.

But the Western standoff with Iran remains tense. The Bush administration says it won't rule out an attack if Tehran refuses to end its nuclear enrichment program.

However, in both cases, once-strident U.S. pronouncements about the programs — which raised the tension level with Pyongyang and Tehran along with Saddam Hussein's Iraq — are apparently being replaced by less alarming assessments.

Just weeks after the Feb. 13 six-nation pact with North Korea, new U.S. statements suggest that Washington might have overstated a purported secret North Korean second-track nuclear program. The result was that it derailed what could have been a peaceful resolution to the North Korean issue more than four years ago.

The U.S. alleged then that North Korea had a large-scale gas centrifuge plant for uranium enrichment — the same program Iran now is developing. The Bush administration used that information to scrap a plan developed under the Clinton administration to supply energy to the North in exchange for its pledge to mothball its plutonium program.

Tensions rose and Pyongyang withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in January 2003, sparking the process that led to its test of an atomic weapon late last year.

Now, however, Bush administration officials are toning down assertions that such a program had been developed. Intelligence official Joseph DeTrani, in testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Tuesday belief that such a program exists was now "at the mid-confidence level."

The "mid-confidence" terminology means that analysts have differing views or credible information exists but has not been fully corroborated. That's a notable departure from the previous U.S. view of "high confidence" that the North was working on such activities.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Wednesday that the U.S. knows that North Korea has bought equipment that could be used only for uranium enrichment. But he expressed uncertainty about the program's current state.

"How far they've gotten, whether they've actually been able to produce highly enriched uranium at this time — I mean these are issues that intelligence analysts grapple with," Hill told a hearing of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. "But what we know is they have made the purchases, and we need to have complete clarity on this program."

A U.S. government official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the subject's sensitivity, said there was no change in the intelligence assessment. Degrees of certainty were always reflected in the CIA's judgment, the official said.

The U.S. intelligence community found with "high confidence" in 2002 that North Korea obtained components that could be used to enrich uranium. However, there has always been less confidence in the analysis of what precisely North Korea planned to do with the components, the official said.

It was a worst-case scenario when a CIA paper in 2002 stated that the plant "could produce enough weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year when fully operational — which could be as soon as mid-decade."

The next line of the paper highlighted the uncertainty, reminding readers that North Korea's nuclear program was "a difficult intelligence collection target."

Bush said on Nov. 7 of that year that Pyongyang was "enriching uranium, with the desire of developing a weapon."

Chief U.N nuclear inspector Mohamed ElBaradei has been invited to Pyongyang in mid-March for a visit expected to result in the return of his inspectors after a four-year hiatus.

The U.S. intelligence record on Iran's nuclear activities also is being questioned.

Several senior diplomats familiar with work of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, which ElBaradei heads, told The Associated Press that while U.S. intelligence helped reveal Iran's secret nuclear program in 2002, none of the information provided the U.N. nuclear watchdog by American spy agencies since then had led to meaningful leads. Still unproven is whether Tehran is using the cover of a nuclear power plant program to try to make atomic weapons.

One of the diplomats — who, like others demanded anonymity because he was discussing confidential information — said that in the case of Iran, lack of good intelligence was due to "no presence on the ground." Intelligence is increasingly scarce because "the Iranians have tightened up on their operations" since the 2002 revelations about their secret uranium enrichment program, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0139084

Broad assessments often hinge on detailed information about equipment, which can be difficult to prove.

For North Korea, a key U.S. assertion that Pyongyang was trying to create an industrial-scale uranium enrichment program parallel to its plutonium operations was based on evidence that the North Koreans had purchased or were trying to buy thousands of highly machined aluminum tubes, he said. The CIA cited Iraqi purchases of such tubes to support its assertion about a purported nuclear weapons program under Saddam.

A CIA fact sheet made public four years ago claimed "clear evidence indicating that the North has begun constructing a centrifuge facility," and estimated it could produce material for at least two or more nuclear weapons a year by 2005.

Former U.N. nuclear inspector David Albright, who recently visited Pyongyang and held talks on the North's nuclear program, does not question U.S. assertions that the North bought a few dozen centrifuges from the same Pakistani black market network that supplied Iran's program.

"However, a large centrifuge plant likely does not exist; perhaps it never did," says Albright in a report of his Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security that tracks the North Korean and Iranian nuclear programs.

The diplomat agreed, noting it made no sense for the energy-starved North — which is to get the equivalent of up to 1 million tons of heavy fuel oil under the nuclear disarmament deal — to run such a program consuming record amounts of power at a time it was making good progress on its plutonium-based arms program.

Problems At The Parks? But How? (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The National Park Service has developed a PowerPoint presentation touting President Bush's new and widely supported Centennial Challenge to boost funding for the national parks leading up to the service's 2016 centennial celebration.

The presentation's cover photo neatly shows Bush backdropped by Washington, Jefferson, Teddy Roosevelt-- the champion of the park system -- and Lincoln at Mount Rushmore.

Back in August 2002, when the shot was taken, Bush, soaring in the polls, seemed a strong candidate to join the Great Ones. Chances seem to have diminished a bit of late.

The cover photo has quotes overlaid from speeches by Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson and John F. Kennedy along with Bush's presidential message last year on the 90th anniversary of the Park Service.

The presentation notes that despite overwhelming public support and "the commitment of the Administration," there are certain challenges. "Operating budgets have not kept pace" with needs and the parks have been hurt by "shrinking staff and aging facilities."

Unclear who might bear responsibility for those occurrences. Maybe Congress and the administration? Maybe some natural phenomenon, like El NiÃ±o or something?Doug Feith, in His Own Words

The nation apparently continues to be roiled by the Feb. 8 report by Pentagon Inspector General Thomas Gimble accusing former undersecretary of defense for policy Doug Feith of "inappropriate" actions in challenging the intelligence community's assessments in the run-up to the war in Iraq, soon to be entering its fifth year.

Fortunately, Feith, after several solid TV appearances and a lengthy op-ed in this paper after the report came out, is staying on the offensive. On Wednesday, Feith Fans got an e-mail from him:

I have created a website that contains articles and information on this DOD IG report. The website is www.dougfeith.com. You may want to take a look. I plan to use it to continue posting informative items about the IG report. I will soon add material on other subjects. . . .

Stay tuned.

On the site, Feith says he "created this website to provide accurate information and sound commentary on the IG report controversy" -- a raging controversy perhaps only briefly overshadowed by Anna Nicole Smith and Britney Spears.

There is a section called "Media Myths vs. Facts." Nothing there but a note promising "More information coming soon."

Better still for his fans, Feith -- now a teacher at Georgetown University, a visiting scholar at Harvard's Kennedy School and a distinguished visiting fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford -- is working on a memoir of his five years at the Pentagon. It's to be published, perhaps late this year, by HarperCollins and promises to put into context Feith's contributions to the administration's efforts to launch the war.

Since former CIA director George Tenet's book, which is not likely to deal kindly with Feith, is due out this spring, be sure to frequently check the Web site, http://www.dougfeith.com.

If you've never heard of Feith, there's a handy tab: "About Doug Feith" with a brief bio and with his own "Remarks at My Farewell and Award Ceremony" at the Pentagon in August 2005.Moving On

DOJ_NMG_0139085

Ken Mehlman, former Republican National Committee chairman and before that White House political director, is heading back to Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld.

Mehlman practiced law for three years at the firm before entering politics. He worked on the House side for two Texas representatives and later served as national field director for the Bush campaign in 2000 and campaign manager in '04.

Meanwhile, Thomas DiNanno, deputy assistant secretary for infrastructure protection at the Department of Homeland Security, is leaving after six years in the administration to join the International Assessment and Strategy Center in Alexandria consulting on infrastructure-protection issues.

That leaves only one member of the original Tom Ridge White House-DHS team still on board -- the assistant secretary for infrastructure, Bob Stephan. DiNanno was recently tasked with building the department's chemical security office, leaves a small but dedicated staff pushing hard to meet a congressionally mandated April 4 deadline to work up a regulation to secure about 20,000 U.S. chemical plants.Harmonic Convergences Dept.

The fox? The henhouse? The White House yesterday said it had tapped Michael E. Baroody, longtime top official and most recently executive vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers, to be chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission.

Baroody started his career in 1970 working for Sens. Roman Hruska (R-Neb.) and Bob Dole (R-Kan.) and then moved on to the Republican National Committee, the Reagan White House and the Department of Labor. He joined NAM in 1990 and served as senior vice president for policy and communications.

He was seen as the main internal candidate to succeed NAM President Jerry Jasinowski, who retired in 2004, but lost out to former Michigan governor John Engler. Insiders say Engler effectively sidelined Baroody.

In a statement yesterday, Engler said that "this is an excellent nomination and is in everyone's interest."Thanks -- I Think

This week's Emily Litella award . . .

Reporters yesterday pressed White House spokeswoman Dana Perino on news reports that the administration is backing away from its absolute claims that North Korea has a uranium-enrichment program. This was based on intelligence the White House used to buttress its case that the regime was part of the "Axis of Evil."

"Have you checked into this North Korea story," a reporter asked, "what -- exactly what our intelligence says about the North Korean uranium-enrichment program?"

"I did try to check into it," Perino said. "I think what I need to do is refer you to the intelligence community." Ah, yes, a crowd long known for on-the-record briefings on its sources and process. "We've said for a long time," she said, that "North Korea is an opaque regime," so it's hard to be sure what they're doing.

"I'm sure the intelligence community continually tried to assess and reassess and look at the information that they have," she said. "What we do know is that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon. . . . So, from our standpoint, that's what we know is happening at the moment. In regards to intel and what they knew and when they knew it, I think I'd have to refer you back to them."

Never mind.

A Suddenly Convenient Truth (NYT)

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

We would like to believe that the Bush administration has finally figured out how dangerous and counterproductive it is to hype intelligence — and that that's why officials are admitting they're not sure North Korea ever got very far with a secret uranium-based nuclear program. But we doubt it.

It was just last month that intelligence officials, with their bosses' clear blessings, were insisting that Iran's leaders had personally ordered the smuggling of especially lethal roadside bombs into Iraq. At least they did until the Pentagon's top general admitted that no one knew who in Iran was really calling those shots, and President Bush announced that it didn't matter anyway.

So we suspect that this week's confessions of doubt about North Korea had less to do with a sudden burst of candor than the fact that Pyongyang has agreed to readmit nuclear inspectors — who probably won't be able to find the active uranium enrichment program the administration has been alleging for more than four years. Add to that the White House's eagerness for a diplomatic win in these bleak times — and its insistence that a nuclear deal cannot go ahead if the North is believed to be hiding things — and you understand why the White House might find this truth so convenient.

Late may be better than never, but it isn't nearly enough to make up for the damage caused. And we haven't even raised the issue of Iraq and its long-gone weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0139086

Let's be clear. The North Koreans had and have an illicit nuclear arms program. They tested a device from their plutonium-based program last October. And Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, has admitted that North Korea bought some 20 centrifuges — useful only for enriching uranium — from Abdul Qadeer Khan's nuclear black market.

The problem is that the Bush administration eagerly spun those 20 centrifuges into an industrial-scale enrichment program, and then used it as an excuse to scuttle a Clinton-era deal to close down the North's plutonium-based weapons program. Four years later, the North set off that test.

And while we are pleased that the administration has finally managed to negotiate an agreement to start shutting down the North's nuclear complex, there is no guarantee that Pyongyang will ever give up its weapons.

If that's not bad enough, consider some frightening truths. There is no doubt that Iran is moving ever closer to mastering the skills it will need to produce the fuel for a nuclear weapon — and blithely defying the Security Council's demand that it stop. But even America's closest European allies have little stomach for a showdown with Tehran, while Russia and China have strong economic incentives to look the other way. Which means that Washington is the only one left out there to warn the world about the dangers of a nuclear-capable Iran.

Make no mistake: there are real and present dangers out there. But who still believes warnings from this White House?

Another Intelligence Twist (WP)

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

ONCE AGAIN the Bush administration is being accused of exaggerating intelligence to justify an aggressive policy toward a rogue regime, with disastrous results. In October 2002 the State Department announced that North Korea had acknowledged secretly developing a uranium enrichment program. The next month the CIA reported to Congress that it had "recently learned that the North is constructing a plant that could produce enough weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year when fully operational -- which could be as soon as mid-decade." On this basis the administration suspended a deal under which North Korea received fuel oil in exchange for freezing a separate program to produce plutonium. Pyongyang responded by restarting that program and producing enough plutonium for a number of nuclear weapons, one of which it tested last October.

Now administration officials are conceding that outside experts may be right when they say that the North probably never constructed a large uranium-enrichment plant. According to the New York Times, a new intelligence update concludes "with moderate confidence" that the uranium program continues, but it says it's not known how much progress has been made. Christopher R. Hill, the principal U.S. negotiator with North Korea, told Congress on Wednesday that it's debatable "whether they've actually been able to produce highly enriched uranium."

Clearly there's a basis for investigation about whether the 2002 CIA estimate was justified. But it's also worth underlining that the issue here is not whether North Korea sought a uranium enrichment capacity. The uncertainty is about how far the program advanced. That distinction makes a difference both in reconsidering the Bush administration's actions in 2002 and judging how the problem should be managed in the new disarmament negotiations with the North beginning next week.

What the administration knew in 2002 -- and what remains uncontested now -- is that North Korea secretly obtained 20 centrifuges for uranium enrichment from Pakistan and purchased other equipment needed to construct a large-scale enrichment facility. When U.S. officials confronted the North Koreans at a bilateral negotiation session, members of a U.S. diplomatic team received what they believed was a defiant confirmation. That tipped an internal administration debate toward hard-liners who all along had wanted to renounce the Clinton administration's "agreed framework" with Pyongyang.

No doubt those hard-liners made use of the CIA's conclusions about a factory under construction. Yet even without that intelligence some action would have been warranted. The United States and its allies were supplying Pyongyang with food and energy on the assumption that its nuclear program was frozen, only to discover that it had covertly begun work in another area. It would have been foolish to ignore such activity by a criminal regime.

Similarly, the weakening of the intelligence about an ongoing uranium program does not mean that the United States can drop the issue in the next phase of negotiations. On the contrary, a crucial test of the diplomatic process will be whether the North will reveal what it did with the centrifuges and other materials it is known to have acquired. Pyongyang's response will show whether it, like the Bush administration, is more inclined to conduct serious negotiations than it was four years ago.

Uranium Do-Over (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Things sure are looking up for Kim Jong Il. The North Korean dictator has already been promised 50,000 tons of fuel oil and eased sanctions in return for one more pledge to give up his nuclear weapons. And now, even before he has to declare all of his nuclear facilities, the Bush Administration appears to be backing down from its own intelligence judgments on North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0139087

That's the meaning of this week's disclosure at a Senate hearing by Administration spook Joseph DeTrani about Pyongyang's uranium enrichment program. Asked for an update by Rhode Island's Jack Reed, the new Director of National Intelligence Michael McConnell invited Mr. DeTrani to address the issue. Mr. DeTrani replied that while the U.S. had previously had "high confidence" about the uranium effort, now it was only "at the mid-confidence level."

Keep in mind that the uranium program is separate from the plutonium that Kim has already used to explode a nuclear device. Confronted with U.S. intelligence in 2002, North Korean officials admitted to the secret uranium effort in a face to face meeting with then Assistant Secretary of State Jim Kelly. Such an effort violated both the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and the Agreed Framework that Kim had signed with the Clinton Administration. The North Koreans have since denied saying that, or having any such program, but U.S. intelligence has claimed to have solid evidence that it did.

What's changed now? Mr. DeTrani didn't elaborate, but the timing of this intelligence walk-down is certainly strange. Under the six-party accord signed in Beijing on February 13, North Korea has 60 days to come clean about all of its nuclear programs and facilities. By telegraphing to Kim that the U.S. has new doubts about his uranium plans, the Bush Administration is all but inviting Kim to declare as little as possible. The flip-flop has all the earmarks of the intelligence community trying to cover its own keister if Kim does precisely that.

This is all the more bizarre given the volumes of public evidence that North Korea's uranium-enrichment program is very real. Following North Korea's admission in 2002, numerous Bush officials made the rounds discussing what they knew. "The enriched uranium issue, some have assumed, is somewhere off in the fog of the distant future. It is not," Mr. Kelly told the Senate in March 2003. "It is only probably a matter of months, and not years, behind the plutonium."

Richard Armitage, then Deputy Secretary of State and hardly a neocon, said at the time that North Korea was acquiring "many more [centrifuges] than was orginally thought." And he added that North Korea had been "intent on going to a full-up production program" starting from "at least" February 2000.

Don't believe Bush officials? How about Pervez Musharraf? In his recent memoir, the Pakistan President discloses that he learned as early as 1999 that North Koreans were canoodling with Pakistani A.Q. Khan to buy uranium-enrichment technology. "I received a report suggesting that some North Korean nuclear experts, under the guise of missile engineers, had arrived" at Pakistan nuclear labs "and were being given secret briefings," Mr. Musharraf writes.

In his book about the A.Q. Khan network, "Shopping for Bombs," BBC reporter Gordon Corera reports that Mr. Musharraf has admitted that "probably a dozen" centrifuges were sent to North Korea from Pakistan, "both plans and complete devices," as well as "blueprints and designs."

And in May 2002, two Germans were convicted in Stuttgart for trying to ship 22 million tons of aluminum tubing to North Korea. The tubing had been ordered by Yun Ho-Jin, Pyongyang's man at (of all places) the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna. The measurements on the tubing were made to European standards for the kind of vacuum casings used for gas centrifuges to enrich uranium.

Meanwhile, the Washington Post reported in March 2005 that the U.S. found traces of North Korean UF6, or uranium hexafloride, when it dismantled Libya's nuclear program. The Post said Pyongyang had sold the UF6 to Pakistan, which had later sold it to Libya.

All of this is merely what's on the public record. We understand that intelligence is rarely definitive. But if this is what adds up to "mid-confidence level," what does the CIA need for "high"? And what in the world qualifies as a "slam dunk"? * * *

The bigger issue here is what this intelligence reversal suggests about Bush Administration policy. When the February 13 accord was announced, senior officials assured us that it included "all" North Korean nuclear programs, not just plutonium. But now that the U.S. is embarked on an "arms control process," the pressure to keep making unilateral concessions or overlook Kim's transgressions will be great.

Assume that, in its 60-day declaration, North Korea admits some past attempt to buy centrifuge technology but says it's all been destroyed and there's nothing to inspect. Would President Bush really walk away from the talks, amid the inevitable criticism from China, South Korea and the American media? We think we know where the State Department would come out. Chris Hill, State's negotiator with the North, has already hinted that its uranium program isn't that big a deal.

White House officials say President Bush has earned the benefit of the doubt on North Korea and that he'll insist on dismantling all of its nuclear facilities. We hope he's not relying on the U.S. intelligence community to tell him when that's happened.

Come Clean On North Korea (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

HERE WE GO AGAIN. Or do we? In 2002, the U.S. accused North Korea of having a secret program to enrich uranium for nuclear bombs. Alleging that the North had cheated on a deal agreed to eight years earlier, Washington cut off heavy fuel oil shipments. In response, Pyongyang accused the Bush administration of reneging on the deal, fired up its mothballed plutonium plant and, last fall, detonated an atomic bomb. Only now are U.S. officials admitting there was some question about the intelligence they relied on.

DOJ_NMG_0139088

At the time, the Bush administration seemed confident of its case against Pyongyang. It told Congress in 2002 that the CIA had "clear evidence indicating that the North had begun constructing a centrifuge facility" to spin uranium for nuclear weapons and that the plant could be operational "as soon as mid-decade." In 2003, it told allies the plant was 18 months away from producing the fissile material needed for a bomb.

On Wednesday, however, the chief U.S. negotiator to North Korea, Christopher R. Hill, back-pedaled hard while testifying on Capitol Hill. If the U.S. determines that there is a uranium program, he said, "it's got to go," adding: "How far they've gotten, whether they've been able to actually produce highly enriched uranium at this time … we need to have complete clarity on this program."

Indeed we do. Did the Bush administration rush to provoke a crisis with North Korea on sketchy evidence, trashing a flawed but workable arms-control agreement? Administration hawks had been on record for years opposing the 1994 deal. Did they "spin" the intelligence to justify preordained policies? Beijing has always disputed Washington's allegations. On the other hand, it's indisputable that North Korea bought centrifuges from Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan.

Cynics may even wonder whether the administration, having opted for a deal with North Korea, may be downplaying for political purposes the significance of the very intelligence it once cited as proof of Pyongyang's malevolence. Some might even ask why it matters what the administration knew then — and with what degree of certainty — given that North Korea has already tested a plutonium bomb. It's because the U.S. has declared itself the world's nuclear watchdog, refusing to be bound by the decisions of the International Atomic Energy Agency or the U.N. Security Council.

Yet for the second time, serious questions have been raised about the credibility of U.S. assessments of the potential nuclear threat posed by an enemy nation. Are these charges justified? Given the U.S. need to enlist other nations to adopt sanctions to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions and deal with other proliferation challenges, that's a question that demands an answer.

N. Korea Reasserts Pledge To Denuclearize (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

SEOUL, March 1 -- North Korea's No. 2 leader reiterated Thursday his country's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons, as the impoverished nation sought a resumption of aid in its first high-level talks with South Korea since conducting an atomic test.

Kim Yong Nam said that "the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula is the dying wish" of the country's founding president, Kim Il Sung, who died in 1994. North Korea "will make efforts to realize it," he told South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jae Joung in Pyongyang, the North's capital.

Lee pressed for North Korea to follow through on its breakthrough Feb. 13 agreement with the United States and four other countries to shut down its sole operating nuclear reactor in 60 days, and to eventually dismantle all its atomic programs.

Kim Yong Nam also called for the two Koreas to work together to reunify the peninsula, which remains officially at war because the 1950-53 Korean War ended in a cease-fire, not a peace treaty.

South Korea has been one of the North's main aid sources since leaders of the two nations held their first and only summit in 2000. This week marks the 20th cabinet-level talks since then.

The North wants to resume separate discussions this month on economic cooperation that would address aid, but South Korea prefers to wait until after April 14 -- the deadline for the North to switch off its nuclear reactor, South Korean journalists said.

N. Korea Again Pledges To End Nuke Program (WT/AP)

By Burt Herman, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

SEOUL -- North Korea's No. 2 leader reiterated yesterday his country's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons, as the impoverished nation sought a resumption of aid at its first high-level talks with South Korea since conducting an atomic test.

Kim Yong-nam said "the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula is the dying wish" of the country's founding president, Kim Il-sung, the father of current leader Kim Jong-il.

North Korea "will make efforts to realize it," he told South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jae-joung in Pyongyang, the North's capital.

DOJ_NMG_0139089

Mr. Lee pressed for North Korea to follow through on its breakthrough Feb. 13 agreement with the United States and four other countries to shut down its sole operating nuclear reactor in 60 days, and to eventually dismantle all its atomic programs.

"It is important to make efforts to ensure that South and North Korea cooperate and six countries each assume their responsibilities," Mr. Lee said.

Kim Yong-nam also called for the two Koreas to work together to reunify the peninsula, which was divided after World War II and remains officially at war since the 1950-53 Korean War ended in a cease-fire, not a peace treaty.

South Korea has been one of the North's main aid sources since the two nations held their first and only summit in 2000. This week's meetings are the 20th Cabinet-level talks since then.

But South Korea halted rice and fertilizer shipments to the North after it test-fired a barrage of missiles in July, and relations worsened following North Korea's Oct. 9 underground nuclear test.

The provocations were the most serious challenge yet to South Korea's "sunshine" policy of engagement with its longtime foe, which has been criticized by conservatives for helping prop up the North's totalitarian regime without requiring reforms or disarmament.

South Korea has been hesitant at this week's talks, which run through today, to immediately restart aid without seeing the North take real steps to dismantle its nuclear program.

The North wants to resume separate discussions this month on economic cooperation that would address aid, but South Korea prefers to wait until after April 14 -- the deadline for Pyongyang to switch off its nuclear reactor, pool reports from South Korean journalists at the talks said.

However, the South may offer a limited amount of fertilizer if the North agrees to other conditions, such as resuming reunions of families split between the Koreas, the pool reports said. The sides may also agree on conducting trial runs of trains on restored rails across the border.

Earlier over dinner, the North's main negotiator at the talks, Senior Cabinet Councilor Kwon Ho-ung, said "a wide road will be opened for the drastic development of North-South relations" if certain measures are implemented. He did not specify them.

Last month's six-nation nuclear agreement has raised hopes it will foster a relaxation of regional tensions, since the deal also provides for North Korea to hold talks to normalize ties with Japan and the United States, both of which are scheduled to begin next week.

The nuclear pact also calls for negotiations to finally establish a peace agreement between the Koreas.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun urged in a speech yesterday in Seoul that the agreement "be successfully implemented so that a peace regime can be firmly established on the Korean Peninsula."

U.S., North Korea Soften Their Stances (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Two weeks after signing a deal aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear-weapons program, the Communist nation and the U.S. are showing signs of softening toward one another.

Negotiators from both sides plan to meet Monday to discuss steps toward normalizing relations 54 years after the end of the Korean War. The meetings, the first of their kind in more than six years, come as President Bush's administration eases assessments of how advanced North Korea's nuclear program may be. The U.S. is close to resolving a high-profile crackdown, launched in September 2005, on a Macau bank used by the North Korean government.

Under the Feb. 13 agreement, North Korea promised within 60 days to shut down its Pyongyang nuclear plant, allow international inspectors back in and provide a list of its nuclear-weapons activities. In return, it will receive energy and economic assistance from the U.S. and other countries with which it negotiated, including China, Russia and South Korea.

A similar arrangement fell apart in late 2002 when the Bush administration accused Pyongyang of pursuing a secret uranium-enrichment program. The North Koreans ejected international inspectors and pushed ahead with their missile and nuclear-weapons programs, testing a nuclear device in October.

Yet U.S. officials are saying while they know North Korea purchased equipment and specialty products typically used in a uranium program, they have no strong evidence the country processed highly enriched uranium. Chinese diplomats have told the U.S. repeatedly that Beijing believes North Korea had no uranium program, U.S. officials said.

North Korea boasted of having nuclear weapons last year but has denied having a uranium-enrichment program. The U.S. assertion that North Korea was working on a secret uranium-enrichment program set off the 2002 crisis.

In congressional testimony this week, diplomatic and intelligence officials expressed doubt about how much progress North Korea has made in researching or developing uranium-based weapons. The U.S. national intelligence director's mission manager for North Korea, Joseph DeTrani, categorized the U.S. belief that North Korea was seeking a uranium-production program "at the mid-confidence level," meaning it lacked corroboration. Previously, it had been categorized at "high confidence."

DOJ_NMG_0139090

U.S. officials have said there is no clear-cut evidence North Korea has any nuclear-weapons arsenal. The U.S. suspects North Korea has amassed at least 50 kilograms of plutonium and has made great strides in missile development. "But weaponization is very hard to get at," said one senior U.S. official. Even the October test remains murky, the official said, with U.S. intelligence analysts able to say only that it was "a high-explosives test" that emitted some detectable radiation.

"What we really need to do is track down where is the fissile material," the official said, referring to the stored plutonium North Korea is known to have.

North Korea has gone out of its way to appear cooperative since last month's agreement. It has sent an envoy to New York and Hanoi and has even taken down propaganda signs put up after the October test, said South Korean reporters visiting Pyongyang this week. It has invited the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, to visit Pyongyang; he is expected to go in mid-March.

Macao Signals Release Of Funds (FT)

By Tom Mitchell

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Deposits frozen during an investigation into a Macao bank the US suspects of acting as an illicit conduit for North Korean funds could be released by the end of this month, according to an executive for a company whose accounts have been affected.

Colin McAskill, who heads Hong Kong-based Koryo Asia, said the head of a Macao government-appointed committee now in charge of Banco Delta Asia told him recently that some of the $24m in deposits frozen during the investigation could be released soon. The Macao official, Hurculano de Sousa, did not return calls seeking comment on Thursday.

Koryo Asia controls Pyongyang's Daedong Credit Bank, which has $7m in affected deposits at the Macao bank. Approximately $2.6m of this belongs to British American Tobacco, which makes cigarettes in North Korea.

Mr de Sousa heads a three-man committee appointed by the Macao government to manage Banco Delta Asia after US accusations that it was helping the North Korean regime launder money led to a run on the bank in September 2005.

Mr McAskill said the Macao and US governments were sending mixed messages.

Daniel Glaser, a US Treasury department official, visited Macao earlier this week to discuss the two governments' separate investigations into the bank. While Mr Glaser and other US officials reiterated their intention to resolve the crack-down on North Korea's overseas financial activities, they have not yet indicated they will ease the pressure on Banco Delta Asia.

During his visit Mr Glaser said the Treasury department's investigation included the review of more than 300,000 documents.

"There is a direct conflict between what Glaser is saying and what the Macao government told me," Mr McAskill said on Thursday.

US officials declined to comment.

It is not clear whether the Macao government might release some of the affected funds but hold back others.

"Let's be frank. I'm not interested in the other money, I'm interested in our money," Mr McAskill said.

North Korea's number two leader reiterated on Thursday his country's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons, as the impoverished nation sought a resumption of aid at its first high-level talks with South Korea since conducting an atomic test, AP reports from Seoul.

Kim Yong-nam said denuclearisation was "the dying wish" of the country's founding president, Kim Il-sung, the father of current leader Kim Jong-il.

U.S. Claims On North Korea Come Under Scrutiny (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay And Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration, which used some false and exaggerated intelligence to make its case for invading Iraq, also may have inflated some of its allegations against North Korea to justify a hard-line policy toward the Stalinist regime.

President Bush claimed in 2002 that North Korea was making highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons when there was no intelligence that it was doing so.

Now there are new questions about the administration's assertions that a bank in Macau knowingly laundered proceedings from North Korean narcotics trafficking, cigarette smuggling and counterfeit American currency.

DOJ_NMG_0139091

An audit of the Banco Delta Asia's finances by accounting firm Ernst & Young found no evidence that the bank had facilitated North Korean money-laundering, either by circulating counterfeit U.S. bank notes or by knowingly sheltering illicit earnings of the North Korean government.

In a filing submitted to the Treasury Department last October, Heller Ehrman LLP, the bank's New York law firm, reported that an audit by the government of Macau also had found no evidence of money-laundering.

The Treasury Department refused to discuss the findings of either audit, as did the government of Macau and Ernst & Young.

Taken together, the pronouncements raised questions about whether the administration has been overstating its case against North Korea, a heavily armed communist dictatorship that Bush included in his "axis of evil" with Iran and Iraq under the late dictator Saddam Hussein.

The White House didn't respond immediately to a request for comment.

The Bush administration used its charges against Pyongyang to justify a hard-line policy that led the regime of Kim Jong Il to end an eight-year freeze on plutonium production. It then harvested enough plutonium for as many as a dozen nuclear weapons and conducted its first nuclear test explosion in October.

Meanwhile, talks with North Korea on ending its nuclear program collapsed over the U.S. charge that Pyongyang was laundering counterfeit money and proceeds from other illicit activities through the Macau bank. North Korea walked out of the talks and refused to return until the United States agreed to discuss lifting its restrictions on the Macau bank.

The administration has since softened its stand. Under a deal reached last month, North Korea agreed to give up the nuclear program, and the United States agreed to provide aid to the destitute country and open talks on normalizing relations.

North Korea hasn't publicly acknowledged the Bush administration's charges that it was secretly pursuing uranium enrichment in parallel with its known plutonium production program.

But Bush appears to have gone well beyond what U.S. intelligence could support in describing the advanced state of the North Korean program. At a Nov. 7, 2002, news conference, Bush said that North Korea was enriching uranium in violation of two treaties and a 1994 deal with the United States.

"We discovered that, contrary to an agreement they had with the United States, they're enriching uranium with the desire of developing a nuclear weapon," Bush asserted.

But that same month, an unclassified CIA report to Congress said that North Korea had begun building a plant that could be used for uranium enrichment, but that it wouldn't become operational until at least 2005.

The administration cited the uranium enrichment effort in its decision to halt heavy-fuel oil shipments to energy-starved North Korea under a deal reached in 1994 with the former Clinton administration. The cutoff prompted the North to end the freeze on plutonium production and expel U.N. nuclear inspectors.

Former and current senior U.S. intelligence officials and diplomats involved in Korea policy disclosed that the United States knew with "high confidence" that North Korea was purchasing materials around the world for a uranium enrichment program.

North Korea bought two dozen or so machines - known as centrifuges - that spin uranium hexafluoride gas at supersonic speeds into highly enriched uranium from the same Pakistani scientist who sold nuclear technology to Iran and Libya.

Pyongyang also managed to acquire thousands of aluminum tubes milled precisely to the dimensions of the Pakistani-supplied devices, said James Kelley, the former assistant secretary of state who oversaw talks with North Korea.

But he and other current and former officials said that the United States had no information - and still doesn't - that North Korea has acquired the knowledge or overcame the technical hurdles required to build an industrial-scale enrichment plant with tens of thousands of centrifuges.

"There never was a judgment that they had a uranium enrichment-producing program," former Ambassador Charles Pritchard, who resigned in 2003 as Bush's special envoy to the negotiations, said in an interview.

Pritchard suggested that Bush might simply have misspoken in declaring that North Korea was enriching uranium.

U.S. officials admit that they don't know the current status of the effort.

"It's a complex program. It would require a lot more equipment than we know that they have actually purchased," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the current chief U.S. negotiator, said in a Feb. 22 talk at a Washington think tank. "It requires some production techniques, considerable production techniques, that we are not sure whether they have mastered."

The controversy surrounding the Banco Delta Asia and the North Korean leadership's accounts there may come to a head soon, as the Treasury Department has said it'll conclude its investigation shortly.

The Treasury Department said that its initial allegations against the Banco Delta Asia stand up. But according to the filing by the bank's attorneys, which the Treasury Department hasn't challenged, there was almost no way that North Korea could have laundered counterfeit U.S. currency through the bank.

DOJ_NMG_0139092

Large deposits of North Korean cash were sent to the New York branch of the giant HSBC bank to be run through sophisticated counterfeit-detecting machines, the law firm's filing said. The only evidence of counterfeit currency that Banco Delta Asia found was much earlier, in 1994, and the bank notified local authorities immediately, the filing said.

Progress Made On Possible Iran Sanctions (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, March 2, 2007

The world's major powers made progress Thursday on possible new sanctions against Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment but some differences remain, U.N. diplomats said.

Foreign ministry political directors from the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany held a two hour conference call to discuss what to include in a new U.N. Security Council resolution, the diplomats said.

"They had a good productive discussion during which they made progress in agreeing on the elements of a resolution," the U.S. State Department said in a statement. "A few more issues remain for discussion, and the political directors agreed to convene another conference call on Saturday morning."

The State Department said it expects that ambassadors from the six countries "could begin drafting the text of a resolution next week."

Iran's refusal to freeze all its enrichment-related activities prompted the U.N. Security Council on Dec. 23 to impose sanctions targeting its nuclear and missile programs and persons involved in them. The council gave the country 60 days to halt enrichment or face additional measures.

The International Atomic Energy Agency's report last week that Iran was expanding enrichment instead of suspending it set the stage for new U.N. sanctions to try to pressure Tehran to agree to a freeze ahead of negotiations on its nuclear program.

Iran insists its nuclear program is aimed solely at producing nuclear energy — not nuclear weapons — and it has adamantly refused to halt it.

The six countries, who have been the key players in trying to negotiate with Iran, all believe the initial sanctions have had a positive effect on Tehran, the U.N. diplomats said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the negotiations are private.

Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry said recently the new resolution would be looking at an "incremental" strengthening of sanctions.

Other U.N. diplomats have also used the word "incremental" — an indication that the U.S., Britain and France who might want tough new sanctions will settle for less to ensure that Russia and China, who have close ties to Iran, are on board.

That would ensure that the new resolution can be adopted unanimously — which all six countries appear to want so they can remain united in their stance on Iran.

Some diplomats said the new measure may include travel bans, expand the list of technology and materials countries are banned from making available to Iran, and create stiffer economic sanctions including a ban on export guarantees to Iran, among other options.

China Urges Iran To Return To Nuke Talks (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

China urged Iran on Thursday to halt uranium enrichment and step up efforts to reach a peaceful, negotiated solution to the international dispute over its nuclear program amid a visit by Iran's deputy foreign minister.

"We hope that Iran can give a positive response to the appeal of the international community and faithfully abide by resolution 1737," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang at a regular news briefing.

Iran has ignored a U.N. deadline set in the Dec. 23 resolution to halt the enrichment of uranium, which the U.S. says is part of a secret effort to build nuclear weapons. Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel but highly enriched uranium can be used in an atomic bomb.

In talks with Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister Abbas Araghchi in Beijing Thursday, China's Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing reiterated that China hopes the dispute can be resolved through diplomatic negotiations as soon as possible, a ministry statement said.

Qin said the international community should "keep calm and make efforts, including efforts outside the framework of the U.N. Security Council to push forward the resumption of negotiations."

China has repeatedly spoken out against the use of sanctions and other types of force against Iran but also has been part of discussions focused on finding ways to pressure Iran to suspend enrichment.

Senior diplomats from the five permanent Security Council members and Germany met Monday in London to discuss the issue. Officials in London and Washington said new measures would likely include incremental restrictions on trade and arms.

DOJ_NMG_0139093

However, sharp differences appear to remain between the tough U.S. position and what Russia and China — veto-holding council members with close ties to Iran — are willing to accept.

Iran And Saudis Plan Summit Talks On Crises (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah And Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, March 1 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran will visit Saudi Arabia on Saturday for a summit meeting with King Abdullah intended to tackle the Middle East's growing sectarian and political crises, Iranian officials said Thursday.

The visit, Mr. Ahmadinejad's first state visit to Saudi Arabia, was initiated by Iran, said a former Saudi official with knowledge of the discussions.

It marks the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts by the two regional powers, as well as other Arab countries, to settle the political standoff in Lebanon, cool sectarian violence in Iraq and possibly even avert a looming confrontation with the United States.

To some the trip is seen as a defensive move by an increasingly isolated Iran while to others it marks the start of another public relations offensive for the bellicose president.

"When the views of the two countries get closer, they can play an influential role in the chaotic situation of the Islamic world and the Middle East," Mohammad Hosseini, Iran's ambassador to Saudi Arabia, told the official Iranian news agency, IRNA. "Unrest is increasing in the Middle East and if the situation continues, it will become a threat for all the countries in the region."

A Saudi official confirmed Mr. Ahmadinejad's visit, which will include a meeting with King Abdullah on Sunday, but the official Saudi news agency, SPA, made no mention of the trip, adding weight to the theory that the visit was an Iranian initiative.

Rumors of a likely meeting between the leaders had been circulating in Saudi Arabia for the past week, several analysts said, but the exact date appears to have been set within the last few days, just before the United Nations is expected to begin deliberating tougher sanctions on Iran for its continued uranium enrichment efforts in violation of United Nations resolutions.

The announcement also comes just two days after the United States agreed in principle to hold a high-level meeting with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, to help stabilize Iraq, setting the stage for the highest-level contact between American and Iranian officials in more than two years.

The American decision to participate in that Iraqi regional meeting in Baghdad on March 10 was unconnected to the Saudi-Iranian summit talks, American officials said. They claimed to be untroubled by the summit plans despite their strong mistrust of Mr. Ahmadinejad.

King Abdullah and Mr. Ahmadinejad are expected to discuss ways of ending the political standoff in Lebanon between the American-backed government of Fouad Siniora and Hezbollah, which is supported by Iran. Both countries are also concerned that growing sectarian tensions in Iraq, Lebanon and elsewhere in the region could fuel further instability.

"The last visit by an Iranian official to Riyadh was by national security chief Ali Larijani last month, but the Iranians were left feeling quite unsatisfied," said Adel al-Toraifi, a Riyadh-based Saudi analyst with close ties to the government.

Experts said talks had broken down when the Iranians balked at a deal that would increase Hezbollah's representation in the government, but would also start an international tribunal to try suspects connected to the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafik Hariri, in 2005, a Saudi priority.

Hezbollah took to the streets of Beirut in December demanding a greater role in the government, and threatening to continue its protest until Mr. Siniora resigns or gives its allies more seats in the cabinet.

"The Iranians want to come to an understanding with the Saudis," said Khaled Dakhil, professor of political sociology at King Saud University in Riyadh. "The Iranians want the help of the Saudis on the nuclear front, and they do want to improve relations between Syria and Saudi Arabia."

Other likely agenda items are finding a peaceful conclusion to the standoff with the international community. Iran has sought to emphasize to its Persian Gulf neighbors that if the United States attacks it, they too will be affected, analysts say.

The six Persian Gulf states that make up the Gulf Cooperation Council have insisted to Iran that they will not veer from United Nations Security Council resolutions, and that they are preparing to defend themselves.

"They want to deliver two messages — 'It is bad for the area; if we are attacked you will be affected,' " Abdelaziz Sager, chairman of the pro-Saudi Gulf Research Center in Dubai, said of the Iranians. "The other message is, 'If you have an easy way to solve the crises, tell us what it is.' They know that the best thing that can happen to Iran at this stage is for the Americans to attack them."

DOJ_NMG_0139094

With Iran poised to gain from possibly two civil wars in the Middle East — one in Iraq and a potential one in Lebanon — Saudi Arabia in recent months has abandoned its behind-the-scenes checkbook diplomacy to take a central, more aggressive role in tempering the region's conflicts.

The kingdom has increased its public involvement in Iraq and its support of the Sunni-led government in Lebanon, and last month played host to Hamas and Fatah at a meeting in Mecca to settle the differences between the feuding Palestinian factions and form a national unity government.

The talks on Saturday may be a sign that Saudi Arabia's shuttle diplomacy has begun to have an effect.

"It is a matter of pure interests and the Iranians understand that very well and have their own interests to protect," said Osama Safa, head of the Lebanese Center for Policies, a research center. "The Saudis have several cards to play at this point, and they will be played when Ahmadinejad comes to Saudi Arabia."

In Tehran, many were skeptical about the political significance of Mr. Ahmadinejad's trip. Saudi officials had good relations with former Iranian presidents, like Mohammad Khatami and Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, but Mr. Ahmadinejad became a political threat after his fiery rhetoric against Israel and in support of the Palestinians began resonating on Arab streets.

"Riyadh knows that if it wants to have serious discussions with Iran, it has to do it directly with Mr. Khamenei or through Mr. Larijani or Velayati," said Abbass Abdi, a political analyst in Tehran, speaking of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and Ali Akbar Velayati, a former foreign minister and more moderate politician who is close to Mr. Khamenei. "This trip is more like a show for Mr. Ahmadinejad to say that Iran is not an isolated country."

Iran's President To Visit Saudi Arabia (AP)

By Donna Abu Nasr

AP, March 2, 2007

Iran's president heads to Saudi Arabia on Saturday for discussions with King Abdullah, an indication that weeks of talks between their envoys on simmering conflicts in Iraq and Lebanon have made some headway.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's visit to Riyadh comes as the U.S. is pushing for harsher U.N. sanctions against Iran over its nuclear program, and it may reflect that he is looking for a way out of a tight corner.

Ahmadinejad is expected to travel to Saudi Arabia on Saturday for a one-day visit, a Saudi Foreign Ministry official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media.

Iran's ambassador to Riyadh, Mohammad Hosseini, confirmed that Ahmadinejad's trip was "imminent," but declined to elaborate, Iran's official IRNA news agency said.

The visit will culminate weeks of diplomatic activities spearheaded by Saudi Arabia, including talks between Iranian and Saudi diplomats, a meeting between Abdullah and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and the accord reached in the Saudi city of Mecca to form a unity Palestinian government.

It also precedes a conference on Iraq in Baghdad on March 10, which will include its neighbors, Iran and Syria, as well as the U.S. and Britain. At the end of the month, an Arab summit is planned in the Saudi capital.

Washington is pushing for tougher U.N. sanctions on Tehran over its failure to comply with demands to halt its uranium enrichment program that the West fears could be used to build a nuclear weapon. Although the U.S. has said it has no plans to strike Iran militarily, it has also refused to rule out any option.

There are other crises both countries are worried about. Violence in Iraq is escalating, Shiite-Sunni tensions are simmering across the Mideast and Lebanon remains tense as the opposition tries to bring down the Western-backed government.

Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia is worried Shiite-Sunni fighting in Iraq — with which the kingdom shares a long border — and sectarian tensions in Lebanon could veer out of control and send shockwaves throughout the Middle East.

"The region is facing several potentially explosive crises points and these are all issues of common concern for Riyadh and Iran," said Saudi analyst, Khaled al-Dakhil.

"Saudi Arabia has become the focus of the diplomatic activity in the region, and therefore, Iran should try to keep an open channel with Saudi Arabia and try to use it at the regional and international level," he added.

But keeping diplomatic channels open has not been Ahmadinejad's strength. Speaking Thursday in Sudan, Ahmadinejad blamed the U.S. and Israel for the world's problems.

"There is no place in the world that suffers from divisions and wars unless America or the Zionists' fingerprints are seen there," the Iranian president said. "Our strength and the cornerstone of the victory is in our (Muslims') unity ... we have to pay attention to the devils who want to cause divisions among us."

Another Saudi official said Ahmadinejad's trip may be the result of a possible realization that he needs to maintain good relations in the region to ensure stability. It may even help ward off sectarian tensions that could ultimately work against the groups which Iran supports.

DOJ_NMG_0139095

Sunnis increasingly fear Shiite-majority Iran's growing influence in the region. Iran is a strong backer of Hezbollah, which is striving to bring down the U.S.- and Saudi-backed government in Lebanon. Tehran also has close ties to Shiite political parties in Iraq, and Washington accuses it of backing Shiite militias there.

"The fact that the (Saudi) king would meet with him will raise Ahmadinejad's status domestically and internationally as a ... responsible statesman," said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. "Knowing the style of Saudi diplomacy, they won't give him this carrot without having received certain assurances that he will pursue a reasonable path."

Saudi officials have not divulged any details about their negotiations with the Iranians. But some Lebanese politicians have said Iran and Saudi Arabia are still trying to find a solution to the Lebanese crisis.

Former Lebanese Prime Minister Salim Hoss said Wednesday after returning from Tehran that Iran was ready to cooperate with Saudi Arabia, and probably Syria, to help forge a national dialogue in Lebanon.

Legislator Saad Hariri, head of Lebanon's anti-Syrian parliamentary majority, said he hoped the Saudi-Iran summit would work toward this.

"I think political dialogue is important, and I think that the kingdom of Saudi Arabia plays a pivotal role in the region," Hariri said.

Democrats Move To Require Approval Before Any Strike On Iran (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Fearing that President Bush may be preparing to launch a military strike against Iran, Senate Democrats are drafting legislation that would require the White House to seek congressional approval before any such action.

Freshman Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., a former Republican Navy secretary and decorated Vietnam veteran who opposes the Iraq war, is leading the effort. Webb said Thursday that he's still working on the details, but he intends to introduce his measure next week as an amendment to the $93.4 billion war spending bill.

Democrats aren't satisfied with assurances from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace that there are no plans to attack Iran.

Despite their assurances, Bush has deployed two aircraft carrier battle groups off of Iran's coast. He also frequently denounces Iran's alleged supply of weapons to Shiite fighters in Iraq, and he has issued orders to U.S. troops there to hunt those Iranians who are making mischief.

In addition, there are persistent reports quoting people close to the administration saying that an attack on Iran is under consideration, both to inhibit Iran's nuclear program and to try to undermine its leaders.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he supports Webb's concept.

"There are many out there much smarter than I am who believe the administration is ramping up to have the same thing happen in Iran that's happened in Iraq," Reid said.

At the same time, the administration announced this week that it will attend a regional conference on Iraq that will include representatives from Iran and Syria, reversing its previous refusal to talk to either regime.

Many Democrats are skeptical that the Bush administration is committed to solving its problems with Iran diplomatically. They see similarities to the buildup to the Iraq war and want to leave no doubt that the 2002 authorization to use force in Iraq doesn't extend to Iran.

Webb said that under his proposal, the U.S. military "would still be able to repel an immediate attack if it began on Iranian soil or (undertake) hot pursuit if there were Iranian activity where they were to cross the border. I want to be very reasonable about this."

"What we would be going after would be any notion of beginning unilateral military action inside Iran without provocation and without the consent of the Congress. I'm not saying, `Don't do it,'" Webb said. "I'm saying if they want to begin that sort of new military activity, they should come to the Congress and discuss it."

Republicans are expected to fight Webb's effort. Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., who last month helped his party block debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing a troop buildup in Iraq, said an Iran amendment is a political stunt.

"It sounds to me like somebody's trying to make an issue for the sake of getting some press," he said.

Webb also must convince at least one skeptical Democrat, Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin of Michigan.

Levin said he believes the law already requires Bush to seek congressional approval if he decides to attack Iran. He suggested that the amendment could backfire on Democrats if Republicans block it or the president vetoes it, and he said that Bush might then argue anew that he doesn't need congressional approval to attack.

DOJ_NMG_0139096

The urgency is heightened as anti-war Democrats quarrel among themselves over whether to rescind the 2002 Iraq war authorization, renew it with restrictions or leave it untouched.

"We don't trust the president," said Sen. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio. "I want to support something that forces the president to come to us before he goes into Iran."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Recycled Oscar

It's a good thing National Geographic News waited until after the Oscars were presented in Hollywood on Sunday night before publishing its story on global warming, or else Al Gore might have flown home empty-handed.

Three days after "An Inconvenient Truth," Mr. Gore's global warming show, took home an Oscar, National Geographic's Kate Ravilious reports that it's not just Earth, but Mars too, that "appears to be enjoying more mild and balmy temperatures."

She cites 2005 data from NASA's Mars Global Surveyor and Odyssey missions, revealing that the carbon dioxide "ice caps" near Mars' south pole are diminishing, "evidence that the current global warming on Earth is being caused by changes in the sun."

Habibullo Abdussamatov, head of the St. Petersburg's Pulkovo Astronomical Observatory, is quoted in the article as saying the Mars data is evidence that the "long-term increase in solar irradiance is heating both Earth and Mars."

The question now is whether Mr. Gore's coveted Oscar can be recycled?

Pray tell

King Abdullah II of Jordan will address a joint session of Congress next Wednesday, becoming the first world leader to address such a meeting under the new Democratic-led Congress.

Merissa Khurma, spokeswoman for the Jordanian government in Washington, tells us the king's speech will partly address the crisis in neighboring Iraq and ways to restore security and stability there. Congress, no doubt, will be all ears.

Defining courage

There's been a great deal of reaction to yesterday's item about the new film "Silent Wings," which praises heroic glider pilots who fought during World War II, described by one general as the "the most uninhibited individuals ever to wear an American uniform."

Most were interested in our mention that Walter Cronkite and Andy Rooney, each of whom appear in the film, were among eight civilian and military combat journalists known as "The Writing 69th." Many did not realize that Sgt. Rooney wrote for Stars and Stripes, while Mr. Cronkite reported for United Press.

Indeed, in June 1973, Mr. Cronkite, the trusted news anchor for CBS, spoke personally of his wartime reporting during an interview with Playboy magazine.

"I'm embarrassed when I'm introduced for speeches and somebody takes a CBS handout and reads it, because it makes me sound like some sort of hero: The battle of the North Atlantic, the landing in Africa, the beachhead on D-Day, dropping with the 101st Airborne, the Battle of the Bulge.

"Personally, I feel I was an overweening coward in the war," Mr. Cronkite said. "I was scared to death all the time. I did everything possible to avoid getting into combat. Except the ultimate thing of not doing it. I did it. But the truth is that I did everything only once. It didn't take any great courage to do it once. If you go back and do it a second time — knowing how bad it is — that's courage."

Yield to Mexico

Round up the children and dogs; the trucks are coming, the trucks are coming.

"The next sound you hear will be the rumble of thousands of Mexican trucks streaming across our southern border," warns Rep. Ted Poe, Texas Republican, referring to the U.S. government agreeing to allow 100 Mexican trucking companies to send trucks, as he calls it, on the highways and byways of America.

"Presently, Mexican trucks may only go 20 miles inside the U.S. border. The U.S. government says they will inspect the trucks for safety and inspect the drivers as well. Yeah, right," the congressman states. "There are already 6,000 trucks a day crossing in each direction just between Laredo, Texas, and Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, and only a fraction of these are inspected."

Even worse, the congressman fears the "low paid, unqualified drivers that may not even be able to read highway signs."

That we do

"CORRECTION: In the e-mail we sent you earlier this morning, regarding the Waxman-Davis 'Executive Branch Reform Act' (H.R. 984), there was a typo that identified [Henry A.] Waxman as 'R-Ca.' Mr. Waxman, as we all know, is a Democrat."

DOJ_NMG_0139097

Report Slams Venezuela For Drug Trafficking (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - In its harshest assessment yet of drug trafficking in Venezuela, the State Department on Thursday said the country is turning into a haven for smugglers because of corruption and the government's refusal to cooperate with other nations.

The department's 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategies Report also expressed uneasiness over Bolivia's efforts to expand the cultivation of coca, the raw material used to make cocaine, and the State Department offered rare praise for Cuba for deporting a Colombian trafficker to Bogota.

It also praised three countries - Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico - that Bush will visit this month during a swing through Latin America, saying the three were trying to halt drug smuggling, if not succeeding.

The report also said that opium production hit a record high in Afghanistan last year and that the drug trade was undermining democracy there.

The report says Afghanistan produced a record 5,644 metric tons of opium in 2006, a 26 percent jump from the previous year. The State Department said there was "strong evidence" that drug trafficking was funding the Taliban insurgency.

"These links between drug traffickers and anti-government forces threaten regional stability," the report said.

Venezuela's leftwing President Hugo Chavez has long been at loggerheads with the Bush administration, which has accused him of everything from undermining democracies in the hemisphere to provoking an arms race - allegations denied by the Chavez government.

The report calls Venezuela "one of the principal drug-transit countries in the Western Hemisphere," with Colombian traffickers setting up shop there because the Chavez government is "permissive and corrupt."

Anne Patterson, the State Department's top anti-drug trafficking official, told reporters that suspected drug trafficking flights from Venezuela to Haiti and the Dominican Republic had soared by 167 percent last year.

More than 200 metric tons of cocaine transit through Venezuela every year, according to the report, which covers the entire world. Arrests are limited to small-time traffickers, and seizures within Venezuela dropped while Venezuelan shipments interdicted in other countries tripled.

The Venezuelan embassy in Washington declined to comment on the report, but in the past Chavez and several of his government's officials have denied any relaxation of its fight against illicit drugs.

The report praises Colombia, the world's top cocaine producer, as "completely committed" to the drug war. It calls Mexican efforts to combat traffickers last year as "unmatched" by any previous government there. About 90 percent of the cocaine in U.S. streets is believed to have come through the border with Mexico.

Guatemala is described in the report as "major drug-transit country" that made "substantial progress" in reforming the police's ability to combat drugs. The report, prepared weeks ago, made no mention, however, of the Feb. 19 murders of three Central American legislators in what Guatemala's President Oscar Berger said may have been a drug-related crime.

Four police officers arrested in the deaths, including the head of Guatemala's organized crime unit, were murdered days later in their cells at a prison outside Guatemala City. The assailants, who are still at large, passed through eight prison checkpoints unchallenged, officials said.

Patterson denied that the report picked on Venezuela because of Chavez's strident criticism of Bush.

"In contrast to the strong stands taken by the governments of Mexico and Colombia," Patterson said, "political will in Venezuela and Bolivia faltered last year."

She said Venezuela long had one of the strongest records in the hemisphere against trafficking. "And frankly, that's all stopped, for reasons that aren't entirely clear to me."

The Bush administration stepped up its criticism of Venezuela after Chavez ousted Drug Enforcement Administration agents from Venezuelan government facilities in late 2004, allegedly because they were spying. The two countries later negotiated an agreement to allow DEA agents to return, but Venezuela has so far refused to sign it, the report says.

In September of last year, the administration "de-certified" Venezuela as a helpful ally in the drug war and cut off aid and weapons shipments, among other sanctions.

Patterson praised Cuba for deporting alleged trafficker Luis Hernando Gomez-Bustamante to Colombia after holding him in prison for several months. He is expected to be extradited soon from Colombia to the United States.

"There is not a major trafficking issue through Cuba," she added. The Cuban government has long maintained that it is carrying on a strong fight against illicit drugs, despite past U.S. allegations that government officials there were involved in protecting foreign traffickers.

DOJ_NMG_0139098

Bolivia's leftist President Evo Morales wants to increase the acreage of legally grown coca while fighting the illegal trade in cocaine. The Bush administration believes more coca will lead to more cocaine and is to decide by March 15 if Bolivia is doing enough to stop drug trafficking.

Bolivia's ambassador to the United States, Gustavo Guzman, described the report as "serene and balanced."

Report Looks At Cocaine Trade (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Venezuela has become a significant player in the flow of cocaine from Colombia to the USA by allowing drug smugglers to operate freely and making little effort to cooperate with U.S. anti-drug efforts, a State Department report said Thursday.

The number of flights from Venezuela suspected of ferrying Colombian cocaine to the Dominican Republic and Haiti — key transfer points for U.S.-bound shipments of the drug — increased 167% last year, Assistant Secretary of State Anne Patterson said. She added that the leftist government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, a frequent critic of the United States, has allowed drug trafficking to flourish.

"Venezuela's permissive and corrupt environment led to more trafficking, fewer seizures and an increase in suspected drug flights (from Venezuela) over the past 12 months," Patterson said.

In 2006, the Department of Defense's Joint Interagency Task Force South documented 75 flights from Venezuela to the Dominican Republic and 46 flights into Haiti, says U.S. Coast Guard Rear Adm. Jeff Hathaway, who directs the task force.

"What we have seen emerging over the last 12 months is a virtual explosion of drug trafficking emanating from Venezuela," Hathaway said.

The task force gives information about suspected drug flights to the Venezuelan government, but it rarely acts on it, he said. "Venezuela is not making any attempt to stop the aircraft when they are being tipped off by the United States."

The Venezuelan Embassy did not respond to phone calls and e-mails requesting comment.

Patterson praised governments in Mexico and Colombia for aggressive counterdrug programs, but she said both countries continue to be major drug suppliers to the USA. In Bolivia, she said, the political will to counter drug trafficking has declined.

Recently elected Bolivian President Evo Morales has said the government would allow farmers to increase cultivation of coca to be used legally for flavorings and pharmaceuticals from 29,653 acres to 49,421 acres. The U.S. government contends that just 618 acres of coca cultivation would meet worldwide industrial demand.

The report also said Afghanistan's opium-poppy cultivation rose 59% last year, making the 2006 crop the largest ever. Patterson said profits from the opium trade help finance Taliban forces.

The Afghan government does not control Helmand and Kandahar provinces, where much of the opium poppies are grown, Patterson said.

Officials at the Afghan Embassy did not respond to a request for comment.

Embassy Row (WT)

By James Morrison

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

'Threat to the world'

Iran's nuclear weapons program poses the "most serious threat to the world," Israeli Ambassador Sallai Meridor warned.

"There is limited time [to stop Iran], and the question is, 'What will be done with that time,' " he said in an interview with National Public Radio's "All Things Considered" program.

The threat is not limited to Israel, which Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has vowed to destroy, the ambassador said.

"We see the Iranian threat as the most serious threat to the world," he said. "It's [a threat] to Israel because [Iran] threatens Israel's very existence and denies our right to exist.

"It's [a threat] to the region because they would like to dominate the entire Middle East. But beyond that, I think that it will be a different world for our children and grandchildren were Iran to be able to have a nuclear weapon."

Mr. Meridor predicted that Iran would disrupt nuclear nonproliferation efforts and let "many, many genies out of many, many bottles."

He urged the "world community" to act "responsibly and seriously and determinedly by diplomatic ways, by economic pressure on Iran, by explaining to the Iranian people the wrongdoing of their government."

Mr. Meridor also said the Israeli government is "constantly" looking for any change in the views of the militant Hamas group that dominates the Palestinian government. Hamas has refused to recognize the state of Israel.

"Not only our hearts and hands, but our ears are constantly open [to any change in Hamas]," he said. "There is nothing Israel wants more than peace, and we are constantly tuned to any potential change in our enemies and in their views. So far, as we know, Hamas is committed to the opposite of peace."

Trip to Mexico

Mexico's new ambassador, when he presented his diplomatic credentials at the White House this week, praised President Bush for his upcoming visit to Mexico City.

The two-day visit beginning March 12 will "strengthen the already firm foundations on which our bilateral relationship rests," Ambassador Arturo Sarukhan said.

"It is a bilateral relationship whose breadth, complexity and vitality has no parallel elsewhere in the world," he added.

The ambassador said his top priority is to advance the agenda of President Felipe Calderon. Mr. Sarukhan served as a foreign policy adviser and spokesman to the international press during Mr. Calderon's presidential campaign.

"It is time to roll up our sleeves and work together to achieve a constructive dialogue with forward-looking solutions for the future well-being of our two peoples," Mr. Sarukhan said.

Earlier in his diplomatic career, Mr. Sarukhan served in Washington as chief of staff to Mexican Ambassador Jorge Montano in 1993. Two years later, he was appointed the embassy's director for counternarcotics and law-enforcement issues. From 2003 to 2006, Mr. Sarukhan was Mexico's consul general in New York.

Conservative honor

Yulia Tymoshenko will cap her busy Washington visit this evening when she will be honored at the annual dinner of top U.S. conservatives, who will give her some original documents signed by President Reagan.

Mrs. Tymoshenko, who will begin her day with a 9 a.m. press conference at the National Press Club, will be recognized tonight by the Conservative Political Action Committee for her promotion of democracy in Ukraine, first as a leader of the 2005 Orange Revolution that drove a corrupt government from power and later as prime minister. She is now leader of the opposition in the Ukrainian parliament.

Columnist and author John Fund will present her with original presidential proclamations pertaining to the Cold War.

·Call Embassy Row at 202/636-3297, fax 202/832-7278 or e-mail jmorrison@
washingtontimes.com.

U.S. Wants Missile Radar In Caucasus (AP)

By Slobodan Lekic

AP, March 2, 2007

The director of the U.S. Missile Defense Agency said Thursday that Washington wants to base an anti-missile radar in the Caucasus, a move that could provoke a further rift with Russia.

Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering declined to specify which country the long-range radar could be installed in, but noted that "it would be very useful for the anti-missile system."

Speaking on a stop at NATO headquarters in Brussels, he said "we would like to place a radar in ... the Caucasus."

The United States has said the planned defenses would not be aimed at Russia, and are intended to defend against missile attacks from countries such as Iran.

Moscow has angrily criticized Washington's plan to locate an anti-missile system in the Czech Republic and Poland. It is likely that placing another radar in a U.S.-allied country such as Georgia or Azerbaijan would provoke further protest.

Unlike anti-aircraft systems, anti-missile radars have very narrow beams that cannot be used to monitor large swathes of air space. They have high resolution and very long ranges, allowing them to follow objects the size of a baseball at distances of up to nearly 2,000 miles.

Russia has warned that Poland and the Czech Republic risked being targeted by Russian missiles if they agreed to host the U.S. anti-missile bases.

In Moscow, Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Grushko said the missile elements planned by Washington for Poland and the Czech Republic would become a "factor that we will have to take into account while determining our steps in the military-political sphere and military development."

"In the modern world, security is indivisible. You can't ensure your own security if you provoke other nations' concerns about their security," Grushko said in a statement posted on the Foreign Ministry's Web site.

Tymoshenko Seeks Early Elections (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139100

Ukraine's revived Orange Coalition will press for early elections in a bid to halt Russia's growing influence and control over the country's vital energy assets, opposition leader Yulia Tymoshenko said in an interview yesterday.

Mrs. Tymoshenko, a former prime minister and key figure in the pro-Western Orange Revolution street protests of December 2004, said Ukraine's sovereignty and hopes for better relations with the West are in jeopardy if the government of pro-Moscow Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych serves out its full term to 2011.

"If this government is in power until then, there would be nothing left of a democratic Ukraine," she said, speaking through an interpreter with editors and reporters at The Washington Times. "The territory would still exist, but it would not be Ukraine any longer."

Mrs. Tymoshenko's party and the party of pro-Western President Viktor Yushchenko signed a new deal over the weekend to cooperate in parliament, seeking to end a disastrous feud among the Orange Revolution allies that enabled Mr. Yanukovych's pro-Moscow party to reclaim power in August 2006.

Mrs. Tymoshenko, considered a front-runner among reformists for the 2009 presidential vote, said the reunited pro-reform parties will push for early parliamentary elections, although the move faces both political and constitutional hurdles.

On a high-profile U.S. visit that includes meetings with Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Mrs. Tymoshenko said the United States must speak out for Ukraine despite a full foreign-policy plate that includes Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan and other pressing crises.

She noted there was "disillusionment" in Washington about backsliding in Ukraine since her coalition was propelled to power in 2005 by a wave of street protests that became known as the Orange Revolution because of the orange flags and banners carried by the protesters.

But, she said, "a country as large and influential as your own has to lead this kind of work. Your country does not have the right to be fatigued about Ukraine's future."

Mr. Yanukovych, whose tainted win in the 2004 presidential election sparked the Orange Revolution, has engineered an abrupt about-face in Ukrainian policy since his political comeback last summer.

With a power base in Ukraine's Russian-speaking east, the prime minister has put a hold on Ukraine's efforts to join NATO, dismissed Mr. Yushchenko's pro-Western foreign minister, and signed an accord tightly linking Ukraine's economy to those of Russia and Belarus.

The charismatic Mrs. Tymoshenko, sporting her trademark blonde braids, said Mr. Yanukovych's allies dominate the courts and key security ministries in Kiev.

Rich eastern business clans from Mr. Yanukovych's political base in Donetsk are buying influence and lawmakers to keep him in power, she said.

Mr. Yanukovych's party "is trying to buy deputies like chickens in a bazaar," she said, "and these politicians are allowing themselves to be bought."

She was particularly scathing about the government's energy concessions to Moscow. She said Russia, through a shadowy Swiss-based intermediary company, is in the process of locking up Ukraine's oil, gas and electricity markets, giving Russia a near-monopoly of energy supplies to much of Europe.

"Our new government and the Russian Federation are eating up the country's energy system like eating buns for breakfast," she said.

But she stressed she did not consider herself an "enemy of Russia," blaming instead Ukrainian officials for failing the country's basic economic and political interests.

Russian President Vladimir Putin "is doing his own thing," she said.

"It isn't that I don't like Russia. Politics cannot be motivated by such feelings. It's simply that I love Ukraine," she said.

Mrs. Tymoshenko acknowledged that she had moved too quickly in her short, stormy first stint as prime minister. Mr. Yushchenko dismissed her after just nine months in office in September 2005, and her tenure was marked by numerous policy and personal clashes.

She said Mr. Yushchenko also had underestimated the power of entrenched interests opposed to the Orange Revolution reforms. A series of constitutional changes since 2004 have weakened the president's power while building up the prime minister.

She compared Ukraine in 2005 to a scuba diver trying to surface too quickly after years in the stagnant political depths.

"If I have a chance to have the responsibility in the future, unfortunately the reforms will have to come at a slower tempo, to make sure we do not get another case of the bends," she said.

US Deputy Secretary Of State Starts Asia Tour (AFP)

AFP, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139101

New US Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte on Thursday started an Asian tour in which he is expected to discuss a breakthrough nuclear deal with North Korea.

Negroponte arrived in Tokyo, the veteran diplomat's first foreign destination since taking the post of number-two to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

He is likely to meet Foreign Minister Taro Aso and other officials on Friday, a ministry official said. After a three-day stay, Negroponte will head on to China and South Korea.

Tokyo has refused to fund the February 13 deal, under which North Korea agreed to shut a key nuclear reactor in exchange for fuel aid, due to a dispute over Pyongyang's past abductions of Japanese civilians.

US Vice President Dick Cheney assured close ally Japan that he understood the concerns about the kidnapping row during a visit last week.

Negroponte, the London-born son of a Greek tycoon, has served in a series of top positions under US President George W. Bush including national intelligence director and as ambassador to both the United Nations and Iraq.

China Expands Sub Fleet (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

China's military is engaged in a major buildup of submarines that includes five new strategic nuclear-missile boats and several advanced nuclear-powered attack submarines, according to the Office of Naval Intelligence.

The new nuclear-powered missile submarines (SSBNs), identified as Type 094s, will be outfitted with new 5,000-mile range JL-2 missiles that "will provide China with a modern and robust sea-based nuclear deterrent force," the ONI stated in report made up of written answers to questions on the Chinese submarine buildup.

The ONI report was first disclosed to Sea Power magazine, and a copy was obtained by The Washington Times. It was the first time the Pentagon has identified the number of new Chinese strategic submarines under construction.

The five new missile submarines will "provide more redundancy and capacity for a near-continuous at-sea SSBN presence," the ONI said, which noted that sea trials for some of the submarines are under way and the first deployments could begin as early as next year.

The buildup is raising new concerns among senior Pentagon planners already worried by Beijing's broader strategic nuclear-forces buildup, which also includes several new long-range land-based nuclear missiles and a land-attack cruise missile similar to the Tomahawk.

"This is a troubling development," Richard Fisher, a specialist on the Chinese military with the private International Assessment and Strategy Center, said of the submarine buildup.

The five missile submarines, each equipped with 12 JL-2 missiles, shows that China is working to achieve a force of 120 long-range nuclear missiles over the next decade, about half of them to be carried on the submarines, Mr. Fisher said. The other half would be the 60 land-based DF-31 missiles that current deployment rates will give China by then, he said.

The 120 missiles also could have multiple-warheads, since China is known to have acquired all the needed technology from the U.S. during the 1990s.

Retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell, commenting at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on Tuesday, said China's nuclear missiles pose a threat.

"It's a matter of they're building their military, in my view, to reach some state of parity with the United States," said Mr. McConnell, the new director of national intelligence. "So they're a threat today, they would become an increasing threat over time."

Little is known about China's nuclear forces and efforts by Pentagon officials to engage Chinese military leaders about their strategic weapons and forces has not been successful. China's government has insisted its current modernization is part of a peaceful development, but the contrasting strategic nuclear-forces buildup is worrying, defense officials said.

Chinese Gen. Zhu Chenghu told reporters in 2005 that China would attack U.S. cities with nuclear weapons in response to any conventionally armed U.S. missile strikes against China during a conflict over Taiwan. Years earlier, Gen. Xiong Guangkai threatened to use nuclear weapons against Los Angeles if the U.S. helped Taiwan defend against a Chinese invasion of the island.

The missile-submarine buildup would provide Beijing with a major upgrade on current capabilities. In 1983, China built one Xia-class nuclear-powered ballistic missile submarine, reportedly with 12 1,000-mile range JL-1 missiles. But that solitary submarine has only twice test-fired its missiles and never ventured beyond China's regional waters.

DOJ_NMG_0139102

"Although the range of the JL-1 limits the Xia's utility as a deterrent platform, targets throughout the region, including U.S. military facilities, could be targeted with the JL-1 from launch points inside traditional Chinese navy operating areas," the ONI said.

On China's new attack submarine, the ONI stated that China already has launched and is performing sea trials on an unspecified number of Type 093 nuclear-powered attack submarines. Published reports in China have said two Type 093 attack submarines are deployed and use "foreign technologies" and advanced anti-ship missiles and torpedoes.

The new advances are part of China's efforts to bolster its anti-ship weapons to permit strikes at greater ranges from the Chinese coast than its current diesel-powered submarine force offers, the ONI said. China currently is upgrading its current force of about 55 attack submarines -- most of them easy-to-track diesel boats -- with more-advanced and harder-to-track vessels, including Russian-made Kilos, and its own Song- and Yuan-class submarines.

"Each of these submarine classes, which are quiet platforms with anti-ship cruise missiles, is an integral part of China's regional anti-access strategy," ONI said. "The quieting incorporated into these submarines is required for successful operations in the open ocean operating areas which could facilitate the [Chinese navy's] wartime mission of keeping enemy combatants outside of strike range of the theater of operation."

A Song-class submarine surfaced undetected within five miles, well within firing range, of the aircraft carrier USS Kitty Hawk in October.

The ONI stated that China's maritime strategy is focused on blocking U.S. or Japanese intervention in a future conflict over Taiwan. To that end, Beijing has begun equipping its medium- and short-range ballistic missiles based on shore, hundreds of which are deployed across the Taiwan Strait from the island that the communist regime views as a renegade province, with maneuvering warheads.

These radar-guided or heat-seeking weapons "provide the accuracy necessary to attack a ship at sea," ONI said.

But China's rise in international trade and commerce, plus its growing dependence on imported foreign oil, also has expanded Beijing's maritime strategy from a mostly submarine force to one of building surface ships to "defend sea lines of communication" (SLOCs), because protecting sea-lanes with submarines is difficult.

ONI also said that in addition to new destroyers, "by 2020, China is likely to operate an aircraft carrier, the initial unit of which may be the refurbished ex-Varyag, acquired from Ukraine in 2000, to further support SLOC protection."

Beijing Likens Cheney Criticism To Nosy Neighbor (WT)

By Ed Lanfranco

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

BEIJING -- Foreign ministry spokesman Qin Gang responded yesterday to Vice President Dick Cheney's remarks about China during his recent Asia trip with an earthy metaphor about home invasion and a barbed eight-point statement outlining China's diplomatic philosophy.

Mr. Qin's comments strayed far from the tepid boilerplate answers normally issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs when he was asked about remarks by Mr. Cheney, who had expressed concern over the transparency of Chinese military expenditures and suggested that China's anti-satellite test in January posed a threat to the world.

Acknowledging that the comparison might not be entirely appropriate, he said: "If you had a neighbor always standing at your doorstep, peering into your household and constantly shouting at you, 'Why don't you open your door and let me see what's in your house, what's in your family,' how would you feel about that?"

Mr. Qin continued: "You wear your clothes, you wear your underwear, and when there are people shouting at you, 'Please take off all your clothes and let me see what's inside,' how would you respond? I think you will cry for police help.

"I hope such a comparison will help you better understand our position," Mr. Qin said.

The foreign ministry official then gave an eight-point statement on whether China poses a threat to the world, telling reporters, "We hope you can make your judgment on the basis of Chinese diplomatic philosophy and its precepts."

Here is the transcript of Mr. Qin's remarks:

"First of all China will not seek hegemony. We are still a developing country. We don't have the resources to seek hegemony. Even if China becomes a developed country, we will not seek hegemony.

"Second, China will not play power politics and we will not interfere with other countries' internal affairs. We will not impose our own ideology on other countries.

"Third, we maintain all countries, big or small, should be treated equally and respect each other. All affairs should be consulted and resolved by all countries on the basis of equal participation. No country should bully others on the basis of strength.

DOJ_NMG_0139103

"Fourth, [in international affairs] China will make judgment on each case, each matter on the merit of the matter itself and we will not have double standards. We will not have two policies: one for ourselves and one for others. We will not do that. We believe we cannot do unto others what we do not wish others do unto us.

"Fifth, we advocate all countries handle their relations on the basis of the United Nations Charter and norms governing international relations. We advocate stepping up international cooperation and do not play politics unilaterally. We should not undermine the dignity and the authority of the U.N. We should not impose and set our own wishes above the U.N. Charter, international law and norms.

"Sixth, we advocate peaceful negotiation and consultation so as to resolve our international disputes. We do not resort to force, or threat of force, in resolving international disputes. China maintains a reasonable national military buildup to defend our own sovereignty and territorial integrity. It is not made to expand, nor do we seek invasion or aggression.

"Seventh, China is firmly opposed to terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. We are a responsible member of the international community, and as for international treaties, we abide by all them in a faithful way. We never play by a double standard, selecting and discarding treaties we do not need.

"Eighth, we respect the diversity of civilization and the whole world. We advocate different cultures make exchanges, learn from each other, and compliment one another with their own strengths. We're opposed to clashes and confrontations between civilizations, and we do not link any particular ethnic group or religion with terrorism."

A Cry To Limit Chinese Imports Rings At Paper Mill (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

LUKE, Md. — For years the residents of this economically distressed hollow in the Appalachians have watched textile mills, glass factories and tire makers close down one after the other. Now its lone remaining big factory — "the last man standing," as the production manager at the paper mill here put it — is threatened by imports of cheaper paper made in China.

"We're still the economic engine for this whole area," said Scott Graham, the production manager, referring to the river valley and forested hills surrounding the mill. "But our operations cannot compete with these below-cost imports."

It is a familiar story in the struggle of the American industrial base to cope with globalization, but this one may have a different ending.

The problems of paper mills here and elsewhere around the country have become a test case for a possible new confrontation between the United States and China, which many industry officials and members of Congress hope could lead to new tariffs on imports not only of Chinese-made paper but also of steel, furniture, textiles and plastics.

In coming weeks, the Commerce Department is expected to decide whether to impose duties on high-gloss paper known as "coated paper" — the kind made here in Luke — that is imported from China. Many trade specialists in Congress and in the industry expect it to do so. Indeed, China has gone to court to block the decision in advance.

If imposed, the duties would set an important precedent, reversing 20 years of settled American trade policy in which the United States refrained from making accusations that "nonmarket economies" like China were granting illegal subsidies. In its court case, China argues that changing that policy without legislation or a full regulatory hearing would be illegal.

The Bush administration's decision to face the issue of subsidies comes at a time of mounting pressure by Congress for a tougher stance on trade. With the American trade gap with China widening to a record $232.5 billion last year — roughly one-third of the entire deficit — Democrats say that if the Commerce Department does not act, they will pass legislation forcing its hand.

Many lawmakers say it is time to stop treating China with kid gloves, arguing that Beijing no longer deserves a free ride in which it benefits from a special exemption generally forbidden to Japan, Europe and other advanced industrial powers.

"I'm glad the administration is finally doing something," said Representative Sander M. Levin, a Michigan Democrat and chairman of the trade subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee. "They are beginning to recognize that there was an election last year."

The travails of the Luke mill are similar to those of other aging factories. But the NewPage Corporation, the company that owns the plant and is the largest producer of the high-quality paper, argues that it has hardly stood still in the face of foreign competition.

Mr. Graham, the production manager, whose grandfather helped pour concrete for the mill's old 600-foot smokestack, points out that in seven years, the mill has invested hundreds of millions of dollars in labor-saving computerized equipment while reducing its work force to 1,000 from 1,500 and increasing its output by a third.

DOJ_NMG_0139104

True, the plant, a sprawling complex on the upper reaches of the Potomac River, is fired by coal mined nearby and fed by huge quantities of water from local reservoirs, the same way it was when it was built in the 1880s here on the Maryland-West Virginia border.

Giant truckloads of trees are hauled up at one end of the mill. On the other end, thick rolls of shiny white paper are loaded on trucks. Among the clients for NewPage's paper are producers of annual reports, labels, Hollywood movie posters and the glossy catalogs put out by Williams-Sonoma, Pottery Barn and Neiman Marcus.

Although Chinese companies also use modern equipment, NewPage maintains that their real advantage results from subsidies. They include government grants for modernization, low-cost loans, debt forgiveness, tax breaks for export-oriented companies and subsidies for suppliers of wood and pulp.

China's market share in coated paper is still small, but rather than wait until Chinese producers dominate the business — as they have in things like toys and underwear — the paper mill's backers are hoping to block what they see as unfair competition before it is too late.

The involvement of NewPage in the Commerce Department's strategy was not accidental. Last year the department quietly informed critics of China's trade policies that it would be willing to review its longstanding policy of not challenging Chinese subsidies as illegal if they could come up with a clear-cut case.

Lawyers for NewPage say that Chinese producers charge $800 for a midgrade roll of paper, compared with the $1,000 the American company charges. The price differential alone does not prove the case, but it has enabled Chinese producers to increase their share of the American market from less than 1 percent in 2000 to 5.4 percent last year, the company says.

Under the complicated rules of trade, countries may impose tariffs in two situations: if an import is deemed to have been "dumped," or sold below cost; or if certain illegal subsidies were involved.

The first category of tariffs — to guard against dumping — are imposed, threatened, disputed, retaliated against and ultimately negotiated all the time. The United States and China have frequently accused each other of dumping, and antidumping tariffs are being contemplated in the coated-paper case.

What makes this case significant, however, is that the department announced last November that it was also investigating whether to seek duties above and beyond those, to punish China for illegal subsidies.

Antidumping duties are often low. But if antisubsidy duties are imposed, they could double the price of Chinese paper, eliminating it from the market entirely, lawyers for the Chinese government say.

The Commerce Department is expected to announce its decision by April 2. The argument for changing the policy is that China has become a major aggressive player on the world economic stage, and that a policy forged when Beijing was just beginning to move away from communism — and its subsidies barely produced a ripple — is out of date.

Franklin L. Lavin, the under secretary of commerce for international trade, said that he could not comment on the merits of the case, but that politics did not play a role in the decision to investigate.

"Look at the timeline," he said. "This was not a response to the midterm elections or to politics. It's a response to the fact that the China of today is very different from the China of 15 years ago."

Lawyers handling the case for the Chinese government and for several Chinese companies say these subsidies are in effect being counted twice in the investigation of antidumping and antisubsidy actions.

"The fear is that this case is going to be exploited by industry after industry," said William H. Barringer, a partner at Vinson & Elkins, which represents the Chinese government on the issue. "The first people in the door will be steel. If this is upheld, China will be overwhelmed having to defend all these cases."

If China loses the case, it has the option of pursuing two kinds of appeals: one with the United States Courts of Appeals and the other with the World Trade Organization in Geneva. The lawyers for China say that Beijing would pursue these appeals rather than engage in any retaliatory tariffs on American goods.

Many experts see the coated-paper case as one of three recent administration moves to raise pressure on China and to try to pre-empt Congress, forestalling legislation that might dictate trade policy and possibly nullify past trade accords with China and other countries.

The other two were a February announcement by the United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, that the United States would challenge Chinese subsidies at the World Trade Organization in Geneva, and a parallel threat to seek relief at the trade organization if China did not do more to crack down on piracy and counterfeit goods.

The administration's tougher stance also comes at a time of little progress in the so-called strategic economic dialogue with China, begun with great fanfare last fall by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.

"It's clear these steps are intended to slake Congressional appetites and avert legislation that would put President Bush in a bind," said Gary C. Hufbauer, a senior fellow and trade expert at the Peter G. Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington. "It's also designed to give some heft to the 'strategic economic dialogue.' "

DOJ_NMG_0139105

Some in Congress also see the China actions as a sign that Mr. Paulson, who resigned as chief executive of Goldman Sachs to become Treasury secretary last summer, realizes that his policy toward Beijing is faltering. A main focus has been a failed effort to persuade China to stop interfering with its currency levels in a way aimed at promoting exports.

"When Paulson came in, he thought all you have to do is talk logic with the Chinese," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York and a vociferous critic of China. "They talked very nicely and gave him ice in the winter. Now he's learning that you have to be tougher. It's not like doing a deal with Goldman Sachs."

A spokeswoman for Mr. Paulson, Brookly McLaughlin, said that the dialogue was "not designed to replace other bilateral negotiations or the necessary enforcement of our trade laws." Mr. Paulson, meanwhile, will be trying to shore up his approach with a visit to China in March, his third since taking office.

The policy rests on the basic idea that American consumers gain tremendous benefits from access to goods from China and that the American economy has proved itself capable of adapting to even the most intense foreign competition, in that way constantly advancing the nation's prosperity and productivity.

But that perspective does not carry much weight here in Luke.

"Somebody's got to be left who can do more than flip burgers for a living," said Thomas Caldwell, who ran a machine cutting rolls of paper into sheets at the plant before becoming president of the local union seven years ago. "I'm scared to death of how my grandkids are going to have to deal with this."

U.S., Brazil Plan Ethanol Partnership (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — U.S. and Brazilian officials are negotiating details of an ethanol partnership in advance of President Bush's scheduled visit to Brazil next week.

"We are interested in forming a global ethanol market" with the United States, Brazilian Foreign Minister Celso Amorim said this week.

If completed, the planned deal would help increase both nations' production of ethanol, creating significant economic as well as political implications.

First, expanding world ethanol markets would help the USA and other nations reduce their dependence on foreign oil. Also, reduced demand for oil might reduce the clout of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, who has tried to use his nation's oil reserves to undercut U.S. policies in the region.

The USA and Brazil produce more than 70% of the world's ethanol; the U.S. supply comes mainly from corn, while Brazil taps its abundant sugar cane crop.

Today, officials from the United States, Brazil, China, India, South Africa and the European Commission will announce the creation of the International Biofuels Forum. The group, affiliated with the United Nations, will work to create worldwide ethanol standards.

White House press secretary Tony Snow declined to comment on ongoing negotiations.

Bush will visit São Paulo on Thursday and Friday in the first stop of a week-long journey that also includes Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico. In Brazil, Bush is scheduled to discuss alternative energy sources with President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva.

The presidential tour comes just a few weeks after Latin American visits by State Department officials who discussed an ethanol deal with Brazilian officials.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told reporters Feb. 13 that the United States and Brazil should work together on research to make ethanol production more efficient.

An ethanol partnership would also seek "a global market," Burns said. "This will be a big issue for the president's visit, for us to cooperate."

Burns said one of the motivations is Bush's goal of reducing U.S. gas consumption by 20% over the next decade. Bush has touted ethanol as a way to wean the USA off what he calls its "addiction" to oil.

A report this week by the Government Accountability Office said Brazil has replaced its foreign oil imports with ethanol. Brazil started its ethanol program in 1975.

Amorim said Brazil also plans to ask the United States to cut tariffs on ethanol imports.

Some members of Congress from corn-growing states have already said they oppose cutting ethanol tariffs. Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, wrote Bush to oppose some of the proposals being discussed, including a pilot ethanol plant in the Caribbean region.

DOJ_NMG_0139106

Grassley said he doesn't understand using U.S. tax dollars "to encourage new ethanol production in other countries, production that could directly compete with U.S.-produced ethanol."

Johanna Mendelson Forman, who studies renewable energy at the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the Caribbean is a potentially valuable ethanol market because many of those countries currently buy oil from Chávez.

"Creating an independent region that does not depend on Chávez's oil is a medium-to-long-term goal," she said.

Chávez has dismissed Bush's upcoming trip as "destined for the depths of defeat."

Report: Pakistan Nabs Key Taliban Insurgent (USAT)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Pakistan arrested a former Taliban defense minister regarded as a top figure in the Afghan insurgency, three Pakistani intelligence officials said today. Mullah Obaidullah Akhund is a key associate of Mullah Omar, the fugitive Taliban leader.

Akhund was among five Taliban suspects arrested in a raid on a home in the city of Quetta earlier this week, an official told the Associated Press. The official requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to reporters. Two other intelligence officials in Quetta, who also didn't want to be named because of the sensitive nature of their jobs, would only confirm the arrests to the AP. There was no official confirmation from the Pakistani government.

The New York Times, citing two unnamed Pakistani officials, said Akhund was arrested on Monday, the day U.S. Vice President Cheney visited Pakistan.

Peacekeeping force arrives in Somalia

Ugandan troops flew into Somalia, the first contingent in an African peacekeeping force to shore up a United Nations-backed transitional government threatened by Islamic militants.

The 30 Ugandan soldiers arrived in Baidoa, seat of the government, Police Chief Adan Biid Ahmed said. Somali troops backed by Ethiopian soldiers ousted the Council of Islamic Courts militia from the capital, Mogadishu, in December, but the militants have staged daily guerrilla attacks.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since 1991 when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on one another.

Cuban minister: Castro may return soon

Fidel Castro "could return to work soon," Cuban Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said during a visit to Honduras. "I can't give an exact date," he said, "That will happen when he has satisfactorily concluded his recovery period." Perez Roque's comments follow other positive assessments of Castro's health from officials and relatives. Castro, 80, stepped aside in July after surgery for an undisclosed stomach ailment. His brother, Raul, has been in charge.

Continental Divide: U.S. Stirs Debate Over Africa Bank (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

TUNIS, Tunisia -- To the Bush administration, it seems obvious: The African Development Bank's headquarters should be in black Africa.

Four years ago, the bank, which funds development and antipoverty efforts, fled civil war in its longtime home in Ivory Coast for a temporary refuge in Tunisia, a stable country in Arab North Africa. Now, the U.S. says, it's time for the bank to leave Tunisia, give up hopes of returning to Ivory Coast, and find a new permanent home somewhere else south of the Sahara.

"A permanently temporary location simply will not do," Ahmed Saeed, a senior U.S. Treasury official, said at the bank's annual meeting last May.

In a roomful of African and European bank delegates, not a single person rose to endorse the U.S. position. Instead, the suggestion that the bank move has fueled a prickly fight involving African pride and European colonialism, with accusations traded about Arab racism and American arrogance.

Many black African and European member nations agree in principle that the bank should have its headquarters in a sub-Saharan country. What's more, some black Africans say they experience racism in Tunisia. "People call you 'monkey,' " says one West African banker. "Sometimes you feel like killing the person. But you just give up."

But leaving Ivory Coast permanently, black Africans fear, would signal that a country once hailed as a model of African hope is now just another horror story. North Africans quietly hope that if they bide their time, the bank will end up staying in Tunisia out of bureaucratic inertia.

And everyone but the U.S. thinks pressing the issue is the diplomatic equivalent of hitting a hornet's nest with a stick. "We should not even open this discussion," says one senior bank official from black Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0139107

Since it was established in Abidjan, Ivory Coast, by African heads of state in 1964, the bank has provided more than $56 billion in financing. Although it went through financial woes and mismanagement in the 1990s, the bank's supporters say it is now back on track to fight poverty and disease. Tapping financial markets and rich-country donations, the bank's efforts include grants to fight the Marburg virus in Angola, loans to build roads in Congo and credits to support state banks in Tunisia. The U.S., one of the 77 member nations, is contributing $138 million to the bank this year.

For years, the bank's home country stood as a shining example of Africa's potential. Ivory Coast boasted good roads, fine restaurants and West Africa's only ice-skating rink.

Things fell apart in 2002, when rebels attempted to overthrow President Laurent Gbagbo, triggering massacres and civil war. With gunfire in the air, managers of the development bank frantically evacuated about 1,000 employees and their families in early 2003. The bank picked Tunisia as a temporary refuge in large part because of the stability offered by the dictatorial government of President Zine el Abidine Ben Ali.

The new home sparked something of a culture clash, both bank and Tunisian officials say. The influx of thousands of bank professionals and their families jarred a country that had little experience with black Africans, except as students or laborers. Bank professional staff earn between $48,000 and $150,000 a year, far more than the average Tunisian, and many drive Mercedes or BMW sedans with easily identifiable African Development Bank license plates. They say they have often returned to their parked cars to find them intentionally scratched.

"Sometimes we're our own worst enemies," says one East African bank official. "We're too ostentatious for our own good."

Four years after the move, Ivory Coast remains in limbo. Some 10,000 French and United Nations troops patrol a buffer zone between the government-controlled south and the rebels in the north. The bank's official home is still Abidjan, but the Bush administration believes returning there isn't in the cards. This month President Bush cited "the massacre of large numbers of civilians" and "widespread human-rights abuses" in Ivory Coast in an executive order freezing assets of those contributing to the violence.

U.S. Treasury officials who want the bank to find a permanent home say Tunis is inconvenient because it has no direct flights to most of eastern, central or southern Africa. A bank staffer going to negotiate a loan in Rwanda might have to spend a night in Paris and another in Nairobi. Washington also believes it enjoys more support than is apparent on the surface, especially from Anglophone southern and eastern Africa. Ethiopia and Zambia have quietly let it be known that they'd be happy to host the bank, according to an official familiar with the discussions.

Publicly, most Africans aren't ready to abandon Ivory Coast. "Most people feel if your neighbor is in trouble, you should help him and not just run away," says Gerald Zirimwabagabo, who represents Rwanda, Ethiopia, Uganda and several other nations on the bank's board of directors.

France, the former colonial ruler of both Tunisia and Ivory Coast, is particularly reluctant to see the bank move to a country where people don't speak French. Meanwhile, many European staff members enjoy hopping to Rome, Paris and other European capitals for long weekends. "My opinion is that this relocation in Tunis will continue" until Ivory Coast stabilizes, says Francesco Pittore, who represents Italy, France and Belgium on the board of directors. It cost an estimated $100 million to move out of Abidjan, he says.

Tunisian officials say they aren't working to supplant Ivory Coast. "But if the question is on the table about finding a new permanent headquarters, we would present our candidacy to be the host," says Moncef Bouallagui, Tunisia's representative on the board of directors. Tunisia aspires to be a regional financial center, and Mr. Bouallagui says the bank's presence is "a sparkling sign to other businesses that people trust Tunisia."

Largely unspoken in the public debate is simmering discontent with Tunis among the bank's black African staff. The employees' union estimates that three-quarters of the bank's staff are living apart from their children, spouse or both. Many employees had lived in Ivory Coast for a decade or more prior to the evacuation. They owned homes that, in some cases, now sit empty. Many of their spouses ran small businesses; in Tunis, they typically need a Tunisian as a majority partner to go into business.

Black Africans say they feel unwelcome in Tunis. "They look at you like you're from Mars," says one veteran Central African bank staffer. While bank employees say such overt racism has diminished in recent years, they still encounter it.

"I don't say that kind of behavior doesn't exist," says Moufida Jaballah Srarfi, a director in Tunisia's Ministry of Development and International Cooperation. "As a Tunisian, if I go to Europe or another country maybe I'll encounter racist behavior. But I can't judge all Westerners as racist based on one case. We can't pigeonhole people."

One Tunisian, Isabelle Naouar, senses opportunity among the homesick and well-off. Last month, she opened a restaurant next door to the bank. The decor is West African, the chef Ivorian, and the tables full.

"We hope the bank won't move back," she says.

DOJ_NMG_0139108

Speeding HIV's Deadly Spread (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

FRANCISTOWN, Botswana -- The young and hip at ground zero of the AIDS epidemic meet, drink and pair off under the knowing gaze of bartender Brian Khumalo. Sometimes they first buy a three-pack of condoms from the box he keeps by the liquor, sometimes not.

Night after night they return for the carefree, beery vibe, with the same partners or new ones, creating a web of sexual interaction. A growing number of studies single out such behavior -- in which men and women maintain two or more ongoing relationships -- as the most powerful force propelling a killer disease through a vulnerable continent.

This new understanding of how the AIDS virus attacks individuals and their societies helps explain why the disease has devastated southern Africa while sparing other places. It also suggests how the region's AIDS programs, which have struggled to prevent new infections even as treatment for the disease has become more widely available, might save far more lives: by discouraging sexual networks.

"The problem of multiple partners who do not practice safe sex is obviously the biggest driver of HIV in the world," said Ndwapi Ndwapi, a top government AIDS official in Botswana, speaking in Gaborone, the capital. "What I need to know from the scientific community is, what do you do? . . . How do you change that for a society that happens to have higher rates of multiple sexual partners?"

Khumalo, 25, tall and lanky with a crooked-toothed smile, described the problem succinctly as he pointed to a spiky-haired woman in a corner booth of the bar. "She's new around here, so every guy is going to talk to her," he said. "She will be with me today. Tomorrow she will be with my best friend. And I will be with somebody else."

Khumalo moved from Gaborone to Francistown last March, finding a city of 85,000 with a red-brick downtown, modest concrete homes and an accommodating sexual culture. The first night, he slept with a woman he had just met, he said. He did the same the second night, the third, the fourth.

Though he used condoms each time, he said, an alarmed friend soon drove him to the white, low-slung buildings of Francistown's biggest AIDS clinic. "I saw thousands of beautiful women going to get pills," Khumalo recalled.

It scared him, but not enough. By the end of the year, Khumalo had slept with more than 100 women, he said.

But the number of sexual partners is not the only factor that increases the risk of AIDS. The most potentially dangerous relationships, researchers say, involve men and women who maintain more than one regular partner for months or years. In these relationships, more intimate, trusting and long-lasting than casual sex, most couples eventually stop using condoms, studies show, allowing easy infiltration by HIV.

Researchers increasingly agree that curbing such behavior is key to slowing the spread of AIDS in Africa. In a July report, southern African AIDS experts and officials listed "reducing multiple and concurrent partnerships" as their first priority for preventing the spread of HIV in a region where nearly 15 million people are estimated to carry the virus -- 38 percent of the world's total.

But for many Batswana, as citizens of this landlocked desert country of 1.6 million call themselves, it is a strategy that has rarely been taught.

"There has never been equal emphasis on 'Don't have many partners,' " said Serara Selelo-Mogwe, a public health expert and retired nursing professor at the University of Botswana, who recalled stepping past broken bottles and used condoms as she arrived on campus each Monday morning. "If you just say, 'Use the condom' . . . we will never see the daylight of the virus leaving us."A Lethal Mix of Causes

International experts long regarded Botswana as a case study in how to combat AIDS. It had few of the intractable social problems thought to predispose a country to the disease, such as conflict, abject poverty and poor medical care. And for the past decade, the country has rigorously followed strategies that Western experts said would slow AIDS.

With its diamond wealth and the largess of international donors, Botswana aggressively promoted condom use while building Africa's best network of HIV testing centers and its most extensive system for distributing the antiretroviral drugs that dramatically prolong and improve the lives of those with AIDS.

But even though the relentless pace of funerals began to ease in recent years, the disease was far from under control. The national death rate fell from the highest in the world, but only to second-highest, behind AIDS-ravaged Swaziland. Men and women in Botswana continued to contract HIV faster than almost anywhere else on Earth.

Twenty-five percent of Batswana adults carry the virus, according to a 2004 national study, and among women in their early 30s living in Francistown, the rate is 69 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0139109

Researchers increasingly attribute the resilience of HIV in Botswana -- and in southern Africa generally -- to the high incidence of multiple sexual relationships. Europeans and Americans often have more partners over their lives, studies show, but sub-Saharan Africans average more at the same time.

Nearly one in three sexually active men in Botswana reported having multiple, concurrent sex partners, as did 14 percent of women, in a 2003 survey paid for by the U.S. government. Among men younger than 25, the rate was 44 percent.

The distinction between having several partners in a year and several in a month is crucial because those newly infected with HIV experience an initial surge in viral loads that makes them far more contagious than they will be for years. During the three-week spike -- which ends before standard tests can even detect HIV -- the virus explodes through networks of unprotected sex.

This insight explained what studies were documenting: Africans with multiple, concurrent sex partners were more likely to contract HIV, and countries where such partnerships were common had wider and more lethal epidemics.

A model of multiple sexual relationships presented at a Princeton University conference in May showed that a small increase in the average number of concurrent sexual partners -- from 1.68 to 1.86 -- had profound effects, connecting sexual networks into a single, massive tangle that, when plotted out, resembles the transportation system of a major city.

A second key factor helping the virus spread through southern Africa is low rates of circumcision. Before European colonialists arrived, most tribes in the region removed the foreskins of teenage boys during manhood rituals. Those rites, which were discouraged by missionaries and other Westerners who regarded them as primitive, have gradually declined as the region rapidly modernized.

Dozens of studies, including three experimental trials conducted in Africa in recent years, show that circumcised men are much less likely to contract HIV because the most easily infected cells have been removed.

These factors, researchers say, explain how North Africa, where Muslim societies require circumcision and strongly discourage sex outside monogamous and polygamous marriages, has largely avoided AIDS. They also explain why the epidemic is far more severe south of the Sahara, where webs of multiple sex partners are more common, researchers say.

West Africa has been partially protected by its high rates of circumcision, but in southern and eastern Africa -- which have both low rates of circumcision and high rates of multiple sex partners -- the AIDS epidemic became the most deadly in the world.

"That's the lethal cocktail," said Harvard University epidemiologist Daniel Halperin, a former AIDS prevention adviser in Africa for the U.S. government, speaking from suburban Boston. "There's no place in the world where you have very high HIV and you don't have those two factors."No Word for 'Fidelity'

From under the broad thatched roof of Francistown's Customary Court, which handles minor crimes and misconduct, Chief Judge Ludo Margaret Mosojane had long suspected that the city's torrent of AIDS deaths flowed from its sexual culture. Each year brought more cases resulting from elaborate, overlapping relationships, she said.

"It explains why Africa is hardest hit" by AIDS, Mosojane said. "The way we contract for sex is different from how others do it."

Polygamy once was common in the region, and in some parts still is; Swaziland's king has 13 wives. In generations past, even Batswana with just one spouse rarely expected monogamy. Husbands spent months herding cattle while their wives, staying elsewhere, tended crops, Mosojane said. On his return, a husband was not to be quizzed about his activities while he was away. He also was supposed to spend his first night back in an uncle's house, giving his wife time to send off boyfriends.

In Setswana, the national language, "the word 'fidelity' does not even exist," Mosojane said.

The few checks that traditional villages had on sexual behavior dwindled during the development frenzy after 1967, when diamonds were discovered. Batswana increasingly moved to cities for school or work. Plentiful television sets delivered a flood of Western images, including racy soap operas and music videos featuring lightly clad women vying for the attention of wealthy, bejeweled men.

Francistown, with nearby mines, military camps and border posts overflowing with desperate refugees, changed faster than most cities. Amid the bustling malls, there was soon an unsettling concentration of young adults because so many people ages 35 to 50 had already died of AIDS complications, residents say.

Faruk Maunge, 36, a high school counselor whose dreadlocks, goatee and rectangular glasses give him a cosmopolitan air, noticed the changes when he returned from stays abroad. "They are just a lost bunch," he said. "They are very, very reckless."

Maunge said that rent, clothing, even cellphone airtime became part of implicit sexual exchanges. Men and women maintained two, three, even four regular partners. The toll was clear from the snapshots he kept in a green plastic first-aid box.

"This one is gone," Maunge said, pointing to a faded picture of a woman in a red top who was nibbling her fingernails. Moving deeper into the pile, he continued: "This one is gone, Mooketsi. And this one is gone, Themba. This one is gone, too, this one on the far left. This one is positive."

DOJ_NMG_0139110

With a hint of frustration, Maunge said of one man, "He's sleeping around again." Maunge also grew irritated at a picture showing a friend with AIDS who seemed to father a child -- he was awaiting his fourth -- with every girlfriend.

Maunge said he once was reckless, too, having sex with three women in a week, sometimes without condoms. But after watching the disease kill more than 20 of his friends, he settled down with a new girlfriend and stayed faithful, he said.

"Praise God, I've been lucky," Maunge said. "It's like you have 10 bullets going through you and none hits you."The Missing Message

On a hospital wall here, not far from the AIDS clinic that Khumalo visited with his friend, the painted image of a condom shimmers like a comic-book superhero. Giant, colorful block letters declare, "CONDOMISE AND STAY ALIVE!!"

In cramped black script below, it adds, "Abstain first."

Yet rarely seen among Botswana's AIDS prevention messages is one that has worked in other African countries: Multiple sex partners kill. Dubbed "Zero Grazing" by Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni, this approach dominated in East Africa, where several countries curbed HIV rates.

Fidelity campaigns never caught on in Botswana. Instead, the country focused on remedies favored by Western AIDS experts schooled in the epidemics of America's gay community or Thailand's brothels, where condom use became so routine it slowed the spread of HIV.

These experts brought not just ideas but money, and soon billboards in Botswana touted condoms. Schoolchildren sang about them. Cadres of young women demonstrated how to roll them on. The anti-AIDS partnership between the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation and drugmaker Merck budgeted $13.5 million for condom promotion -- 25 times the amount dedicated to curbing dangerous sexual behavior.

But soaring rates of condom use have not brought down high HIV rates. Instead, they rose together, until both were among the highest in Africa.

The focus on condoms endured even after the arrival of internationally heralded "ABC" programs, named for their prescription of "Abstain, Be Faithful and Condomize." The middle concept -- fidelity -- often got lost.

The few posters advocating it in Francistown are old and torn; ads for condoms and abstinence are far more prominent. A 2004 government study measured the result: Three-quarters of Batswana surveyed knew that condoms could stop the spread of HIV. Half knew that abstinence would. Yet only one in five knew that fidelity to a single, uninfected partner prevented spreading the disease.

Another U.N. Classic (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Whenever the United Nations weighs in on human rights, our thoughts invariably turn to Lewis Carroll. A recent contretemps between U.S. diplomats and the U.N. bureaucracy takes us through the Turtle Bay looking glass again.

On the occasion of the annual meeting of the U.N.'s Commission on the Status of Women, the American delegation decided to organize a panel on the subject of "State-Sanctioned Mass Rape in Burma and Sudan." After years of reporting by human-rights organizations about atrocities committed by government forces against women in both countries, that sounds like a reasonable topic to discuss.

Enter U.N. bureaucrat Sylvie Cohen of the Division for the Advancement of Women. Ms. Cohen refused to list the panel discussion on the U.N.'s Web site because it "would be perceived as offensive to named member states." Besides, "the name of one member state concerned is not mentioned in accordance with its official country name." That name is "Myanmar," which is what the military junta that seized power in Burma renamed the country in 1988. The Burmese democracy movement of Aung San Suu Kyi continues to call it by its rightful name, and we'll stick with her over the junta.

Even more amazing is that a U.N. organization that purports to look out for the interests of women seems more concerned about defending the sensibilities of the governments who harbor and support their rapists. Come to think of it, this isn't a Lewis Carroll episode at all. At the U.N., it's routine.

DOJ_NMG_0139111

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, March 02, 2007 8:08 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, March 02, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070302.pdf; agnb070302.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Australian Detainee Is First Charged Under New Military Tribunal System 4

Homeland Response:

Bush Acknowledges Slow Pace Of Katrina Recovery 4
US Said To Be "Ill-Prepared" To Handle Nuclear Attack 6
Civil Air Patrol Providing Reconnaissance In War Against Terrorism 6
Chertoff Announces Real ID Rules, Delays Deadline For Compliance 6
Lawmakers Unveil List Of Questionable Homeland Security Spending Items 7
DHS Official To Research Solutions For Departmental Morale Problems 7
NYTimes Lauds Bloomberg For Joining "Ground Zero Disease" Fight 7

War News:

Divided Democrats Abandon Plans To Derail "Surge." 8
Security Crackdown Appears To Be Reducing Baghdad Violence 10
US Official To Visit Syria For Talks On Iraqi Refugees 10
Sprawling US Embassy In Baghdad Hampering Reconstruction Efforts 11
Turkey Late In Wishing Talabani Well 11
Pakistan Arrests Senior Taliban Leader 11
Panel Says Wars Hindering National Guard's Domestic Role 12
Friedman Urges "Moral Surge" To "Delegitimize" Suicide Bombers 12

DOJ:

Domenici, Wilson Said To Have Pressured US Attorney To Indict Democrat 12
Ashcroft Cancels Plans For Pizza Party With Former DOJ Colleagues 15

Corporate Scandals:

Gonzales Cites "Protecting Integrity Of Business" As Top DOJ Priority 15
US Charges 13 In Insider Trading Probe 16
Judge Tosses SEC Suit Against Former Citigroup Officials 18
Former Omnicom Official May Help In Securities Fraud Suit 18
Nortel Will Again Restate Financial Results 18
Ferris Baker Officials Leave Amid Trading Probe 19
Frank Unveils Legislation On CEO Pay 19

Criminal Law:

Judge Says Libby Verdict Unlikely This Week 19
Draft Report Finds Problems With Execution Appeals Process 19
Federal Officials Aid Kentucky Authorities In Child Predator Crackdown 20
US Charges Man Accused In Missouri Kidnapping With Child Pornography 20
Son Of "Disgraced Political Boss" Sentenced For Bank Robbery 21
US Indicts Former Developer Of Wisconsin Casino 21
Maryland Police Arrest 11 Youths In Gang Stabbings 21
Murder Trial Of Convicted Florida Sex Offender Opens 22
FBI Agent's Testimony Links Gang To Slaying Of Toddler 22
Baltimore Man Charged With Running Ponzi Scheme 22
New Jersey "Christmas Tree Grants" Probed 23
Alleged DC Madam Threatens To Sell Client List 23
California Judge Sentences Man To Life For Murder Of Racing Icon, Wife 24

Civil Rights:

Louisiana Officials Awaiting Word On FBI Cold Case Probes 24
Navy Chaplain Dismissed Over Christian Prayers 25
Columnist Lauds DOJ's Religious Freedom Initiative 25

Antitrust:

EU Threatens New Sanctions Against Microsoft 25

EU Extends Probe Of Sony BMG 26
Motorola Stock Lifted By Icahn Move 26
China Eyes Legal Reforms To Handle Economic Demands 27
WSJ Decries "Power Plays" In Endesa Takeover 27
Antitrust Law Gets Little Attention In Congressional XM-Sirius Hearing 28
FTC OKs Carlyle's Purchase Of Philosophy Inc 28
FTC Clears Private Equity Firm's Purchase Of Mirant Power Plants 29
FCC Grants Internet Phone Access To Cable Firms 29
Oracle To Purchase Hyperion Solutions In $3.3 Billion Deal 29
Australian Antitrust Authorities Clear Qantas Buyout 30

Environment:

Maryland To Probe Montgomery County Dumping 30
Ignatius Highlights Systems' Vulnerability To Climate Change 31
WSJournal Calls For Killing Federal Programs To Save Energy 31

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Breaks Up Mississippi-To-Chicago Gun Connection 31
DOJ Probe Finds Misspending Of Marshals Funds 33
Man In Minnesota Explosives Probe Left Homeless, Says Attorney 34
FBI To Launch Northern Virginia Anti-Gang Task Force 34
FBI's "Best Undercover Agent" Profiled 34
Four Men From Chicago Suburbs Charged In Drug-Trafficking Probe 35
Law Enforcement Taking Lead In Sports Doping Probes 35
Murder Of Medical Marijuana Provider Highlights Risks Of Even Legal Sales 35
US Global Survey Scrutinizes Counter-Narcotics Efforts 36
Federal Officials Baffled By Mail Bomb Suspect 37
Alabama Man Accepts Plea Bargain In Bomb Case 37

Immigration:

Kennedy Denies Taking "Secretive" Approach To Immigration Bill 37

Tax:

SEC Probing Google's Tax Accounting Methods 38

Congress-Administration:

Walter Reed Commander Relieved Of Duty 38
Rice Names Critic Of US Iraq Policies To Counselor's Post. 40
Defying Veto Threat, House Democrats Pass Union Bill 40
Bush's Pick To Head Consumer Product Safety Commission Riles Critics 41
Ambassadorial Nomination May Be Blocked Over Swift Boat Vets Donation 41
Bill Would Ease Release Of Presidential Papers 41
Hoyer Bill Would Reduce Health-Care Premium Costs For Federal Employees 41
Cheney Fires Up Activists With Speech At Conservative Conference 42
Despite Low Poll Ratings, Bush Remains Fundraising Heavyweight For GOP 42
Krauthammer Defends Funding Manned Space Exploration 43

Other News:

Stocks Lower, But Markets Appear To Steady 43
Poll Finds Majority Favors Guarantee Of Health Insurance ... 44
McCain Pledges To Accept Public Funds For General Election 45
FEC Gives Obama Leeway To Accept Public Financing 46
Clintons, Obama To Appear At Selma Commemoration On Sunday 47
Obama Ancestors Said To Have Owned Slaves 47
Romney Hits McCain On Immigration, Giuliani On Guns, Abortion, Gay Rights 47
Giuliani Apparently On Way To Victory In South Carolina Straw Poll 47
Democratic Candidates Accused Of School Choice Hypocrisy 48
Early Start To Campaign Could Give Gingrich, Gore An Opening 48
Washington State Senate Urged To Call For Bush Impeachment 48
Doubts Raised About Accuracy Of US Intelligence On Iran, North Korea 48
Diplomats Report Progress On Iran Sanctions 49
Jordanian King To Address US Congress 50
State Department Report Accuses Venezuela Of Drug Trafficking 50
Mexican Ambassador Praises Upcoming Bush Visit 50
US Wants Missile Radar In Caucasus 50
Ukrainian Opposition Leader Calls For Early Elections 51
Negroponte Begins Tour Of Asia 51
US Says China Expanding Nuclear Sub Fleet 51
US May Seek Limit On Chinese Paper Imports 51
US, Brazil Negotiating Ethanol Partnership 51
African Peacekeeping Force Arrives In Somalia 51
US Stirs Debate Over Home Of Africa Development Bank 52
Discouragement Of Multiple Sex Partners May Slow Spread Of AIDS In Africa 52

DOJ_NMG_0139114

WSJ Criticizes UN Official On Women's Rights..... 52

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 52

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 53

DOJ_NMG_0139115

TERRORISM NEWS:

Australian Detainee Is First Charged Under New Military Tribunal System. NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 9, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The US military today filed terrorism charges against an Australian man who is being held at the Guantanamo Bay Prison without charges for five years." David Hicks "was charged with providing material support for terrorism and could face life in imprisonment if convicted. He's the only Australian held at Gitmo and the first detainee to be charged under the new military tribunal system."

The Washington Post (3/2, A3, White, 690K) says Hicks, "in U.S. custody for more than five years, will face two counts of providing material support for terrorism." The filing of charges could "prompt Hicks's attorneys to initiate a legal challenge" of the Military Commissions Act of 2006. McClatchy (3/2, Rosenberg) says that under that law, Hicks "must be arraigned within 30 days. His trial must be within 90 days after that, meaning his case will go before a military commission by July. It would be the first U.S. war-crimes trial since World War II."

The AP (3/2, Flaherty) reports, "Hicks is a former kangaroo skinner captured in Afghanistan in December 2001. He has been held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for more than five years without trial." The AP adds, "According to government officials and documents, the Defense Department will announce that Hicks is being charged with 'providing material support for terrorism.' Hicks would be have a trial in a special military tribunal, established in a law that Congress passed last year, rather than a civilian court. Opponents have vowed to challenge the constitutionality of the military tribunal proceedings. … An earlier formulation of such military tribunals was declared unconstitutional last year by the Supreme Court." The AP notes, "Hicks' legal status has been a sore spot for Australia. Last month, nearly half the members of Australia's Parliament signed a letter to the U.S. Congress appealing for help repatriating him. … The topic was also discussed this month in a meeting between Vice President Dick Cheney and Australian Prime Minister John Howard. Under growing public pressure, and with elections due later this year, Howard has begun pushing U.S. officials to deal with Hicks' case more quickly."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Acknowledges Slow Pace Of Katrina Recovery. President Bush visited Biloxi, MS, and New Orleans to survey the area devastated by Hurricane Katrina. Much of the coverage focuses on his acknowledgement of the frustration of many residents. ABC and NBC noted the story in their evening broadcasts. ABC World News (3/1, story 7, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) said it was Bush's "first visit in six months to the region," and reported the President "acknowledged that people in the hurricane zone are angered by the slow pace of recovery. And he promised to speed up government efforts."

NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 6, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The President began his tour in Mississippi, driving through the still total devastation to see homes being rebuilt with Federal money. He then traveled to New Orleans, meeting over a meal with Mayor Ray Nagin and other officials there." NBC also said the President "acknowledged the frustration for the people of the region and promised to help speed up recovery efforts."

The AP (3/2, Feller) also reports Bush "acknowledged the deep frustration of Hurricane Katrina victims and said the federal government shares the blame for the slow recovery of the Gulf Coast." He "gave residents of the battered region a message: 'The federal government still knows you exist.'" In stops "across coastal Mississippi and Louisiana," Bush "defended the federal allotment of $110 billion in relief aid. Of that total, less than half has been spent." Said Bush, "If it is stuck because of unnecessary bureaucracy, our responsibility at the federal, state and local level is to unstick it." The AP adds the President "sought to fight the perception that those whose lives were devastated by the August 2005 storm had fallen off his agenda." The Administration's "initial response to the most destructive natural disaster in US history," says the AP, "was widely seen as a failure." Moreover, "the president is still dogged by criticism. Democratic lawmakers are pushing for more action."

The New York Times (3/2, Pear, 1.16M) notes that in New Orleans, Bush "had lunch with state and local officials at Li'l Dizzy's Café on the outskirts of the French Quarter. In brief remarks before the meal, Mr. Bush noted concerns about the rebuilding delays." But "at a meeting with local officials in Biloxi, he said: 'I fully understand that there's still work to be done. There's a continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times.'" The Times adds, "Some elected officials saw Mr. Bush's trip as an effort to make amends for the fact that he said nothing about the recovery in his State of the Union address on Jan. 23."

DOJ_NMG_0139116

But the Washington Post (3/2, Fletcher, 690K) reports that "in a trip designed to highlight the progress made in the 18 months since the hurricane devastated New Orleans and the Mississippi coast," Bush also "insisted that 'people's lives are improving and there is hope.'" The Post adds, "In Washington, House Democrats renewed their own criticism of the administration. They promised to move legislation -- which has not been endorsed by Bush -- to forgive some federal loans to disaster-wracked communities while easing matching fund requirements tied to some federal aid." Bush's trip "was a continuation of his attempts to undo the political damage caused by the storm, which proved to be a pivotal event in his presidency. The federal government's bungled response to the disaster undermined the administration's claim to competence and helped propel Bush's approval ratings downward."

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Reynolds, 850K) says "Administration officials" said the criticism from Democrats yesterday "was misdirected. 'I think there's been lots of progress over the last 18 months,' said Don Powell, the administration's Gulf Coast recovery coordinator. 'Children are in school. "Help wanted" signs are up. The port is 100% back. Restaurants are open.' He added: 'Is there more to be done? Absolutely.'"

The New Orleans Time-Picayune (3/2, Ritea) reports Bush also "took time to herald the city's innovative approach to reforming its long-failing public school system, particularly with its use of charters, public schools subject to state standards and oversight, but governed by individual boards that are given the freedom to take innovate approaches to education." Said Bush, "Charter schools, to me, say innovation, individuality." Even though Hurricane Katrina "did terrible devastation...it gave a great chance for renewal. And one of the areas where renewal is most evident is in the school system of New Orleans." Bush, however, "did not announce any plans to waive a state and local match currently required for federal aid, despite a prediction from several Louisiana officials that he would." The AP (3/2, Bohrer) also covers Bush's comments about charter schools, and notes "critics, including teachers' union leaders, believe charters are not the way to go, saying the charter model is unproven for providing solid academic results and has created a two-tier public education system here."

The Biloxi Sun Herald (3/2, Wilemon, 45K) reports it was the President's "14th visit to the Coast since the hurricane." Biloxi Mayor A.J. Holloway "gave Bush a gag gift of appreciation: a personalized car tag that read 'Bush 43.' 'You've been to the Katrina zone 14 times in 18 months,' Holloway said. 'It's not that we don't like seeing you, but you've been here so many times. It's about time you had one of these. Don't leave home without it.'" WLOX-TV Biloxi (3/1, 10:33 pm) noted that Bush "joked that once his Presidency is over and he owns a private car again, he'll put the plate on and head over to Mississippi from his home state of Texas."

Local TV stations from all around the country also covered the President's Gulf Coast visit. Some examples: WAFB-TV Baton Rouge (3/1, 10:06 pm) reports, "Bush is to attend services tomorrow morning at St. Louis Cathedral in New Orleans, observing the 18 month mark since Hurricane Katrina. … He arrived in Louisiana after an earlier stop in Gulf Coast, Mississippi."

WGNO-TV New Orleans (3/1, 6:03 pm) reported, "Before landing in the Crescent City, the President made the rounds in Mississippi. In Long Beach, the President met with state and local leaders. … Louisiana Senator Mary Landrieu today offered her thoughts on President Bush's visit to the Gulf Coast." The station showed Sen. Landrieu saying, "I am grateful for his visit. But it's going to take more than words and more than visits. It's going to take action to get the job done."

WBRZ-TV Baton Rouge (3/1, 10:12 pm) showed the President saying, "I told the people that I would work with the Congress to write a $110 billion check to help the people of Louisiana and Mississippi and that check has been written." This quote was aired by a number of other local TV stations in different parts of the country, including WDRB-TV Louisville (3/1, 10:41 pm), WSJV-TV South Bend (3/1, 10:36 pm), and WGHP-TV Greensboro (3/1, 10:34 pm).

New Orleans Justice System Still Struggling. ABC World News (3/1, story 8, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) described New Orleans' justice system as "one of the casualties of Katrina. … It was troubled before the hurricane. And then, the storm destroyed courthouses, washed away records, and drove defense lawyers out of town, never to return. The cumulative effect has been disastrous." ABC (Osunsami) continued, "A study commissioned by the Justice Department says it all: People who wait in jail with no charges. Trials that cannot take place, even for defendants who wish to plead guilty." Pam Metzger runs a law clinic that has "helped free nearly a thousand…defendants who were lost in the system." Prof. Pam Metzger, Tulane University Law School: "Think about trying to write the court and call the court and say, "When am I coming court," and there's no answer because no phone picks up. There's no phones. There were no phones." Osunsami: "That's still the case somewhat to this day?" Metzger nodded.

DOJ_NMG_0139117

More Commentary. In an editorial, USA Today (3/2, 11A, 2.27M) says "the president could energize the rebuilding effort simply by putting it back in the national spotlight. Bush inexplicably failed to mention Katrina in his nationally televised State of the Union address last month. His visit Thursday brought a planeload of reporters to the Gulf Coast. Returning with the frequency he did in the first year after the disaster could boost tourism and help recruit more of the volunteers whose work has been essential to the recovery." Bush "will have to do more of what he did Thursday and a lot more in Washington."

US Said To Be "Ill-Prepared" To Handle Nuclear Attack. McClatchy (3/2, Gordon) reports that while the Bush Administration "has warned repeatedly about the threat of a terrorist nuclear attack and spent more than $300 billion to protect the homeland, the government remains ill-prepared to respond to a nuclear catastrophe." McClatchy interviews with "more than 15 radiation and emergency preparedness experts and a review of internal documents" suggest that, "absent a major preparedness push, the U.S. response to a mushroom cloud could be worse than the debacle after Hurricane Katrina, possibly contributing to civil disorder and costing thousands of lives." In a July 2005 draft of a confidential memo to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Pentagon analyst John Brinkerhoff wrote that the US "is unprepared to mitigate the consequences of a nuclear attack. … We were unable to find any group or office with a coherent approach to this very important aspect of homeland security." McClatchy (3/2, Gordon) also says the "number of experts who believe that terrorists could obtain the apparatus for a nuclear bomb is impressive and growing."

Princeton Scholars Say Nuclear Transfer Should Be Crime Against Humanity. In a Washington Post (3/2, 690K) op-ed, Anne-Marie Slaughter and Thomas Wright of the Princeton Project on National Security write, "Current efforts to close down the nuclear black market have an Achilles' heel -- certain states will not cooperate and will even protect nuclear criminals. For instance, A.Q. Khan, Pakistan's 'father of the bomb,' lives comfortably under house arrest; U.S. officials have not been allowed even to interrogate him. Pakistan's government is too frightened of a domestic backlash to act harshly against a national hero. Globally, of the dozens suspected of involvement in his network, only three have been successfully prosecuted. … Making nuclear transfer a crime against humanity captures the enormity of the offense and would dramatically increase the cost of getting caught."

Civil Air Patrol Providing Reconnaissance In War Against Terrorism. The Washington Times (3/2, Hudson, 88K) reports the Civil Air Patrol, which will celebrate 65 years of operation this week, "is playing a vital role in the war against terrorism. The 56,000-member-strong organization is participating in a growing number of homeland security missions, conducting aerial reconnaissance of military ships and other offshore activity, protecting sensitive and critical infrastructure from terrorist attacks, and assisting the US Border Patrol." Meanwhile, "The volunteers of the Air Force auxiliary in Washington protect the country by acting as the enemy during monthly 'Falcon Virgo' exercises over the nation's capital, where they perform a high-tech game of hide-and-seek with armed Air Force jets."

Chertoff Announces Real ID Rules, Delays Deadline For Compliance. The Washington Times (3/2, Hudson, 88K) reports that in announcing regulations for implementation of the Real ID Act yesterday, DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said that the deadline for compliance with the law would be delayed, "bowing to pressure from federal and state lawmakers who say next year's deadline can't be met." Chertoff said the "standards correct glaring vulnerabilities exploited by some of the September 11 hijackers who used fraudulently obtained driver's licenses to board the airplanes in their attack against America." The deadline for states to begin compliance with the law "will be extended from May 2008 until December 2009, and up to 20 percent of state homeland security grants can be used to implement the program." Sen. Susan Collins "said she is 'grateful that Secretary Chertoff has listened to the concerns of so many state leaders and my colleagues on this important issue.'" Rep. Thomas M. Davis "called the delay reasonable but said the new ID standards remain an urgent national security priority."

DOJ_NMG_0139118

The Washington Post and New York Times this morning focus on the cost and privacy concerns associated with the law -- rather than the announcement that the deadline for compliance would be delayed. The Washington Post (3/2, A5, Hsu, 690K) reports implementing the Real ID Act "will cost $23.1 billion over 10 years, require motorists born after 1935 to present birth certificates or passports, and add $28 to the cost of issuing each license, officials said yesterday." The release of "[l]ong-awaited" rules for the program "did not quell criticism from states, privacy advocates and libertarian groups," who said the law "represents an unfunded mandate and creates a national ID-card system that will increase the consequences of identity theft." The Post does not mention until its fifth paragraph that the new rules delayed the deadline for compliance with the law. Meanwhile, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that technology will ease, not increase, privacy threats, and that the federal government will not keep a central database of personal information." The secretary said he thought most would say $20 to "prevent people from getting on airplanes or getting in buildings and killing Americans" was money "well spent."

The New York Times (3/2, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "To help the states get started, Mr. Chertoff offered up to $100 million in federal grants this year, although the money would come from antiterrorism funds already promised to the states. So far, only $40 million in federal aid has been provided for the program." Sen. Susan Collins, "who had advocated delaying the start of the program," said DHS "has finally recognized that it simply was unfair to impose this burden on the states." However, "the plan received largely negative reviews from state officials and civil liberties experts. … The National Governors Association said the federal aid Mr. Chertoff offered, representing about 10 percent of the cost in the first year and an unknown amount in future years, was woefully inadequate."

Lawmakers Unveil List Of Questionable Homeland Security Spending Items. The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 8, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The government spends billions of our tax dollars every year to keep the country safe. That, of course, means putting on puppet shows and lawn mower races. If that doesn't make sense to you, it also didn't make sense to the congressmen who discovered that is where some of our homeland security money is actually going." CBS (Keteyian) added, "Democratic Congressman Anthony Weiner of New York and Republican Jeff Flake of Arizona revealed a list of federal homeland security projects that put the boon in boondoggle. A series of taxpayer-supported programs that play like a punchline: $7,000 for bullet-proof vests for police and fire department dogs in Ohio. $8,000 for clown and puppet shows performed by fire safety officials in Wisconsin. $33,000 for customized trailers to be used at a mushroom festival. And lawn mower drag races in Texas. $200,000 for -- count them -- seventy security cameras to protect a remote Alaska fishing village, cameras the town admits on its Website, mostly no one watches." Recent reports on CBS have given "rise to those who question a formula set by Congress that requires every state, regardless of risk, get a slice of the Homeland Security pie." Weiner and Flake proposed "a public database that would hold states accountable for how they spend every DHS dollar." The lawmaker's "critique comes as Homeland Security is reviewing applications on how it will allocate nearly $2 billion to cities and states this year."

DHS Official To Research Solutions For Departmental Morale Problems. The Washington Post's (3/2, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that Paul A. Schneider, "joined the Department of Homeland Security as undersecretary for management two months ago," and House Homeland Security Committee's "subcommittee on management, investigations and oversight," members "expressed concern about morale of employees at Homeland Security, noting that the department got rock-bottom scores in important job-satisfaction, leadership and management areas in a survey conducted by the Office of Personnel Management. Schneider said the department plans to launch focus groups in the next 60 days to explore workforce issues and find solutions."

NYTimes Lauds Bloomberg For Joining "Ground Zero Disease" Fight. The New York Times (3/2, 1.16M) editorializes, "Mayor Michael Bloomberg has finally joined the urgent campaign to get Washington to care for the responders who helped New Yorkers after the Sept. 11 attacks. Many responders -- and people who studied, lived or worked around the World Trade Center -- are seriously ill, and Mr. Bloomberg can play an important role in making the federal government take responsibility for them." Bloomberg "was once skeptical about what is being called ground zero disease. But he is now campaigning to get Washington to pay $150 million a year for three health centers that already treat police officers, firefighters and others made sick by the attacks. The money is badly needed to improve care in these underfinanced, overworked centers."

DOJ_NMG_0139119

WAR NEWS:

Divided Democrats Abandon Plans To Derail "Surge." The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "The Iraq war is proving a humbling experience not just for President Bush, but also for those in Congress who want to end it. Plagued by internal divisions, House Democrats have largely abandoned efforts to cap the increase in US troop levels for Iraq and will focus instead on highlighting the war's strain on the military and competing US interests in Afghanistan." The House Appropriations Committee "may add as much as $1 billion to Mr. Bush's request to beef up US operations in Afghanistan and shift additional funds to rural-development programs. More than $2 billion would be set aside to improve the readiness of strategic military reserves in the US, and provisions would be added to curb the frequent practice of stretching personnel in Iraq by extending combat tours for units already deployed." But "the White House is given discretion to bypass any such restrictions that it finds burdensome, and President Bush will have a relatively free hand to add the more than 21,500 soldiers and Marines he wants by the end of May."

In a similar report, the Christian Science Monitor (3/2, Chaddock, 59K) says that despite their "big antiwar mandate, Democrats are scrambling to find a way forward." Democrats have "balked at a proposal by Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, who chairs the Defense subcommittee on that panel, to use the war-funding request to rein in Bush's options as commander in chief. … After a fractious caucus meeting on Tuesday, House leaders backed off the Murtha proposal, but opened new rifts with liberals in their caucus who favor stronger moves to get US forces out of Iraq." Murtha, adds the Monitor, "has emerged as a lightening rod in an intense intraparty debate over how to end US involvement in Iraq. On the one hand, the 44-member Blue Dog Coalition, which is made up of fiscal conservatives, opposes moves that would either deprive US troops of funding they need or appear to micromanage the war."

Meanwhile, the AP (3/2, Flaherty) reports, "House Democratic leaders have coalesced around legislation that would require troops to come home from Iraq within six months if that country's leaders fail to meet promises to help reduce violence there, party officials said Thursday." The plan "would retain a Democratic proposal prohibiting the deployment to Iraq of troops with insufficient rest or training or who already have served there for more than a year. Under the plan, such troops could only be sent to Iraq if President Bush waives those standards and reports to Congress each time." The AP adds, "The proposal is the latest attempt by Democrats to resolve deep divisions within the party on how far to go to scale back US involvement in Iraq."

As Democratic attempts to find a consensus position on the war continue, says the Washington Post (3/2, A4, Layton, 690K), "House Democrats wrangle over details of a $100 billion war spending bill -- including whether restrictions should be placed on troops sent to Iraq." Some "want to add significant money for agricultural relief, Hurricane Katrina reconstruction and other nonmilitary projects." Rep. Collin C. Peterson, "who chairs the Agriculture Committee, said yesterday that rural states hit hard by floods, droughts and snowstorms in the past two years need $4 billion in emergency farm relief. And attaching the request to the war bill is the best way to insure they get it, he said." The Post adds, "As of yesterday, Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), who chairs the House Appropriations Committee, had agreed to add about $3 billion to the war bill to help close military bases and relocate troops as part of the Base Realignment and Closure process. And he approved an additional $750 million for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a joint federal and state program that provides health care for six million poor children."

Meanwhile the Wall Street Journal (3/2, A4, Harwood, 2.04M), in its "Washington Wire" column, describes Democrats as "divided over how to confront Bush on Iraq troops levels," and reports they intend to change their focus to an "issue with broader appeal: accountability for billions in federal spending on Katrina and other issues they contend are rife with mismanagement and abuse. A House Republican Leadership aide argues that such initiatives mask Democrats' desires for higher spending: 'Republicans are trying to turn off the faucet on the front end, whereas Democrats keep looking for a bigger hose.'"

The New York Times (3/2, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports on the debate in the Senate, where "Democrats tried

DOJ_NMG_0139120

Thursday to bridge their political differences over how to confront…Bush on Iraq even as they acknowledged that agreement on an approach remained out of reach." The Democrats "face the challenge of coming up with "a plan that would satisfy antiwar lawmakers, keep the party's centrists on board and win over some Republicans." Yesterday, they "were somewhat defensive about their internal divisions, which have left them open to criticism that unlike the House of Representatives, they have yet to weigh in with a strong vote on the war even though public dissatisfaction with it contributed to their election gains in November." The Times adds, "Even as the Democrats searched for a policy solution, the political sensitivity over trying to restrict war spending was brought into sharp focus on Thursday." Sen. Kent Conrad, "Democrat of North Dakota and chairman of the Budget Committee, raised the idea of cutting $20 billion from the president's $145 billion request for next year for Iraq and Afghanistan." But "he quickly dropped that idea after fellow Democrats insisted on keeping the president's number in the nonbinding budget framework that is the first step toward bills financing all of the government's programs, not just the war."

Illustrating the Democratic split, Sen. Russ Feingold – usually identified with the most liberal wing of the caucus -- said on MSNBC (3/1, O'Donnell), "The best way to do it is to repeal the authority from 2002. And I've seen some drafts of this that would do exactly that. So that's very positive, and I think that's a good effort. There are other parts of it that have to be done right. If you sort of create a new mission or a new Iraq war that's more limited, I think that's unwise. Why should we do that? … It depends exactly whether we're creating something that really moves us out of Iraq or whether we're going to have loopholes that the Administration will exploit."

Republicans, meanwhile, appear to be coming together against any Democratic attempts to derail Bush's war strategy. The Washington Times (3/2, Miller, 88K) reports, "Republicans in Congress -- including most who have defected from…Bush's plan to send reinforcements to Iraq -- have closed ranks and are prepared to thwart the Democrats' continued efforts to undermine the war strategy. Most of the 17 House Republicans who voted for a resolution against the troop-surge plan -- which was about half the number predicted by Democrats -- now oppose moves to cut war funding or attach conditions to appropriations bills that would hamstring the war effort." And "all but one of the seven Senate Republicans that backed the anti-surge resolution in their chamber say they will not support any funding cuts. The one other dissident Republican -- Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska -- declined to comment on the issue."

Panetta Criticizes Democratic Proposals. The Washington Times (3/2, Lambro, 88K) reports, "A senior Democratic adviser said yesterday he is disappointed and dismayed by the efforts of House and Senate Democrats to change administration policies in Iraq, predicting they would lead to further division and stalemate in Congress on the war. 'If you stand back, the whole debate has been pretty frustrating. The bigger problem is that [Democratic leaders'] proposals are not going anywhere, such as some revised authority for the war,' said Leon Panetta, a key Democratic member of the Iraq Study Group whose proposals to stabilize Iraq were largely dismissed by…Bush." Panetta added that the Democrats' "efforts are doomed. Either they are going to be blocked in Congress or vetoed by the president, or both. The end result is that it will make us more divided and impotent on war policy." Panetta's "blunt complaints about how his party has bungled the war debate underscores a partywide discomfort among many Democrats that their leaders have failed to craft a politically viable compromise that can draw some bipartisan support."

Cheney Says Iraq Pullout Would Allow Victorious Al Qaeda Fighters To Flock Into Afghanistan. The Washington Post (3/2, Raum, 690K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney said Thursday night that a too-soon withdrawal of US forces from Iraq could send victorious militants spreading out, with some flocking to Afghanistan to fight alongside a regrouping Taliban." He "demanded that the Democratic-controlled Congress support President Bush's military buildup 'on time and in full.'" The Post adds, "Speaking before a receptive audience of conservatives, the vice president -- just back from a trip that included unannounced stops in Afghanistan and Pakistan -- sharply criticized efforts by some Democrats to restrict funds for additional troops or to place restrictions on their deployment." Said Cheney, "I sincerely hope the discussion this time will be about winning in Iraq, not about posturing on Capitol Hill. Anyone can say they support the troops, and we should take them at their word. But the proof will come when it's time to provide the money and the support. … We expect the House and the Senate to meet those needs on time and in full." The Vice President "spoke at an annual dinner of the Conservative Political Action Conference. The audience included conservative activists, leaders and policymakers."

DOJ_NMG_0139121

Martinez Says US Public Wants Success In Iraq. RNC Chairman Sen. Mel Martinez said on MSNBC (3/1, O'Donnell), "I believe the American people want to see us succeed in Iraq, that they still have hope that, if we have a winning strategy, that it ought to be employed. I think what people have is a frustration with Americans dying in Iraq, a frustration with the Iraqi government not doing some of the things that they're now doing. … If they do the political things to reach a political settlement -- we now have diplomacy in the region taking place -- and we also pacify Baghdad, I believe we're going to some success in the near future. And I think that's going to be a sign that the American people will respond to."

Security Crackdown Appears To Be Reducing Baghdad Violence. USA Today (3/2, 4A, 2.27M) reports, "Baghdad experienced one of its least violent days in months Thursday when there were two reported bombings and one fatality. The relative lull in violence came in the third week of a US-Iraqi plan to improve security in Baghdad." President Bush "has ordered an increase of 17,500 U.S. troops in the capital to conduct house-to-house searches and help disarm sectarian militias." USA Today adds, "A US military report said Monday that the number of roadside bombs was down 20% since the security initiative began in mid-February and sectarian murders were at their lowest levels in a year."

AFP (3/2) reports that "three weeks after the launch of the new US strategy in Iraq, Pentagon officials were cautious Thursday saying early signs were good, but that it was too soon to make concrete conclusions. 'I would say, just looking at the reports from the people on the ground. ... I think their assessment would be, 'It's too early to draw any conclusions,' because this is still in the early stages,' Pentagon number two Gordon England said."

Meanwhile the Los Angeles Times (3/2, Zavis, 850K), under the headline "Iraq's Displaced Trickle Home," reports that "encouraged by a major security clampdown that began Feb. 13, and reassurances from his neighbors," some Iraqi refugees are beginning to "test Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's recent pledge to reverse the tide of sectarian 'cleansing' sweeping Baghdad and move tens of thousands of people back home." However, "even if the government can convince families that their old neighborhoods are safe, there is no guarantee they can regain their homes. Many residences have been looted or torched, others commandeered by gunmen or occupied by families fleeing violence elsewhere."

Official Says "Surge" Will Require As Many As 28,500 Soldiers. USA Today (3/2, 4A, Brook, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush's planned increase of U.S. forces in Iraq will require as many as 28,500 troops, Pentagon officials told a Senate committee Thursday." Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England also "told the Senate Budget Committee that it will be clear within months whether the so-called surge in forces has succeeded in helping secure Iraq. 'By this summer we would have a much better indication in terms of the success of the program,' England said. 'And so at that time we would adjust however is appropriate to do so.'" In January, Bush "said he would send 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq. England said 6,000 to 7,000 support troops will be needed to back up the larger combat force."

Car Bomb Kills Seven In Fallujah. The New York Times (3/2, Rubin, 1.16M) reports, "A car bomb that was apparently aimed at a policeman's wedding party in Falluja, west of Baghdad, killed seven guests on Thursday and wounded six, the local police said." The attack "appeared to be part of a mounting battle in western Iraq between insurgents with ties to Al Qaeda and other local and tribal groups, local residents said." The bomb "exploded in the late afternoon as the wedding party was gathering at the home of the groom, a policeman. Neither the bride nor the groom was wounded, but those killed were friends and relatives of the couple, said Abu Khalid, a cousin of the groom."

50 Insurgents Killed In Western Iraq. The Washington Post (3/2, A9, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Iraqi security forces backed by Sunni tribesmen killed dozens of suspected Sunni insurgents over several hours of fighting Wednesday in a village in western Iraq, Iraqi police officials said Thursday." The fighting "was unusually fierce for an Iraqi-led operation and was also notable because of the collaboration of tribesmen in volatile Anbar province. In recent months, the US military has aligned itself with dozens of tribal sheiks who are collaborating in an effort to drive the Sunni insurgent group Al-Qaeda in Iraq from the vast desert territory."

US Official To Visit Syria For Talks On Iraqi Refugees. Under the headline "New Signs Of US-Syria Thaw As Senior Official Sets Visit," AFP (3/2, Millikin) reports Washington announced Thursday that it was sending "a high-ranking official to Syria for the first time in two years, a move seen as a fresh sign of a possible thaw between Washington and Damascus." Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey will travel to Damascus "in coming weeks" as part of a regional tour dealing with "humanitarian issues related to Iraqi refugees," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "Seeking to play down the diplomatic significance of the trip," McCormack said Sauerbrey would be "paired" on the tour with a representative of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees and "would be authorized to meet with her Syrian counterparts to discuss the refugee issue."

DOJ_NMG_0139122

Professor Urges US To Facilitate Resettlement Of Iraqi Refugees. Aimee Phan, author and professor at Washington State University, writes in a USA Today (3/2, 13A, 2.27M) op-ed, "With the Iraqi refugees count nearing 2 million…and the US government's recent plans to welcome 7,000 refugees for resettlement, a new community of Iraqi-Americans is inevitable. How Americans plan to respond to them and facilitate their resettlement is crucial." Phan noted that "considering the role US foreign policy has had on Iraqis' lives and displacement, it is the government's responsibility to offer them the resources to salvage their community."

Sprawling US Embassy In Baghdad Hampering Reconstruction Efforts. The Washington Post (3/2, A11, Williamson, 690K) reports the US embassy in Baghdad "is one of the largest foreign missions ever operated by the State Department. Its complexity and expense, some say, hampers reconstruction efforts and drains cash from diplomatic efforts worldwide." In addition, the mission's "closely guarded budget is a source of controversy at State, and across the federal government." In addition, the "teeming embassy masks a desperate need for civilians to aid the reconstruction effort," while the State Department "has discussed drafting personnel" for service in Iraq.

Turkey Late In Wishing Talabani Well. The Washington Times (3/2, Birch, 88K) reports, "Messages of good will have been flooding in" since Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was hospitalized in Jordan Sunday. "But a get-well wish from Turkey, one of Iraq's large neighbors, did not come until yesterday." However, the "delayed reaction" from Turkey "is not altogether surprising," but "with Iraq at a critical juncture, analysts fear its reticence limits its effectiveness as a regional power."

Pakistan Arrests Senior Taliban Leader. The Los Angeles Times (3/2, King, Meyer, 850K) reports, "Pakistani authorities have arrested the former defense minister of the Taliban, the most senior insurgent leader to be seized in five years, a government official said Thursday." Pakistan's government "issued no immediate official statement about the detention of Mullah Obaidullah Akhund earlier this week in the southern provincial capital of Quetta." The Times adds, "Local news reports said Akhund was detained Monday, the day Vice President Dick Cheney arrived for an unannounced visit to urge President Pervez Musharraf to take more robust steps against Islamic militants finding safe haven in Pakistan's tribal region near the Afghanistan border."

But the New York Times (3/2, Gall, 1.16M) says "it was not clear whether" the Taliban commander "was picked up before, during or after Mr. Cheney's visit." The timing "may be significant because Mr. Cheney's mission was intended to press Pakistan to do more to crack down on members of the Taliban and Al Qaeda who use Pakistan as a sanctuary. … While Mullah Obaidullah's detention may be a sign of a new commitment by Pakistan to move against the Taliban leadership, the arrest also seemed to confirm Western and Afghan intelligence reports that the Taliban were using Pakistan, and particularly Quetta, to organize their insurgency." A NATO spokesman in Afghanistan, Col. Tom Collins, "said he was not aware of any arrest. American government officials in Washington confirmed the capture, but cautioned that the arrest was unlikely to deal a significant setback to the insurgents."

ABC World News (3/1, story 5, 1:40, Ross, 8.78M) called the arrest "extremely significant. One, he is a man who is very close to the Taliban leader, Mullah Omar, who is close to Osama bin Laden. … And it's believed he may well know the locations of those wanted men."

US-Pakistan "Shotgun Marriage" Seen As Fraught With Danger. Zahid Hussain, who writes from Pakistan for the Wall Street Journal, says this morning (3/2, A11) that "the US-Pakistan partnership that came into being on Sept. 12, 2001 was a shotgun marriage and remains an uneasy alliance. … The outcome of this struggle will affect not only the fate of Pakistan, but also the ideological climate of the Middle East and the security of the world. Gen. Musharraf has provided the US with active support in the hunt for al Qaeda fugitives. His security forces have captured and delivered to the US. several of the most wanted al Qaeda leaders, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Ramzi bin al Shibh, the masterminds of the 9/11 attacks. … There is a huge danger that any new military operation in Waziristan under pressure from Washington will divide the army. Over the last couple years, several midlevel army officers have been court-martialed for refusing to fight in Waziristan. But a policy of appeasement would certainly allow al Qaeda and the Taliban to expand their terrorist base. The militants have already established their rule in the North Waziristan tribal region. The situation is more worrying as their influence spreads elsewhere."

DOJ_NMG_0139123

Bayh Says More US Troops Needed In Afghanistan. In a Thursday morning appearance on Fox News (3/1, Kendall), Sen. Evan Bayh discussed the situation in the Afghanistan-Pakistan border region, saying, "It's a tough situation. It's largely lawless. It has been for centuries. The Pakistani government has tried to some extent to bring that under greater control. They've lost some of their own troops. We're now trying to convince them to do even more. Because it's not good for Pakistan or Afghanistan to have a safe haven where Al Qaeda can operate, the Taliban can operate, they can go back and forth across the border. And we're concerned about a spring offensive in which it will be a very difficult year in Afghanistan. That's why I requested more troops for Afghanistan, because we have a chance to move Afghanistan in a better direction if we do what needs to be done. This year will be a pivotal year."

Panel Says Wars Hindering National Guard's Domestic Role. McClatchy (3/2, Brown) reports, "Stretched thin by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the National Guard is less prepared now than it's ever been to respond to a major terrorist attack, a natural disaster or another domestic crisis, a congressionally appointed panel has found." Because of the wars, the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves found, "88 percent of Army National Guard units and 45 percent of Air National Guard units that aren't deployed overseas have severe equipment shortages. That's reduced the Guard to its lowest readiness level ever and posed an unacceptable risk to Americans, said Arnold J. Punaro, the commission chairman and a retired Marine Corps major general." McClatchy adds, "In a report issued Thursday to Congress, the commission also faulted the Department of Homeland Security for failing to identify the domestic missions the National Guard should be expected to perform and criticized the Defense Department for not equipping the National Guard adequately for those missions."

The AP (3/2, Baldor) reports, "Calling those failures unacceptable," Punaro "said in an interview that federal agencies must get past their turf battles to better protect the public. 'This is unacceptable. The American people would find it unacceptable,' said Punaro, a retired Marine Corps general. 'These are not problems that have just cropped up in the last two years or five years. These are issues that have been pretty much ignored and glossed over for decades.'"

Punaro said on PBS' NewsHour (3/1, Woodruff), "There are no national security missions that we can carry out now or in the future that will not have the Guard and Reserve involved. … They're expected [to be] an operational reserve means that every day a part of that is actually out there, just like the active force, and the part that isn't gone has to be ready to go at a moment's notice. … We're in terrible shape, in terms of equipment availability, particularly for the National Guard. You can have the best-trained troops and the best-led troops, but if you don't have the equipment to do the job, that unit is not going to be as combat-effective as they need to be. Right now…88 percent of the Guard is not combat-ready when it comes to equipment."

The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Tyson, 690K) notes the report also "said prospects for Guard recruiting and retention remain 'highly problematic,' despite successes last year." The panel "is scheduled to issue its final report in January."

Friedman Urges "Moral Surge" To "Delegitimize" Suicide Bombers. The New York Times' (3/2) Thomas Friedman writes that in the wake of recent suicide bombings in Iraq and Afghanistan, "The Bush team is mute. It says nothing, because it has no moral authority. No one would listen. Mr. Bush is losing a P.R. war to people who blow up emergency wards. Europeans are mute, lost in their delusion that this is all George Bush's and Tony Blair's fault. But worst of all, Muslims, the very people whose future is being killed, are also mute." Friedman says that "no [troop] surge can work in Iraq unless we have a 'moral surge,' a counternihilism strategy that delegitimizes suicide bombers."

DOJ:

Domenici, Wilson Said To Have Pressured US Attorney To Indict Democrat. McClatchy (3/2,

DOJ_NMG_0139124

Taylor) reports, "Sen. Pete Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson of New Mexico pressured the US attorney in their state to speed up indictments in a federal corruption investigation that involved at least one former Democratic state senator, according to two people familiar with the contacts." The "alleged involvement of the two Republican lawmakers raises questions about possible violations of House of Representatives and Senate ethics rules" and "could taint the criminal investigation into the award of an $82 million courthouse contract." McClatchy adds, "The two people with knowledge of the incident said Domenici and Wilson intervened in mid-October, when Wilson was in a competitive re-election campaign that she won by 875 votes out of nearly 211,000 cast." David Iglesias, "who stepped down as US attorney in New Mexico on Wednesday, told McClatchy Newspapers that he believed the Bush administration fired him Dec. 7 because he resisted the pressure to rush an indictment."

The Albuquerque Tribune (3/2) reports, "Sen. Pete Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson aren't saying whether they contacted then-U.S. Attorney David Iglesias in the weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 elections about the pace of his corruption investigation of New Mexico Democrats." The Tribune continues, "Domenici and Wilson, Albuquerque Republicans, have not returned phone calls from numerous news outlets asking for a response to Iglesias' allegations. … The Justice Department was unaware Iglesias had had conversations with members of Congress until Wednesday, Roehrkasse said. According to Roehrkasse, Iglesias should have reported the contact to department officials. … Roehrkasse would not say whether any member of the New Mexico delegation recommended that Iglesias be dismissed. … But Matt Farrauto, executive director of the New Mexico Democratic Party, on Wednesday called for Wilson to answer questions about Iglesias' dismissal, and whether she played a role in it. … 'It's not much of a leap to believe that Heather Wilson pressured or personally instigated pressure for an indictment,' Farrauto said. 'This should be investigated, and she should be held accountable.'"

House Committee Subpoenas Dismissed US Attorneys. The AP (3/2, Talhelm) reports, "A House committee is compelling four of at least eight U.S. Attorneys ousted from office in recent months to tell their stories under oath, after one prosecutor said he believes he was fired for political reasons." The AP continues, "Democrats on a House Judiciary subcommittee voted 7-0 Thursday to subpoena fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. 'Bud' Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Seattle. No Republican members of the panel attended Thursday's meeting, which lasted less than five minutes." The AP adds, "The lawmakers said they are troubled that the Bush administration may be punishing prosecutors for being too effective at pursuing political corruption cases. … The House subpoenas are the first issued by the new Democratic-controlled Congress. The U.S. Attorneys are scheduled to appear at a Tuesday hearing with other witnesses, including a representative from the Justice Department. … The Senate Judiciary Committee asked the four prosecutors to testify before it the same day."

The Washington Post (3/2, A4, Eggen, Kane) reports, "The moves mark the latest escalation in the battle between congressional Democrats and the Justice Department over the controversial dismissals of eight U.S. attorneys, at least five of whom were presiding over public corruption probes when they were fired. … 'Are these people being removed for doing their job and for it doing it too well?' asked Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Calif.), chairwoman of the panel, who called the subpoenas 'a last resort.'" The Post continues, "The controversy, which has been simmering for two months, boiled over this week after departing prosecutor David C. Iglesias of New Mexico alleged that two unnamed lawmakers had pressured him to speed up the prosecution of Democrats before the November elections. Iglesias said he believed that complaints from the lawmakers may have led to his dismissal, an allegation the Justice Department has disputed. … The state's top two Democrats, Rep. Tom Udall and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, and Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) have denied calling Iglesias. Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) and Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) have not responded to requests for comment over the past two days and deflected questions from the Associated Press about the allegations." The Post notes, "Iglesias's office was conducting a probe into allegations involving construction contracts and a prominent Democratic former state senator. … At the time of the alleged phone calls, Wilson, a close ally of Domenici's, was in a tight reelection battle with then-state Attorney General Patricia Madrid. Wilson won by fewer than 2,000 votes. … Iglesias said yesterday that he will identify the lawmakers only if compelled by a subpoena. … 'I fear retaliation,' said Iglesias, a Republican and former military defense lawyer who served as a model for a character in the movie 'A Few Good Men.' 'This is a small state and there are not too many employment opportunities, and I fear they will blacklist me.'" The Post adds, "Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that the department has been 'very forthcoming' with Congress about the dismissals and that any allegations that prosecutors were removed to interfere with investigations are 'completely wrong.' … Justice officials have said Iglesias and six others were fired for 'performance-related' reasons and have denied that any were targeted to disrupt public corruption probes. Officials have acknowledged that an eighth prosecutor, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, was removed to make way for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove."

The New York Times (3/2, Johnston) reports, "The House panel acted after the prosecutors privately told lawmakers that they would not testify voluntarily, not wanting to get in the middle of what has grown into a serious political embarrassment for the Justice Department, but that they would give testimony if compelled." The Times continues, "In floor speeches and at a hearing last month, Democrats have repeatedly attacked the dismissals as a politically motivated effort to replace independent-minded prosecutors with more pliable operatives of the Bush administration. … Several of the prosecutors had been engaged in politically sensitive cases involving Republicans, for instance Ms. Lam's continuing corruption investigation in the wake of a related guilty plea in 2005 by Representative Randy Cunningham of California." The Times notes, "Others had irritated Republicans in their state. Mr. McKay, for one, had decided against impaneling a grand jury to examine accusations of voter fraud in Washington State's 2004 election for governor, won by a Democrat, Christine Gregoire. … At a hearing last month, Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said most of the dismissals had been related to job performance, an assertion that brought protests from the ranks of the ousted prosecutors. … Several said they had been given no reason for their removal. Most had received favorable job evaluations from the Justice Department in formal performance assessments based on interviews with judges, law enforcement agencies and members of the office staff."

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Schmitt) reports, "The prosecutors, directed to appear at a hearing Tuesday, were among at least eight who were abruptly removed in recent months by the Justice Department. Officials have said they dismissed the lawyers primarily because of concerns over their performance, as well as policy differences over whether they were pursuing department priorities such as cases of immigration fraud and child exploitation. … But the lawyers — all appointees of President Bush — have not gone quietly. They are publicly disputing the characterization the department has offered for their departures. … The result has been a political embarrassment for the White House and the Justice Department, and an odd spectacle of Democrats giving aid and comfort to Republican appointees." The Times adds, "The vote to issue the subpoenas illustrated a partisan divide: Republicans boycotted the proceeding; the seven Democrats present unanimously endorsed the move. … 'The former U.S. attorneys are alleging very serious charges against the administration, and we need to hear from them,' said Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. 'We want to hear their stories, and we want the administration to address the charges head-on.'"

Bloomberg (3/2, Schmidt, Rowley) reports, "Senator Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, said yesterday that Iglesias and other prosecutors were eager to testify. … 'We have inquired of the fired U.S. attorneys,' he said in remarks on the Senate floor. 'The overwhelming majority of them want to tell more but feel honor-bound not to do it, except if they were brought under the power of a subpoena.'" Bloomberg adds, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the agency has never removed a U.S. attorney in an effort to influence an investigation. On the Iglesias firing, Roehrkasse said the prosecutor served for more than five years and 'we made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns.'"

Nevada US Attorney Leaves Office With No Word On Successor. The Las Vegas Sun (3/2, Skolnik) reports, "U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden's last day in office came and went Wednesday with no word from the Justice Department about who will replace him." The Sun continues, "Even though Bogden was told by a department official soon after he was fired from the job that his office would be given the name of a replacement by the time he left office - Wednesday at midnight - no one had called, at least as of 6 p.m. … 'I've been sitting here, waiting for the call,' said Bogden, the well-regarded Bush appointee who said he has spent the bulk of his last day packing up his office. 'It would have been nice to have gotten some notice by now,' he said during a late afternoon interview." The Sun adds, "According to Bogden, federal statutes dictate that First Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Myhre would take over this morning as acting U.S. attorney, pending further word from Washington. … Bogden had received positive notices and work reviews by his Justice Department bosses - as had all but one of the six other fired U.S. attorneys, according to media reports - begging the question as to why the prosecutors were fired. Justice Department officials said it was because of poor job performance, a notion vehemently rejected by the U.S. attorneys and their supporters."

DOJ_NMG_0139126

The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/2, Packer) reports, "Two high-ranking Department of Justice officials told outgoing U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden in December that his dismissal was unrelated to his job performance, and one of the officials indicated his firing was politically motivated, Bogden said Thursday. … 'I was given an explanation that seemed to me to be political in nature, that had nothing to do with any issues with my performance or issues with the performance of my office,' Bogden said. … He declined to elaborate on the discussion." The Review-Journal adds, "Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, called Bogden on Dec. 7 and asked him to step down from the post he had held since 2001. Battle could not provide an explanation, Bogden said, prompting him to call other officials within the Justice Department. … 'I said you have to give me something more; you can't just throw this bomb into my life,' Bogden said. … Bogden placed a call to an upper-level official at the Justice Department. He said he sensed from that conversation that his dismissal was politically motivated. During a second call to another official, his questions were more direct. … 'I said, "Look, did this decision have anything to do with my job performance or the performance of my office?"' Bogden said, relaying a conversation with an official he declined to name. The official responded: 'That did not enter into the equation.' … Bogden acknowledged he will have to divulge the officials' names if he is subpoenaed to testify before a congressional committee. … Bogden was not among four of the prosecutors a House subcommittee voted Thursday to subpoena to testify next week. The House Judiciary subcommittee said all four agreed to appear, and the Justice Department said it would dispatch a top official to the hearing."

Ashcroft Cancels Plans For Pizza Party With Former DOJ Colleagues. U.S. News and World Report (3/2, Ragavan) reports, "Former Attorney General turned lobbyist John Ashcroft canceled the pizza party he was scheduled to host yesterday for the political appointees from his days heading the Justice Department." US News continues, "The cancellation came after usnews.com reported that the department's ethics office had flagged the party as potentially troublesome in terms of appearance." USA News adds, "In an E-mail sent to the invitees, which Ashcroft's senior adviser, Juleanna Glover Weiss, provided to U.S News, Ashcroft said that he did not realize that 'our sharing of a pizza and soft drinks might erode the high levels of integrity we worked so diligently to engender' when he was attorney general. Ashcroft added that he did not 'believe for a second' that the invitees' integrity 'could be compromised for a piece of pizza.' But he said that 'no fellowship over lunch' was 'worth the sacrifice of any public confidence in the justice community.' Instead, 'Going back to my traditional brown bag lunch,' wrote Ashcroft, 'will not be too much of a challenge for me.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Gonzales Cites "Protecting Integrity Of Business" As Top DOJ Priority. The San Diego Daily Transcript via Yahoo! News (3/2) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales touted the Department of Justice's commitment to combating corporate fraud and public corruption in a speech Thursday in San Diego." The Transcript continues, "Gonzales, making his first appearance here since becoming attorney general two years ago, addressed the American Bar Associations' national institute on white-collar crime. … His remarks came two weeks after Carol Lam was reportedly forced out as U.S. attorney in San Diego because she concentrated too much on white-collar crime and not enough on border smuggling and illegal immigration." The Transcript adds, "In his speech, Gonzales said reliability and transparency are needed for a successful economy. … 'As attorney general, protecting the integrity of business and government is a top priority of mine,' he said. 'A free market cannot include the freedom to cheat, to defraud or to steal. Rules and enforcement are needed to protect the playing field itself and ensure fair competition.'" The Transcript notes, "The Justice Department established a corporate fraud task force in 2002, and it had obtained 1,100 convictions as of the end of last year. … Gonzales said the recent prosecutions involving Enron and WorldComm and the new restrictions imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act have changed corporate America. … Stanford Law School reported a 38 percent decline last year in class-action lawsuits involving securities issues. … But the attorney general said he does not want the Justice Department's renewed oversight to hamper American innovation or prevent individuals from taking risks. … 'The United States is the economic envy of the world,' he said, 'and we are dedicated to keeping it that way. That means we'll stand fast by the laws that keep the markets clean, but it also means we'll stay cognizant of the private sector's need for the oxygen that feeds innovation.' … He also praised the government's 'offensive against all types of white-collar crime.' … 'We have a strong record of prosecuting public corruption cases during my tenure as attorney general,' he said. 'As evidence of that commitment, we have added resources to this fight.'"

US Charges 13 In Insider Trading Probe. The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Johnson) reports, "Federal prosecutors unsealed criminal charges against more than a dozen people, including former executives at four of Wall Street's elite institutions, accused of engaging in thousands of improper trades in two schemes that netted more than $15 million in profit." The Post continues, "A grand jury in Manhattan indicted nine people on conspiracy, fraud and bribery charges. Among them were lawyers and officials responsible for protecting the integrity of the firms and the market, who instead became perpetrators, prosecutors said. They worked for such top-tier firms as UBS, Morgan Stanley, Bank of America Securities and Bear Stearns. … Four others, who agreed to plea bargains, helped investigators crack open the massive, six-year insider-trading plot and will provide testimony against their onetime associates, government officials said." The Post adds, "Together, the charges and guilty pleas mark one of the biggest and most prominent insider-trading busts since the era of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine, when handcuffed executives were marched out of investment firms two decades ago. … The six-month probe unearthed furtive meetings among the alleged conspirators, who used disposable cellphones and coded text messages to evade detection and paid kickbacks in the form of cash-filled envelopes. Investigators said they shook their heads at times as the case increasingly resembled the greed on display in the 1987 film 'Wall Street.'"

USA Today (3/2, 1B, Farrell) reports, "The criminal charges allege that traders from a handful of hedge funds and brokerages, acting on illegal inside information from some of Wall Street's biggest firms, netted $8 million in tainted gains from December 2001 to August 2006. … The Securities and Exchange Commission, which discovered evidence of the ring last year during a routine investigation, filed a parallel set of civil charges against 11 individuals and three hedge funds." USA continues, "While the $8 million pales in comparison with the enormous sums misappropriated by Boesky and others in the 1980s, the scheme exposed Thursday was nevertheless shocking, said Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement. … The majority of inside trading cases involve an individual who comes across inside information and can't resist the temptation to make a quick buck. The difference here, Thomsen said, is that the inside trading ring operated for five years, involved hundreds of tips and thousands of relatively small trades. Worst of all, the inside information allegedly came from three 'top tier' Wall Street firms: UBS, Morgan Stanley and Bear Stearns. 'It's particularly pernicious when Wall Street insiders … shamelessly compromise the markets' integrity and investors' trust for a quick buck,' she said. … Court documents filed by the SEC and Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, allege that the ring leaders of the scheme were: Mitchel Guttenberg, an executive director at UBS; Randi Collotta, an attorney in Morgan Stanley's compliance department; and Erik Franklin, a former portfolio manager for a hedge fund at Bear Stearns. Franklin has pleaded guilty. Attorneys for Collotta and Guttenberg could not be reached."

The New York Times (3/2, Anderson, De La Merced) reports, "It started in 2001 with two old friends meeting at the Oyster Bar in the basement of Grand Central Terminal in Manhattan, discussing a $25,000 debt. … It ended yesterday with federal authorities saying that they had exposed one of the most far-reaching insider trading schemes on Wall Street in decades, involving four investment banks and a web of hedge funds, day traders, lawyers and even a few supervisors, who upon discovering evidence of insider trading, blackmailed the traders to keep quiet about it." The Times continues, "Thirteen people were accused yesterday of taking part in the trading ring, including a former Morgan Stanley compliance official, a senior UBS research executive, three employees from Bear Stearns and a Bank of America employee. … The schemes described by federal authorities were unusual for their breadth and the seniority of the executives involved. … The tactics, however, were all too familiar: Wall Street executives tipping hedge fund traders about potential upgrades or downgrades of stocks, information sure to move a stock's price; leaking information about pending mergers and acquisitions, and taking kickbacks to get access to hot deals. In the middle, authorities say, was a hedge fund manager looking for an edge."

DOJ_NMG_0139128

The Wall Street Journal (3/2, C1, Smith, Scannell, Davies) reports, "Mitchel Guttenberg was $25,000 in debt to Erik Franklin when the two friends got together in 2001 to settle the obligation. The scheme they allegedly concocted that day in New York's cavernous Oyster Bar restaurant grew into one of Wall Street's biggest insider-trading cases in years. … Mr. Guttenberg, now 41 years old, agreed to relay advance word of potentially market-moving stock analysis by the Wall Street arm of Swiss bank UBS AG, where he was a research executive, to Mr. Franklin, now 39, a hedge-fund manager in those days at Bear Stearns Cos., authorities said." The Journal continues, "The participants in what the SEC called a 'brazen' scheme allegedly earned about $15 million based on two strands of alleged inside information. The main one, from the UBS research, accounted for most of those gains. A second stemmed from leaks of takeover deals in the works at the blue-chip Wall Street firm Morgan Stanley. … The takeover-trading tips came from former Morgan Stanley lawyer Randi Collotta, 30, who was a compliance official responsible for monitoring adherence to securities rules, the SEC said. In a statement, Morgan Stanley said it was 'outraged' and had cooperated in the probe and would continue doing so. Ms. Collotta pleaded not guilty in federal court. … UBS depicted itself as a 'victim' of the scheme and said it is 'committed to safeguarding the integrity of its proprietary information.' Bear Stearns, whose employees allegedly traded on both the UBS and Morgan Stanley tips, said the actions described by regulators 'are clear violations of our policies and procedures.' Both UBS and Bear said they are cooperating as well."

The Financial Times (3/2, Masters) reports, "The ring capitalised on two key sources of inside information, according to US Attorney Michael Garcia. … Randi Collotta, a Morgan Stanley compliance officer, allegedly passed on news of pending mergers and acquisitions from 2004 to 2005. Mitchel Guttenberg, a UBS executive director, allegedly gave traders for several hedge funds advance warning of stock upgrades and downgrades for more than six years." The Times adds, "The stream of conspirators who passed on or used the inside information eventually grew to include 14 people, including eight Wall Street professionals, two broker-dealers and three hedge funds, including Lyford Cay, a Bear Stearns vehicle, the Securities and Exchange Commission said. … The SEC estimated that the participants netted more than $15m. If convicted, the defendants face potential maximum sentences ranging from 15 to 90 years, depending on their alleged level of involvement."

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Hamilton, Mulligan) reports, "Though it has receded from public view in the years since Boesky and others made headlines, authorities fear that insider trading is making a comeback on Wall Street amid the current bull market. In particular, they are worried that hedge funds -- private investment groups known for their aggressive styles -- are using such tips to make big profits. … In their case, Guttenberg and Franklin allegedly went to elaborate lengths to conceal their activity, using such dodges as disposable cell phones, coded text messages and clandestine meetings. … And, authorities said, there proved to be no honor among thieves, as several people who caught wind of the insider trading launched mirror trades of their own, and two people went so far as to blackmail the original perpetrators by threatening to expose them."

The New York Law Journal (3/2, Lin) reports, "The Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney's Office claims the defendants participated in two overlapping insider trading rings. The larger of the two was allegedly fed by Mitchel Guttenberg, an institutional client manager in the equity research group at UBS Securities, who tipped off several Wall Street traders over the past six years about upcoming recommendations by UBS analysts. … The second ring was fed by Randi Collotta, a former member of Morgan Stanley's global compliance group who in 2004 and 2005 passed along non-public information about mergers and acquisitions transactions on which the investment bank was advising. … The recipients of her tips included her husband, Christopher Collotta, a Bohemia, N.Y., labor and employment lawyer, and his friend Marc Jurman, a Florida-based broker. Jurman in turn tipped off Robert Babcock, a Bear Stearns & Co. broker who also participated in the UBS ring." The Journal adds, "The Southern District prosecutors also brought charges against two brokerage employees who helped conceal trading -- Samuel Childs and Laurence McKeever of Hoboken, N.J.-based Assent brokerage -- activity by Tavdy and Glass, as well as a Banc of America Securities broker who received a kickback for placing initial public offering shares with one of Franklin's hedge funds. … Among the inside information Guttenberg passed along was that UBS was going to downgrade the stocks of Caterpillar Inc. and Union Pacific and upgrade those of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Whole Foods Market Inc. The tippees shorted those stocks to be downgraded and accumulated those that were to be upgraded."

AFP (3/2, Cole) reports, "Officials said the ring went to exhaustive lengths to hide their improper trading activities from scrutiny. … Members of the ring met at Manhattan's famed Oyster Bar and also used disposable cell phones, secret codes and cash kickbacks to pull off their improper trades, according to investigators." AFP adds, "Other hedge funds named in the charging documents included the Q Capital hedge fund and the Chelsey Capital hedge fund. … 'Today's events should send a message to anyone who believes that illegal insider trading is a quick and easy way to get rich,' said SEC enforcement chief Linda Thomsen. … 'No matter how clever you are, no matter how hard you try to avoid detection, you underestimate us at your peril,' Thomsen warned. … The Justice Department and the SEC, who were aided by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, said their probes were ongoing and that financial penalties against those involved were also being sought."

Judge Tosses SEC Suit Against Former Citigroup Officials. The New York Law Journal (3/2, Bar) reports, "Charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission that two former Citigroup executives 'aided and abetted' their company in a scheme to cheat mutual fund investors of almost $100 million have been dismissed by a federal judge." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Judge Richard Conway Casey granted Thomas W. Jones and Lewis E. Daidone's motion for summary judgment, finding that the SEC's actions seeking civil penalties and an injunction against the executives were time-barred. … In Securities and Exchange Commission v. Jones, 05 Civ. 7044, the judge also held that the SEC's request for disgorgement was 'not supported by sufficient facts.' … The commission was successful in winning a $208 million settlement against Citigroup, which did not admit or deny guilt. It did not rule out an appeal of Judge Casey's verdict. … 'We are disappointed with the decision and are reviewing our options,' said spokesman John Heine." The Journal notes, "Jones was chief executive of Citigroup's asset management division, and Daidone was treasurer and chief financial officer of the Smith Barney mutual funds in question. … The case involves the 1999 establishment by the company's asset management division of an in-house transfer agent service and its decision to employ First Data, a processing services provider, as the sub-transfer agent."

Former Omnicom Official May Help In Securities Fraud Suit. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, B6, Lattman, O'Connell) reports, "New allegations by a former Omnicom Group Inc. executive could provide legal ammunition to claims in a four-year-old securities-fraud lawsuit that the ad giant created a sham entity, Seneca Investments, to improperly avoid taking write-downs on its Internet assets." The Journal continues, "In an amended complaint filed last month in federal court in Manhattan, the former chief executive of Seneca says Omnicom controlled the entity and no other party contributed any assets to it. The ad giant created Seneca in 2001 to move ailing Internet assets off its balance sheet." The Journal adds, "In the lawsuit, initially filed in December 2006, Michael Tierney, a former Omnicom executive who became CEO of Seneca, alleges Omnicom owes him stock options valued at roughly $1 million. Omnicom maintains the options never vested. Mr. Tierney left Seneca in March 2004. His amended complaint also raises questions about Seneca's independence from Omnicom, making allegations that match similar charges in the securities-fraud suit. … Omnicom lawyer Peter Wald said in a statement yesterday, 'We ... strongly dispute Mr. Tierney's contention that Omnicom controlled Seneca.' … Among possible evidence in Omnicom's defense is a 2001 deposition for an unrelated lawsuit. In that deposition, Mr. Tierney said that he was only employed by Seneca, and not Omnicom."

Nortel Will Again Restate Financial Results. The New York Times (3/2, Austen) reports from Ottawa, "Nortel Networks said Thursday that it would have to restate its results for the fourth time in four years, a move that will delay the filing of its 2006 annual report." The Times continues, "The latest restatement involves results from 2004, 2005 and the first nine months of 2006. The company said that the restatements were necessary to correct mistakes in recording income and because errors by an outside actuary firm caused pension liabilities to be misstated by $104 million over several years. … Over all, the company expects that the changes will raise revenue for the first three quarters of 2006 by about $24 million and increase earnings for the period by $15 million. That will be offset by reductions in the earlier years." The Times adds, "The first restatements stemmed from an accounting scandal that led to the firing of several top executives as well as criminal and securities investigations in both Canada and the United States. … The announcement Thursday was not expected. In recent public statements, Mr. Zafirovski has portrayed the company's accounting struggles as being behind it. Last month, when he announced that the chief financial officer, Peter W. Currie, would be leaving the company at the end of April, Mr. Zafirovski praised his work."

DOJ_NMG_0139130

Ferris Baker Officials Leave Amid Trading Probe. The Baltimore Sun (3/2, Adams) reports, "Ferris Baker Watts, the century-old investment brokerage with deep Baltimore roots, said yesterday that six executives and traders have resigned or taken temporary leave since federal officials and outside counsel began investigating the firm's trades for a former client accused of stealing millions of dollars." The Sun continues, "The list of temporary and permanent departures includes several top executives in Baltimore and Hunt Valley, indicating the investigations have disrupted management at the firm more broadly than company officials disclosed two weeks ago." The Sun adds, "The changes are fallout from a federal probe of an investment fund set up by a Cleveland man who, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission lawsuit, took in $50 million from investors and spent much of the money on stock trades placed through Ferris and other firms. Most of the money is missing. Ferris has stressed that neither it nor its clients lost money in the scheme and that it is cooperating with regulators and federal investigators. … Legal experts and former SEC enforcement officials say even the temporary absence of so many top people shows how seriously Ferris is taking the matter and suggests the firm faces a lengthy and costly probe of its internal controls designed to prevent fraud. Brokers are subject to extensive regulatory oversight and are required to police trading activity to ensure fairness in the market."

Frank Unveils Legislation On CEO Pay. The Financial Times (3/2, Grant) reports, "The first US legislative effort for two years aimed at curbing excessive executive pay emerged on Thursday as Barney Frank, a top Democrat, introduced a bill that would require public companies to allow non-binding shareholder votes on pay packets." The move "comes as companies prepare for the annual meetings season, when executive pay promises to be an issue with shareholders." Frank, chairman of the House financial services committee, "said his bill would require companies to include an advisory – or non-binding – vote in their annual proxies. The move borrows from the UK, where advisory votes have been routine for some years."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Says Libby Verdict Unlikely This Week. In a brief item, the New York Times (3/2, 1.16M) reports Judge Reggie Walton said jurors in I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury trial "seem unlikely to reach a verdict this week and will be allowed to end deliberations at 2 p.m. today to attend to personal matters." The Washington Post (3/2, A7, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) says on calling jurors into court Thursday afternoon on a separate matter, he "noted the jurors' casual clothing and said he 'knew we wouldn't have a verdict today.'"

The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/2) says "about half were wearing blue jeans. Most smiled broadly when Walton granted their request to leave early today. It appeared the seven women and four men were making their own visual aids to help sort out the complicated case. Jurors had asked for a large flip chart, masking tape, sticky notes and pictures of the witnesses almost immediately after beginning deliberations last week. Late Wednesday afternoon, they emerged to ask the judge for easel-sized pages to stick on walls."

Draft Report Finds Problems With Execution Appeals Process. USA Today (3/2, Willing) reports, "Death-sentence appeals take too long, traumatize victims' families and burden states with millions in extra costs for housing convicted killers, a draft of a new study commissioned by the Justice Department shows. … The study also found that death penalty cases are not hopelessly flawed by errors, as opponents of capital punishment have charged." USA continues, "The study, which reviewed state death sentences issued in the 1990s, found that 26% were reversed during the first level of the appeals process. Most of those 'direct appeals' were rejected because of sentencing errors. Some of the death sentences were later reinstated. … In only 11% of those cases did the appeals court find problems with the underlying murder convictions, says the unreleased study by Barry Latzer and James Cauthen, professors at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York." USA notes, "The study challenges a 2000 report that concluded the capital punishment system is "broken" because 68% of all death penalty cases from 1973 to 1995 were eventually overturned. The report, by a team led by Columbia University law professor and death penalty foe

DOJ_NMG_0139131

James Liebman, also found 41% of cases were reversed during direct appeals. … The Liebman study provided a false picture of the death penalty because it included many cases from the 1970s and 1980s, when the U.S. Supreme Court rewrote death penalty rules and caused many sentences to be reversed, the Justice Department's report says. … Latzer and Cauthen tracked 1,676 death sentences issued in 14 "representative" states from 1992 through 2002." USA adds, "Capital punishment foes say the lengthy appeals process may in itself be an argument for abandoning the death penalty. … 'If you like bureaucracy, you'll love the death penalty,' says David Elliot, spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty."

Arkansas Inmate Seeks Immediate Execution. The AP (3/2, Kissel) reports from Little Rock, AR, "A death row inmate who wants an immediate execution had his request rejected Thursday." The AP continues, "The Arkansas Supreme Court ruled the request was premature and said the man's U.S. lawsuit challenging the way the state executes prisoners is still pending. … But over the past three months, convicted murderer Terrick Nooner, 35, has tried to exit the federal lawsuit and has asked the court to order his execution." The AP adds, "Nooner suffers from severe mental illness and believes Arkansas prison officials are abusing him by implanting a device in his body that controls him, federal public defender Julie Brain wrote Jan. 3 in a motion challenging Nooner's attempt to drop his lawsuit. … She said Nooner also claims prison staff is contaminating his food. … 'His overriding goal is to seek redress for, and relief from, the physical harm that he perceives is being repeatedly inflicted on him,' Brain wrote. … U.S. District Judge Susan Webber Wright has not ruled on Nooner's attempt to drop his lawsuit." The AP notes, "Nooner was convicted for the 1993 robbery and murder of Scot Stobaugh, 22, at a laundromat. … Nooner filed his lawsuit last May, saying lethal injection is unconstitutionally cruel and should be banned. Lawsuits nationwide claim the injections leave inmates in pain before they die."

Federal Officials Aid Kentucky Authorities In Child Predator Crackdown. The Kentucky Post (3/2) reports, "Kenton County Commonwealth Attorney Rob Sanders said his office will partner with the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Kentucky to aggressively prosecute child predators and gun-related cases." The Post continues, "As one of the first steps in that effort, Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney for Kenton County Laura Ward was sworn in Wednesday as a Special Assistant United States Attorney. Ward will help prosecute those types of cases at the federal level. … The new arrangement is part of the Department of Justice's Project Safe Childhood and Project Safe Neighborhoods initiatives, which are designed to coordinate efforts of local, state and federal law enforcement and officials, with a focus on prosecutions of child predators and gun violence. … 'These initiatives can only be accomplished through the hard work and cooperation of law enforcement and prosecutors at every level,' U.S. Attorney Amul Thapar said in a statement. 'This partnership shows the commitment that not only our office has, but that Rob Sanders has as well, on making the community safer for our families and our children.' … Sanders said his office has launched local initiatives aimed at combating child predators and gun violence that mirror those of Project Safe Childhood and Project Safe Neighborhood."

US Charges Man Accused In Missouri Kidnapping With Child Pornography. The AP (3/2, Leonard) reports from St. Louis, "A man accused of kidnapping and molesting two boys was indicted Thursday on federal charges he took pornographic pictures and videos of one of the youngsters. … The indictment marked the first federal charges against Michael Devlin, 41, a former pizzeria manager from the St. Louis suburbs." The AP continues, "Devlin is charged with kidnapping and other offenses in the 2002 abduction of Shawn Hornbeck, who is now 15, and the January abduction of 13-year-old Ben Ownby. Both boys were found in Devlin's apartment Jan. 12. … U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said four counts of the six-count indictment allege Devlin photographed and videotaped a minor engaged in sexually explicit acts between 2002 and this year. Two other counts allege he took the minor to Illinois and Arizona with the intent to sexually assault him." The AP adds, "Hanaway said all six counts involved the same child, identified only as 'S,' an apparent reference to Shawn. Authorities have alleged that Devlin held him captive from October 2002 until police found the boy in January." The AP adds, "Besides the federal charges, Devlin faces 75 state charges, including forcible sodomy, kidnapping and armed criminal action. He has pleaded not guilty to all those allegations. … Devlin's attorney, Michael Kielty, said he had not seen the prosecution's evidence, but he acknowledged that most child pornography cases are 'very emotional, very difficult.' … 'If there are photos and videotapes, that certainly would add some weight to the government's case,' Kielty said. … Shawn Hornbeck knew the federal charges would be filed and was with family members for moral support Thursday, said the family's attorney Scott Sherman."

DOJ_NMG_0139132

Son Of "Disgraced Political Boss" Sentenced For Bank Robbery. The Chicago Tribune (3/2, 617K) reports Daniel N. Katalinic, "the son of disgraced political boss Daniel M. Katalinic, was sentenced in federal court Thursday to 10 years and 1 month in prison for robbing a Mt. Prospect bank last year. With his father watching, Daniel N. Katalinic shook his head back and forth as U.S. District Chief Judge James Holderman announced the sentence, warning that people who commit such crimes will face stiff penalties." Daniel M. Katalinic "is also a convicted felon, set to serve a year in federal prison for taking bribes in the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program. He received a reduced sentence because he became a key witness in the prosecution of Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich."

US Indicts Former Developer Of Wisconsin Casino. The Chicago Tribune (3/2, Gibbard) reports, "The former developer of Kenosha (WI)'s proposed $808 million casino project was indicted Thursday on federal charges for allegedly funneling $100,000 in improper campaign contributions to Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle, who has final approval over Indian gaming in the state." The Tribune continues, "Dennis Troha, 60, of Kenosha, Wis., was charged with one count of fraud and one count of making false statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Attorney's office in Milwaukee said. If convicted, he could face up to 25 years in prison and a $500,000 fine. … The indictment alleges Troha used family members and businesses he controlled to send money to Doyle's campaign during the 2002 and 2006 campaigns. Troha would lend money to the family members, who would then write checks to Doyle's campaign, allowing Troha to circumvent the $10,000 cap on political donations by individuals. The money was only repaid early this year after federal investigators began looking into the case, the indictment said." The Tribune adds, "Prosecutors did not accuse Doyle, the first Democrat elected governor of Wisconsin in 16 years, of wrongdoing. … 'The indictment does not allege a quid pro quo,' said a spokeswoman for U.S. Atty. Steven Biskupic. … Doyle, in a statement, pledged to return the contributions if Troha is found guilty. … 'My campaign was aware of nothing to suggest that the contributions received from Mr. Troha were in any way inappropriate or unlawful,' Doyle said." The Tribune notes, "Wisconsin's Menominee tribe hopes to build one of the Midwest's largest casinos at the site of the Dairyland greyhound track, 10 miles from Illinois on Interstate Highway 94. To do that, the U.S. government must allow the property to be transferred into an Indian trust, because the site is not on the tribe's reservation. … Until last week, Troha was the tribe's developer and point man in Kenosha. On Feb. 23, after news of the investigation surfaced, he announced he had pulled out and sold his interest for an undisclosed sum to the Mohegan tribe of Connecticut. … The main opposition to the project has come from the Forest County Potawatomi Band, which operates its own large casino in Milwaukee. The tribe says the Kenosha casino would hurt its operation and be disrespectful because the Potawatomi have stronger historical ties to the area. … The regional office of the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs recommended in January that the project be approved by the U.S. Department of the Interior. It's uncertain when Washington might issue a recommendation, but Zeppos said it could come as soon as summer."

Maryland Police Arrest 11 Youths In Gang Stabbings. The Washington Post (3/2, B1, Aratani, De Vise) reports, "Eleven young gang members, including a 12-year-old, are facing attempted murder charges in connection with a rampage in Wheaton and Aspen Hill on Saturday that ended with a mentally challenged Silver Spring man being beaten and stabbed, Montgomery County police said yesterday. … Two of them also are accused of a double stabbing that occurred earlier that evening at the Wheaton Metro station. All three victims survived, but the Silver Spring man is hospitalized in critical condition." The Post continues, "The suspects, all males ages 12 to 17, claim to be members of the 'Hotboyz/Shoot 'Em Up' gang, police said. They have been charged with attempted first-degree murder, robbery and assault. Some of their parents reached yesterday evening said they are being falsely accused." The Post adds, "Montgomery police said the first stabbing occurred about 7 p.m. Saturday at the Metro station. The two young victims, both male, told police they believed the attackers were gang members. … Police said the second assault took place about 8:40 p.m., outside a party in the 3700 block of Bel Pre Road in Aspen Hill. Partygoers at an apartment complex spotted an unknown youth climbing inside a car belonging to a party host. They left the apartment to investigate and saw three teenagers standing by the car and 20 others near the building. … When one of the teenagers near the car displayed a gun, the partygoers went inside, except for the 31-year-old mentally challenged man. Police said the man, whom they did not identify, walked toward the suspects and was struck several times with the handgun, repeatedly kicked and then stabbed." The Post notes, "As Montgomery police conducted their investigation, they learned that Metro Transit Police were looking into the stabbing at the Wheaton Station. … Police arrested six suspects Monday and five Wednesday. All have been charged with first-degree attempted murder, armed robbery and first-degree assault. … The 12-year-old was charged as a juvenile and sent to the Alfred D. Noyes Children's Center before being released to family members. His name is not being released because he is a minor."

DOJ_NMG_0139133

Murder Trial Of Convicted Florida Sex Offender Opens. The New York Times (3/2, Goodnough) reports from Miami, "The drifter charged with raping and burying alive a 9-year-old girl on Florida's west coast in 2005 went to trial here Thursday, after intense publicity forced the case to be moved 300 miles from where the child, Jessica Lunsford, was murdered." The Times continues, "The case provoked a nationwide crackdown on sex criminals, not least because the suspect, John E. Couey, was a convicted sex offender who had managed to skip required counseling sessions and move without telling parole officers. Many states have passed laws in Jessica's name, increasing minimum sentences for sexual offenses against children and requiring offenders to be closely tracked upon release." The Times adds, "Mr. Couey told detectives soon after his arrest in March 2005 that he had killed Jessica, even telling them where to find her body. But Judge Richard A. Howard of Circuit Court in Citrus County ruled the confession inadmissible because the detectives had refused Mr. Couey's requests for a lawyer. … Prosecutors say they have an airtight case nonetheless. In his opening statement, Ric Ridgway, a state prosecutor, told the jury that Jessica's fingerprints were found in Mr. Couey's bedroom and closet, her DNA was found in blood stains on his mattress and her body was found in a shallow grave in his yard. They are seeking the death penalty for Mr. Couey, who faces charges of first-degree murder, burglary, kidnapping and sexual battery. … 'The evidence will show that the one man responsible for all these acts is sitting right there,' Mr. Ridgway said, pointing to Mr. Couey, 48, who shifted nervously, covered his face with his hands and drew on a sketch pad during the proceedings. … Despite a vast search and the wide distribution of a photograph of Jessica, her body was not found until three weeks after she disappeared from her bedroom in the middle of the night. She had been buried in two garbage bags outside the trailer Mr. Couey shared with relatives near the Lunsford home in Homosassa."

FBI Agent's Testimony Links Gang To Slaying Of Toddler. South Carolina's the State (3/2, Beam) reports, "A 2-year-old Swansea girl killed in a shootout in January was the victim of an attempted robbery by the Gangsta Killer Bloods, according to an FBI agent's courtroom testimony Thursday. The testimony connects for the first time one of the Midlands' most heinous crimes with the highly organized gang, which has national ties." The FBI "detailed the gang's violent and sophisticated drug trafficking business in documents filed last month as part of an extensive federal investigation." The girl's death "is the first homicide -- and at least the fifth violent crime -- connected to the gang, whose members allegedly speak in code to hide their crack cocaine distribution network."

Baltimore Man Charged With Running Ponzi Scheme. The AP (3/1, Nuckols) reports David McDowell Robinson of Baltimore, "who previously served prison time for fraud," is alleged to have "bilked more than 900 investors out of $8 million in a Ponzi scheme." Robinson "has been incarcerated since last March for violating the terms of his supervised release in the earlier case by running a business, said Joseph L. Evans, his federal public defender. He was arrested again today, a day after a federal grand jury indicted him on wire fraud and mail fraud charges." Robinson "was sentenced to eight years and 10 months in federal prison after pleading guilty in 1996 to charges of mail fraud arising from three different schemes. He also served prison time following 1989 convictions in Anne Arundel County for fraudulent misappropriation by a fiduciary and misconduct in public office. Robinson was released from federal prison in April 2003." He then set up Liberty Trade International Inc. "and began scamming investors again."

The Baltimore Examiner (3/2, Broadwater) says from April 2003 until March 2006, Robinson "was the sole shareholder, president and chief executive officer. … During that time, the grand jury alleges, he solicited investors throughout the country -- offering huge returns on investments, promising a 20 percent return on $2,500 in 60 days; a 25 percent return on $5,000 in 90 days; and a 30 percent return on $10,000 120 days." US Attorney Rod Rosenstein said, "The indictment alleges that David Robinson perpetrated an $8 million Ponzi scheme that victimized innocent investors, including Hurricane Katrina victims who were induced to invest their money in a worthless venture."

DOJ_NMG_0139134

New Jersey "Christmas Tree Grants" Probed. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/2, Moroz, Ung, 385K) writes, "In Trenton, as it is in the nation's capital, tradition is under fire. For years, legislators at the state and federal levels have slipped grants for pet causes and hometown projects into the budget at the last minute. In New Jersey, they're known as Christmas tree ornaments. In Congress, they call them earmarks. In both places, you'll hear them referred to as 'pork.' And in both places, they have become key to keeping constituents happy. But now the longheld political practice, which typically plays out behind closed doors, is coming under major attack amid calls for greater government transparency and accountability." In New Jersey, "federal investigators have swarmed the Statehouse, demanding information about Christmas tree grants."

The AP (3/1, Hester) reports that a day after sending subpoenas to Corzine's office, US Attorney Christopher Christie "vowed to continue combating public corruption no matter where it might be found." Christie said, "I do not believe that any public corruption in the state of New Jersey by any public official is acceptable. So whether it is a zoning board member in Monmouth County or whether it's someone high up in state government, and everything in between, no public corruption is acceptable and we're going go after whatever we can find and we can prove beyond a reasonable doubt."

WNBC-TV New York (3/1, 6:03 p.m.) reported, "Just yesterday, a FBI agent served a subpoena on the governor's office looking at records for three years worth of budget agreements that included earmarks requested by lawmakers. Today, US Attorney Chris Christie refused to talk about that case."

Alleged DC Madam Threatens To Sell Client List. The Washington Post (3/2, B1, Duggan) reports, "A woman accused of running a prostitution service catering to men in hotels and homes in the Washington area was indicted on federal racketeering charges yesterday in a case with a twist: She has threatened to peddle 'the entire 46 pounds of detailed and itemized phone records' of her clients to raise money for her defense." The Post continues, "Working out of her California home, Deborah J. Palfrey, 50, did business in Washington under the name Pamela Martin and Associates. On a Web site seeking donations to her legal defense fund, the company is described as 'a high-end adult fantasy firm which offered legal sexual and erotic services across the spectrum of adult sexual behavior.' … But federal authorities say it was a thriving call-girl service, begun in 1993, that dispatched college-educated women in their 20s to male clients in the Washington area who paid $275 to $300 per sexual encounter. The prostitutes kept half of the fees and mailed the rest to Palfrey in money orders, authorities allege in an affidavit filed in federal court." The Post adds, "The indictment says that in 13 years, the service employed 132 women and generated about $2 million in income 'through prostitution related activities.' … From January 2000 to September 2006, 'Palfrey received and deposited over $750,000 in money orders from various prostitutes' into bank and investment accounts, according to the affidavit. It also says that Palfrey was convicted of operating a prostitution service in California in 1991 and was jailed for 18 months. She 'started her current illegal prostitution business while still on probation,' the affidavit says. … Palfrey is scheduled to make her initial appearance in the criminal case at the D.C. federal courthouse next Friday. She had no comment on the charges yesterday, said her attorney, Montgomery Blair Sibley. He is representing Palfrey in a civil asset-forfeiture case brought against her last year by federal authorities in the investigation of the alleged prostitution service."

The Washington Times (3/2, McElhatton) reports, "Last fall, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed court papers to seize Miss Palfrey's assets. The civil forfeiture proceedings were ongoing. … The Washington Times first reported Feb. 21 that Miss Palfrey told federal authorities she would "make life miserable" for former customers and employees unless her case is dropped. The Times reported that government attorneys said Miss Palfrey had threatened to 'harass potential witnesses whose identifies remain secret ... through calculated public disclosures of former customers' and former co-workers' identities.' … On Wednesday, an attorney representing Miss Palfrey in the forfeiture proceedings said his client would sell customer records over the Internet to raise money for her legal defense."

DOJ_NMG_0139135

California Judge Sentences Man To Life For Murder Of Racing Icon, Wife. The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Proctor) reports, "A Pasadena judge today sentenced Michael Goodwin, convicted in January of murdering racing legend Mickey Thompson and his wife, to two consecutive terms of life in prison without parole." The Times continues, "Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Teri Schwartz earlier rejected defense motions for a retrial and to dismiss the charges. Deputy Public Defender Elena M. Saris said she would appeal." The Times adds, Goodwin, 62, called Thompson's death a tragedy, but insisted on his innocence. … 'I can't apologize because I'm not guilty,' he said before the sentence was read. … The Thompsons' killings became a legendary Southern California mystery, the subject of nearly two decades of police investigation and several national television shows. … Thompson and his wife, Trudy, were gunned down in the driveway of their eastern Los Angeles County home on March 16, 1988 by a pair of hooded assailants, who then escaped on bicycles. Prosecutors said the gunmen shot Thompson repeatedly but kept him alive to watch his wife's murder before they shot him in the head. The gunmen were never identified." The Times notes, "Prosecutors always considered Goodwin, a former business partner of Thompson, the prime suspect in plotting the killings, even though no evidence linked him to the scene. … They alleged that the circumstances -- the killers didn't touch the $4,000 the Thompsons were carrying or the $70,000 worth of jewelry in the house -- showed the murders were motivated by revenge. And they argued that Goodwin was the only person who could want Thompson dead that badly. … Thompson, the first American to reach 400 mph in a piston-driven vehicle and the holder of numerous speed records, joined Goodwin in the mid-1980s to promote motor sports in Southern California."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Louisiana Officials Awaiting Word On FBI Cold Case Probes. The Monroe News-Star (3/2) reports, "Local and area law enforcement officials said today they have not been contacted by the FBI regarding investigating cold civil rights cases in the area." The News-Star continues, "FBI Director Robert Mueller said at a news conference Tuesday that the agency is investigating about a dozen cold civil rights cases in an effort to seek justice for victims of racially motivated killings. … FBI officials declined to identify the cases they are working to reopen. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said making that information public could hinder the investigations. … He also said the FBI will help local law enforcement authorities prosecute cases in which federal charges aren't applicable." The News-Star adds, "Mueller said the FBI and local authorities have made 10 to 12 cases a priority, but as many as 100 could be investigated. … The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center are assisting the effort. … The center has a list of 127 race-related killings between 1954 and 1968 — a number it concedes could be much higher."

More Commentary. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/2) editorializes, "Washington Parish Sheriff's Deputy Oneal Moore was murdered 42 years ago, but the FBI says that it hasn't given up on the case, one of about a dozen unsolved civil-rights era murders that are getting renewed attention from the agency. … When these crimes took place decades ago, African-American victims had little hope of getting justice. Now, investigators will have to deal with the damage time itself has done to the cases. … But that's all the more reason to act quickly, and the FBI's decision to aggressively pursue cold cases that they believe were racially motivated is encouraging."

The Birmingham (AL) News (3/2) editorializes, "If justice delayed is justice denied, what is justice ignored? A national disgrace. … Too many times, civil rights-era murderers got away with their crimes. Too many times, law enforcement officials covered up cases, failed to investigate them fully and even wrongly classified some murders as accidental deaths. Too many times, there was no justice for the loved ones of victims, just grief and anger." The News continues, "Fortunately, the U.S. Justice Department has decided to reopen investigations into nearly 100 suspicious death cases from across the South during the civil rights era to see if they were racially motivated murders that can be solved and prosecuted. … If cases can be prosecuted and convictions won, it will bring a measure of justice where there has been none. Grieving families and friends of the victims who have carried deep emotional wounds for decades, knowing that killers had gotten away with their crimes - and sometimes knowing who those killers are - may find some small relief. …

DOJ_NMG_0139136

The Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. famously said, 'Let us realize the arc of the moral universe is long, but it bends toward justice.' … Recent convictions of civil rights-era crimes have bent that long arc toward justice. Tuesday's announcement bent it just a tiny bit more."

Navy Chaplain Dismissed Over Christian Prayers. The New York Times (3/2, Goodstein, 1.16M) reports, "Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, a Navy chaplain, has lost a three-year battle to stay in the chaplain corps after superiors warned him about delivering sectarian Christian prayers and sermons at a sailor's memorial service and other events attended by religiously diverse audiences." Klingenschmitt "became a hero to religious conservatives, but was court-martialed last year for wearing his uniform at a political protest in front of the White House. He received an honorable discharge."

Columnist Lauds DOJ's Religious Freedom Initiative. In a column for the Nashville Tennessean (3/2), Charles C. Haynes writes, "Here's one of the best-kept secrets about the Bush presidency: Over the past five years, the U.S. Justice Department has quietly, but vigorously, enforced civil rights laws designed to protect religious freedom. … Now Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wants to get the word out. On Feb. 20, he announced an initiative called the First Freedom Project to carry out 'even greater enforcement of religious rights for all Americans.'" Haynes continues, "Since presidents aren't shy about their accomplishments, I'm not sure why we haven't heard more about this before. Maybe we're so busy shouting past one another about church-state conflicts that we overlook threats to free exercise of religion. … The new report documents the Bush administration's efforts to take religious discrimination seriously. After establishing the first-ever Special Counsel for Religious Discrimination early in the administration, the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division dramatically increased enforcement of federal statutes protecting religious rights. … Administration critics aren't impressed. 'Expecting the Bush administration to defend religious liberty,' says Barry Lynn of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, 'is a little like asking Colonel Sanders to baby-sit your pet chicken.'" Haynes concludes, "From attacks on houses of worship to incidents of discrimination at school and work, the Justice Department over the past five years has investigated scores of cases involving religious rights of Christians, Jews, Muslims, Sikhs, Native Americans and others. … However much we disagree about the relationship between religion and government, surely we can agree that freedom of religion should mean freedom from religious discrimination."

ANTITRUST:

EU Threatens New Sanctions Against Microsoft. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, B3, Jacoby) reports, "New European Union charges against Microsoft Corp. that threaten the company with as much as $1 billion in fines highlight an increasingly fierce industry battle over how to sell business software." The Journal continues, "European regulators launched formal charges yesterday against Microsoft -- for the third time in three years -- accusing the tech giant of trying to overcharge competitors for information to make their products work well with Microsoft's ubiquitous Windows operating system. … The charges stem from a 2004 EU decision that Microsoft abused its near-monopoly position as the producer of Windows. Microsoft has already racked up close to $1 billion in fines in the case." The Journal adds, "The EU's latest move goes to the heart of a growing battle between Microsoft's traditional fee-based software business and challenges from International Business Machines Corp., Red Hat Inc. and Oracle Corp., which offer free or nominally priced 'open source' software. … Microsoft's competitors say they believe the company has structured its proposed charges for the programming information in such a way as to undermine their business models." The Journal notes, "The March 2004 EU decision requires Microsoft to offer licenses for the programming information on 'reasonable and non-discriminatory terms' to software rivals who need it. No companies have licensed the information yet. … The 2004 decision ordered Microsoft to help rivals write software linking back-office server computers with employees' Windows-driven desktop computers for a narrow range of functions, including the accessing and printing of documents and logging onto password-protected company systems. … 'The current view is that there is no significant innovation' in the programming information to warrant the price Microsoft is charging, EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement yesterday. … But Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said in an interview he was surprised by the aggressive new charges. 'I feel we need a more constructive approach to address very complicated and technical issues in a way that is going to make progress,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0139137

The Financial Times (3/2, Buck) reports, "The Commission refused to comment on the size of any new fine that could arise from yesterday's charges. However, Brussels could - in the worst-case scenario for Microsoft - hit the group with a penalty in excess of €800m." The Times continues, "The Commission accused Microsoft of demanding excessive royalties from companies wishing to license technical information about its Windows operating system. The order to make such information available to rivals formed a key plank of the Commission's March 2004 ruling against the group. … The Commission stressed that Microsoft was the first group to be accused of ignoring a European Union antitrust ruling. 'This is a company which apparently does not like to have to conform with antitrust decisions,' said the spokesman for Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner. … Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, rejected the Commission's allegations. He said Microsoft's proposed pricing scheme would be 30 per cent cheaper than comparable licensing fees."

The AP (3/2, Casert) reports, "The EU complained that three years after a landmark antitrust ruling to open up the market, the world's largest software maker still refused to cooperate. … Under a 2004 antitrust ruling by the European Union, Microsoft had to disclose complete and accurate interface documentation on reasonable and nondiscriminatory terms, allowing its competitors to interoperate with Windows PCs and servers." The AP adds, "Under a so-called 'statement of objections' released Thursday, the EU's executive Commission said there was 'no significant innovation' in the requested information. It also rejected 1,500 pages of submissions by Microsoft over the past three months and said Microsoft's price proposals were unreasonable. … 'I am therefore again obliged to take formal measures to ensure that Microsoft complies with its obligations,' EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement." The AP notes, "Smith complained Microsoft had asked for feedback half a year ago and only on Thursday received a reply thinly veiled in a threat. … 'We're disappointed that this feedback is coming six months later and in its present form, but were committed to working hard to address the Commissions Statement of Objections,' said Smith. … He added 'the findings appear to be an attempt to regulate the pricing of our intellectual property rights on a global basis' something which would go beyond the jurisdiction of the European Commission."

EU Extends Probe Of Sony BMG. The Financial Times (3/2, Buck) reports, "The music industry faces a prolonged period of regulatory uncertainty after the European Union's top antitrust regulator said yesterday it needed another four months to scrutinise the merger that created Sony BMG." The Times continues, "The European Commission waved through the original tie-up in 2004, arguing that the merger would not undermine competition in the market. However, its ruling was challenged and - in a rare move that shocked the music industry - a top European court decided last year to overturn the Commission's clearance decision." The Times adds, "For Sony BMG, the ruling meant it had to resubmit the merger to the Brussels watchdog for approval and a fresh investigation. … The Commission said it had completed an initial one-month assessment of the Sony BMG merger, but now needed more time to examine whether the deal 'strengthens or creates a dominant position in these relatively concentrated markets'. Brussels added it would take into consideration factors such as 'the growing sales of online music' "

Motorola Stock Lifted By Icahn Move. The Financial Times (3/2, Taylor) reports, "Shares in Motorola rose in early trading yesterday after the world's second largest mobile phone maker revealed that Carl Icahn, the billionaire Wall Street raider, was seeking to lift his stake in the company to about 6 per cent by acquiring another $2bn in stock." The Times continues, "If completed, the proposed stock purchase would lift the stake in Motorola acquired last month by Mr Icahn from 1.6 per cent, and turn him into the company's second biggest investor behind Barclays Global Investors. Barclays had a 6.82 per cent stake in Motorola at the end of December." The Times adds, "Mr Icahn's demand that Motorola use the bulk of its $11.6bn in cash to accelerate share buy-backs has helped prop up its share price in the wake of a series of setbacks. .. The company reported weak financial resultsearlier this year reflecting a fierce mobile phone price war and a lack of blockbuster products. … Profit margins in Motorola's core phone division shrank to 4.4 per cent in the fourth quarter from almost 12 per cent in the preceding three months as the company slashed prices in order to retain market share and remain competitive with Finland's Nokia, the world's largest mobile phone maker."

DOJ_NMG_0139138

China Eyes Legal Reforms To Handle Economic Demands. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Batson) reports, "China's leadership is stepping up its efforts to build a legal system that can handle the demands of a complex, market-driven economy, as managing the fast-growing nation becomes increasingly challenging. … That program will take the spotlight when China's legislature opens its annual session on Monday. The National People's Congress is scheduled to consider, and most likely pass, two crucial pieces of economic legislation. One would give private property new protections of unprecedented force and detail for China; another would require foreign and domestic companies to pay the same rate of tax." The Journal continues, "The property-rights law will be a symbolic milestone for the still nominally Communist nation, even though it falls far short of what more liberal reformers had initially advocated. For foreign businesses, the tax law will put them on a more-equal footing with local competitors, as it gradually brings an end to most of the special breaks offered in the past. Several other important laws will also be discussed at the meeting for passage later this year, including the country's first antitrust legislation and a measure that would give workers more say in contracts with their employers." The Journal adds, "All of these are the building blocks of the legal infrastructure that underpins the daily functioning of a market economy, although the country's legal code is still in its infancy and legal redress can be difficult to come by. Many of these laws have been in the works for years, and have provoked sometimes heated debate. They are coming to fruition this year as a consensus grows that the new legislation can fill some gaping holes and rectify obvious inequities in the current system. … The annual meeting of the National People's Congress, when nearly 3,000 delegates gather in Beijing, is one of the few occasions when China's leaders discuss their policies in public. Given the turmoil in China's stock markets this week, as fears spread that a government crackdown on speculation was imminent, this year's meeting is likely to be particularly closely watched for signals on financial policy, as well as progress in lawmaking."

Antitrust Measure Among Reforms Considered. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Connolly) reports, "With China's economy changing much faster than the legal system that is supposed to govern it, Beijing is moving quickly to create a system that can handle the demands of a complex, market-driven economy just as events like this week's Chinese market turmoil underscore how challenging managing the fast-growing nation has become." The Journal continues, "The annual session of China's legislature, the National People's Congress, which begins Monday, is to consider and likely approve two significant pieces of economic legislation, one giving private property new protections of unprecedented force and detail for China, the other requiring foreign and domestic companies to pay the same rate of tax. Several other important laws will also be discussed for passage later this year, including the country's first antitrust legislation and a measure that would give workers more say in contracts with their employers." The Journal adds, "Though vast numbers of Chinese now own their own homes and run their own businesses, it is difficult to settle precisely who owns what and what they are allowed to do with it, as Andrew Batson reports. Private-property rights, in the abstract, have been recognized in China's constitution through a series of amendments, beginning in 1988. But those vague principles are of little help in handling specific cases, such as the government's frequent confiscation of land for development. Nonetheless, the proposed law has attracted vocal opposition from leftist scholars concerned it will pave the way for the accelerated privatization of state companies and widen the gap between the wealthy and the poor. … The draft antimonopoly law, under discussion for more than a decade, has also been held hostage by disputes among policymakers. Some want to use it to break open still-closed parts of the economy, while others see giving the government new antitrust powers as a way to strengthen its control over businesses -- particularly powerful foreign companies that have dominant market share in China."

WSJ Decries "Power Plays" In Endesa Takeover. The Wall Street Journal (3/2) editorializes, "As corporate dramas go, few can match the long-running Endesa takeover story. But the latest plot twist, in which Italian utility Enel entered the scene, may have the Spanish electricity giant's shareholders feeling like they're watching a farce. As usual when it comes to Europe and energy, politicians appear to be the ones making a mockery of the market." The Journal continues, "A new chapter began Tuesday, when Enel bought a 9.9% stake in Endesa -- just three weeks before Endesa's shareholders were to consider bylaw changes that would allow Germany's E.On to move forward with a €41 billion purchase of the company. Yesterday Enel made arrangements to boost its holding to 17% -- Spanish law requires a regulatory review before an investor can buy more than 10% of a utility -- and said it would ask permission to keep buying up shares until it had nearly one-fourth of the company, at which point it would have to bid for the entire firm. … E.On's bid, which just last week seemed like a reasonably safe bet, is now in real danger. Spanish conglomerate Acciona owns 21% of Endesa and has indicated it won't sell to the German utility. Spain's public holding company owns 3%, so if Enel refuses to sell to E.On -- so far the Italians are being coy on that question -- the German company would have to win over almost all of the other shareholders to take control of Endesa. Even then, the large minorities might prove to be a thorn in E.On's side." The Journal adds, "This saga might have been all to the good for Endesa shareholders -- competing bids can't be bad, right? -- if this were a true competition. But that's not the case. As it stands, smaller shareholders probably won't get the chance to weigh E.On's offer. Investors who bought Endesa stock over the past year and a half, during which time the share price has doubled, may still have a chance to recoup handsome rewards -- if there are any takers still out there. … So why did Enel jump into the fray? There's plenty of reason to believe that the motivation was in part political. After failing to marry Endesa with Barcelona-based Gas Natural, Spanish Prime Minister José Luis Rodíguez Zapatero has been laboring for months to keep the company out of E.On's hands." The Journal concludes, "Brussels deserves credit for its persistence in the Endesa case, even if Enel may negate much of that good work. Still, the difficulty it's had in enforcing cross-border competition here shows that the balance of power still lies in national capitals. Recognizing this, EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes is threatening to break up energy companies into suppliers and distributors in order to boost energy-sector competition. … We think it's too early for such a drastic and largely irreversible step. But Madrid, Rome and Paris aren't doing themselves, their utilities or their citizens any favors by indulging in these power plays."

DOJ_NMG_0139139

Antitrust Law Gets Little Attention In Congressional XM-Sirius Hearing. The Deal (3/2, Lindell) reports, "The brand-new House Committee Antitrust Task Force took up the proposed merger between the nation's two satellite radio companies Wednesday, discussing technology, economics and personalities. Antitrust law, which will weigh big in the deal's ability to win government approval, received very little airtime." The Deal continues, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.'s CEO Mel Karmazin was the headliner at the standing-room-only event as he pitched his company's merger with rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. He did his best to express his willingness to work with regulators and Congress to get the deal approved. But if the deal is ultimately rejected, he said, both XM and Sirius would be able to go on as separate and viable businesses. … But David Rehr, president and CEO of the National Association of Broadcasters, repeatedly told the room that the merger would be a 'government-sanctioned monopoly,' and that allowing the combination 'portends great potential harm to the American public and to the many benefits of free local radio broadcasting.'" The Deal adds, "Representatives invited one antitrust lawyer not involved with the deal to shed light on how the Department of Justice would examine the merger. Charles Biggio, a partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, testified that the DOJ's antitrust division would likely issue a second request for information on the deal in order to adequately tackle the various issues. … 'The ultimate question the antitrust division will ask in reviewing the XM-Sirius transaction is whether the transaction will create or enhance market power; that is, whether it will cause prices to go up, output to go down, or quality or technological development to deteriorate in a relevant market affected by the transaction,' Biggio said. … The analysis, he continued, would look at advertising, distribution via retail outlets and car manufacturers, content purchases and consumer subscriptions. Only after evaluating the effects in those areas would the staff lawyers at the DOJ consider the benefits of the deal, which have been estimated to be extensive, since the combined company would cut costs by better utilizing its satellite spectrum."

FTC OKs Carlyle's Purchase Of Philosophy Inc. The AP (3/2) reports, "Federal antitrust regulators approved Carlyle Group's purchase of cosmetics and skin care company Philosophy inc., according to a notice issued by the Federal Trade Commission Thursday. … The FTC cleared the sale without requiring any changes." The AP continues, "Carlyle, a private equity group, announced the purchase Jan. 31, but did not disclose terms of the deal. Philosophy sells through retailers and television shopping channels and was the top beauty brand on QVC in 2006, Carlyle said. … Carlyle also said in announcing the deal that it was its third consumer and retail acquistion in 11 months, after its purchase of Dunkin' Brands in March 2006 and Oriental Trading Co. in July 2006."

DOJ_NMG_0139140

FTC Clears Private Equity Firm's Purchase Of Mirant Power Plants. The AP (3/2) reports, "Federal antitrust regulators approved the $1.4 billion sale of six power plants by Mirant Corp. to LS Power Equity Partners, according to a notice issued Thursday by the Federal Trade Commission. … The FTC cleared the sale without requiring any changes." The AP continues, "Mirant said when announcing the sale in mid-January that it expects net proceeds of $1.32 billion, after paying off $83 million in debt. … The plants, all in the U.S., produce a total of 3,619 megawatts of power. Mirant is selling its Michigan Zeeland plant, its West Georgia plant, its Shady Hills plant in Florida, its Sugar Creek plant in Indiana, its Bosque plant in Texas and its Las Vegas-based Apex plant. … LS Power Equity is part of private equity firm LS Power Group."

FCC Grants Internet Phone Access To Cable Firms. USA Today (3/2, 2B, Davidson) reports, "In a move that's expected to bring new discount phone services to millions of rural Americans, the Federal Communications Commission ruled Thursday that local phone companies cannot block cable providers' rival Internet-based phone offerings. … 'The commission must promote competition,' FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said." USA continues, "In an FCC petition last year, Time Warner Cable complained that rural carriers in South Carolina and Nebraska refused to set up connections so users of the company's Voice over Internet Protocol (VoIP) service and rural phone customers can exchange calls. The carriers also would not provide local phone numbers and 911 services. … Time Warner typically leases these services from MCI and Sprint, which, in turn, lease them from the rural phone companies." USA adds, "The rural carriers claimed a federal law promoting competition doesn't require them to provide the services because MCI and Sprint would not serve residents directly. They also noted VoIP has not been labeled a telecommunications service. State regulators in South Carolina and Nebraska sided with the rural carriers. Similar battles are playing out in other states. … But FCC staff said wholesale providers are entitled to the same network-leasing privileges as retail companies and that VoIP's classification is irrelevant."

The Washington Post/Bloomberg (3/2, D3, Peterson) reports, "AT&T and Verizon, the two biggest U.S. phone companies, supported Time Warner Cable's petition. … The FCC order overrides rulings by state regulators in South Carolina and Nebraska that barred certain carriers from connecting calls using voice-over-Internet protocol, or VOIP, to traditional local phone lines. The South Carolina regulators said Verizon had no right to route Internet-based phone calls through lines owned by rural-phone companies as part of a wholesale service it sells to Time Warner Cable, a unit of Time Warner Inc." Bloomberg adds, "The state rulings would have impeded phone competition, the commission said in its decision. They also would have hindered the deployment of high-speed Internet access, the FCC said. … Cable companies have invested more than $100 billion on broadband networks 'to offer consumers a wide array of new services, and this action will speed the rollout of digital voice service in many more markets,' said Kyle McSlarrow, president of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association."

Oracle To Purchase Hyperion Solutions In $3.3 Billion Deal. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, B3, Vara) reports, "Oracle Corp.'s roll-up of smaller software concerns continues to roll on, with a twist in emphasis. … The deal announced yesterday -- a tender offer for Hyperion Solutions Corp. for $3.3 billion, or $52 a share -- highlights the business-software giant's shift from buying head-on rivals in maturing markets to snapping up players in fast-growing niches. Hyperion specializes in business-intelligence software, a hot field where Oracle has been a relatively minor player to date." The Journal continues, "The transaction, which sent Hyperion's shares up 20% and moved the stocks of other companies in the sector, would be Oracle's largest acquisition since it acquired Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion in 2006." The Journal adds, "In the past two years, Oracle Chief Executive Larry Ellison has spent upward of $20 billion on buying more than 25 software firms. Early on, Oracle used big bids for major rivals such as PeopleSoft Corp. and Siebel to build itself into the No. 2 maker of applications for business tasks, such as finance and human resources, after German rival SAP AG. Those deals significantly beefed up Oracle's own applications business and customer list, while creating opportunities to increase profit by laying off employees in duplicate positions. … But lately, the company has focused on smaller acquisitions in areas such as security and content management, as well as firms focused on specific industries. … The Hyperion acquisition is the latest reflection of that plan. The company focuses on programs that help companies collect, analyze and share data about how their businesses are performing -- an increasingly important field as businesses seek to extract more usable knowledge from their growing troves of business data."

DOJ_NMG_0139141

USA Today (3/2, 1B, Swartz) reports, "Oracle bagged Hyperion Solutions for $3.3 billion on Thursday, renewing a furious shopping spree to unseat business-software leader SAP. … The cash deal, if approved by regulators, gives Oracle the keys to Hyperion's line of software used by corporate executives to track their company's performance — software that is also widely used by SAP customers." USA continues, "The Hyperion acquisition is Oracle's biggest since it snapped up Siebel Systems for $6.1 billion last year. Oracle has spent more than $20 billion on almost 30 acquisitions in the past two years. … Oracle will pay $52 per share for Hyperion, a 21% premium above the most recent closing price of Hyperion's stock. Hyperion shares soared 20%, to $51.57, after the deal was announced Thursday. Oracle shares edged up 2%, to $16.77." USA adds, "Oracle's acquisition could trigger a ripple effect, tech analysts say. … AMR Research analyst Bruce Richardson says Canada-based Cognos could be a takeover candidate for IBM, and France-based Business Objects may be courted by SAP. Hewlett-Packard might also sniff around for a purchase, he says."

Australian Antitrust Authorities Clear Qantas Buyout. The AP (3/2) reports from Sydney, Australia, "The proposed $8.6 billion acquisition of Qantas Airways Ltd. by an investor group cleared a hurdle Thursday when the Australian competition watchdog said it will not oppose the sale." The AP continues, "The Australian Competition and Consumer Commission, or ACCC, said while market inquiries during a comprehensive review of the proposed acquisition had revealed a range of potential competition issues arising from the interests of the bidding consortium members, it ruled the deal is 'unlikely to substantially lessen competition' under federal trade laws." The AP adds, "Qantas' board has recommended shareholders accept the bid by Australia's Macquarie Bank, Forth-Worth based Texas Pacific Group, Canada's Onex Corp. and others, which was first announced mid-December. It would be one of Australia's biggest-ever corporate takeovers. … ACCC chairman Graeme Samuel said while the regulator has closely reviewed whether Macquarie Bank's 'partial direct and indirect interests' in Qantas and Sydney Airport could lead to discrimination in favor of Qantas by Sydney Airport management, it appeared there are 'not clear incentives' for the bank to do this. … The ACCC found there is not likely to be a substantial lessening of competition across a range of aeronautical services, domestic and international air passenger services, aircraft parts and leasing, airline catering and ticketing services."

The Financial Times (3/2, Minder) reports, "Peter Costello, Australia's treasurer, is expected in the next few days to receive a report from the Foreign Investment Review Board to determine whether the deal would run against the 'national interest'. … The consortium, which also includes Texas Pacific Group and Sydney-based Allco Equity Partners, has structured the deal so that foreign investors own only 39 per cent of the equity. … The Senate, the upper house of parliament, is also preparing to conduct a separate review of the deal."

ENVIRONMENT:

Maryland To Probe Montgomery County Dumping. The Washington Post (3/2, B1, Spivack) reports, "Two Maryland agencies are investigating a two-acre pile of debris that has been dumped by a landscaping firm for the past eight years on a secluded site near the Patuxent River, a source of drinking water for the region." The Post continues, "The dump sits on property owned by Pepco in northeastern Montgomery County and rises 20 feet in places. It contains yard and construction waste, including cable, concrete and closed canisters, said government officials who have inspected the site. At one point last year, the debris pile was smoldering and emitting steam. … County officials have been aware of the dump since early 2006, but they did not order removal of the debris or issue fines to Pepco or Kollins Landscaping, the Brinklow firm dumping on the site. The dumping stopped a year ago after a frustrated neighbor obtained a court order. Not until last month did county officials begin examining the dump's contents more closely to assess its toxicity." The Post adds, "Log entries made by a county investigator who examined the site in early 2006 indicate that Pepco knew about the dumping and allowed it to continue. … 'Through my conversation with Pepco it is clear that they are aware that Kollins Landscaping is placing materials at this location and that they have let it go on. However this still constitutes an illegal transfer station,' said a log entry written in early 2006 by Peter R. Dilima, an inspector with the county's Department of Environmental Protection. … Michael Boland, associate general counsel with Pepco, disputed that assessment. … 'I don't know the inspector or how accurate or inaccurate he might have been with his notes and recollections,' Boland said yesterday. 'We don't permit anything like this. As soon as we became aware of it, we addressed it, and the county inspector thought it had been addressed,' he said. … The county's inspector general, Thomas Dagley, whose office is independent of the executive branch, referred the matter to the state attorney general's office and the state Department of the Environment last month. Both agencies have sent investigators to the site in Ashton, state and local officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0139142

Ignatius Highlights Systems' Vulnerability To Climate Change. Washington Post (3/2, A13, 690K) columnist David Ignatius describes a "startling new report" on global warming by futurist Peter Schwartz, who "turns the usual discussions upside down: Rather than starting with detailed estimates of climate change (how much temperatures will increase; how much sea levels will rise; what new diseases will be spawned), he looks instead at systems that already are vulnerable to such stresses. What Schwartz discovers with his stress-testing makes climate change even scarier." Schwartz writes that "climate change pushes systems everywhere toward their tipping point." A "first set of disasters waiting to happen involves stressed ecosystems. Human actions -- deforestation, overfarming, rapid urbanization -- have created special vulnerabilities to catastrophic natural events that are likely as the climate changes globally." In "Bangladesh, where millions of people live at or near sea level, even a small increase [in sea levels] could produce a catastrophe." In arid areas, climate change could produce "severe water shortages and even 'water wars.'" Finally, "there is the problem of maintaining social order in a stressed world." Ignatius concludes, "If we let ourselves visualize how bad it could get, as Schwartz does in this report, will we make changes that might reduce the disaster? That's the real stress test: It's coming at us. What are we doing about it?"

WSJournal Calls For Killing Federal Programs To Save Energy. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/2, A10, 2.04M) writes that California Sen. Barbara Boxer "suggested last week that a first step in reducing greenhouse gases would be to require that federal buildings use more efficient light bulbs, and ask federal bureaucrats to turn off their computers at night. 'Don't you think it's time the federal government were a model of energy efficiency?' she asks. We warmly agree, not least since the United States Government is the largest single consumer of energy in the United States." The Journal adds, "It's also one of the most inefficient energy users." It "follows from all this that the best way to make the federal government more energy efficient would be to undertake a government-wide policy of...lights out, permanently. Save the environment; kill a federal program. Start, needless to say, with the Department of Energy, operating at an annual cost of $22 billion."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Breaks Up Mississippi-To-Chicago Gun Connection. The Chicago Tribune (3/1, Coen) reports, "The arrests of 19 people in Chicago and Mississippi in a gun-trafficking conspiracy offer a snapshot into the illegal gun trade in which gang members here end up with high-powered weapons, federal authorities said Wednesday." The Tribune continues, "A loose organization made up of relatives, their friends and associates allegedly arranged for the purchase of more than 100 guns in Mississippi, where laws are relatively lax, and transport here for sale to gangs such as the Gangster Disciples. … About three dozen weapons eventually were recovered at Chicago crime scenes, including a shootout last year in which two people were killed and a police officer wounded, investigators said. … 'When you add illegally obtained heavy-caliber firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago, the result to say the least is an unacceptable level of violence,' said Gary Shapiro, first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago." The Tribune notes, "Three people were in custody in Chicago and 15 in Mississippi after a team of agents from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and officers from the Chicago Police Department and Illinois State Police cracked down on the group early Wednesday. … Shapiro said gun-running operations like the one dismantled Wednesday contribute significantly to crime in the city. … It 'threatens not only those who try to enforce our laws, but also the law-abiding citizens who only wish to live their lives in the neighborhoods that the gangs are trying to dominate,' Shapiro said."

The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (3/1, Nelson) reports, "Nineteen people suspected of putting more than 300 Mississippi-purchased firearms in the hands of Chicago street gang members were arrested Wednesday, most in the Delta town of Jonestown in Coahoma County. … At least one of those guns is believed to have been used in a shootout with police in November that left an officer wounded and two alleged gang members dead." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "At a news conference in Chicago following the arrests, prosecutors displayed a table of weapons similar to those confiscated in the crackdown, including AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and an assault-style shotgun, The Associated Press reported. … 'They just weren't your regular handguns,' Monique Bond, a spokeswoman for Chicago Police Department, told The Clarion-Ledger. 'These were assault-type weapons - heavy artillery.'" The Clarion-Ledger notes, "According to Bond, brokers in Chicago arranged to have guns purchased in Mississippi because of the state's 'lax gun laws.' … Purchasers were recruited to buy the weapons at three different pawn shops in Clarksdale and Tunica, Bond said. Those purchasers knew the guns were going to be used illegally, she said. … The sellers have cooperated with authorities and are not suspected of being involved, said Senior Special Agent Austin Banks of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. He would not identify the shops."

DOJ_NMG_0139143

The AP (3/1, Robinson) reports, "Nineteen people have been charged with taking part in gun-running operations from Mississippi to Chicago that provided high-powered weapons to street gangs, federal prosecutors announced Wednesday. … 'When you add illegally obtained firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago the result is an unacceptable level of violence,' said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago." The AP continues, "At a news conference, prosecutors displayed a table of weapons similar to those confiscated in the crackdown, including AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and a sinister-looking, assault-style shotgun. … Fourteen of those accused were charged in a complaint unsealed in Chicago on Wednesday. Three of those charged were arrested in Chicago Wednesday, and 10 were arrested in Mississippi. One other was already in jail, authorities said. … Five others were charged by federal officials in Mississippi."

The Chicago Sun-Times (3/1, Main) reports, "The Chicago defendants include convicted felons Eddie Nesby, 25, Julius Statham, 37, and Antonio Brunt, 30. … Nesby allegedly told investigators he recruited Percy Strong of Mississippi and others to buy guns for him there. Strong could buy guns because he was not a felon, officials say. … In 2005, Strong bought a 9mm Hi-Point pistol at a Clarksdale, Miss., pawn shop. The Hi-Point was recovered last October in the 3200 block of West Augusta after officers stopped a car containing gang members getting ready to shoot a rival, police said. The gangsters pointed the Hi-Point and an AK-47 at officers, who opened fire and killed two of them, police said." The Sun-Times adds, "Chicago Police, State Police and the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives have been investigating the Mississippi-to-Chicago gun pipeline since 2001. The defendants named Wednesday were allegedly responsible for 39 Mississippi guns recovered by law enforcement officials in Chicago. Authorities have not found 117 other Mississippi guns distributed in Chicago by the defendants, officials said."

The WLS-TV, ABC 7, Chicago (2/28, Baca) reports, "Prosecutors said 301 guns confiscated by police and agents in Chicago over five years were traced to federally licensed gun dealers at four shops in Tunica and Clarksdale, Miss. … 'A majority of these firearms are purchased in gun and pawn shops in Mississippi. Despite the attempts to obliterate the serial numbers, Chicago police were able to trace the origins with good old-fashioned police work,' said Hiram Grau, Deputy Police Superintendent. … 'We've noticed in the last few years there's a definite trend to go with powerful were higher capacity, more lethal firearms,' said Andrew L. Traver, ATF special-agent-in-charge."

WMC-TV, Memphis (3/1) reports, "It's a growing crime on which the Feds are focused. … 'The movement of guns from the Mid-South to the streets of Chicago,' says U.S. Attorney Jim Greenley of the Northern District of Mississippi. … Nineteen people were rounded up Wednesday and charged with running guns. … 'In my 20 years of law enforcement with the ATF, this is the most successful arrest operation I've ever been a part of,' says ATF agent Robert Browning." WMC-TV adds, "In all, the Feds say 100 firearms went from North Mississippi to Chicago between 1999 and 2005. … Many of the weapons were distributed to gang members and used to commit serious crimes, including homicide. … 'Some of these guns were involved with officers getting shot,' says Coahoma County Sheriff Andrew Thompson. … Most of those charged in this latest round of arrests are from Jonestown, Mississippi in Coahoma County, but the weapons were purchased from pawn shops in Tunica and Clarksdale."

The Daily Mississippian (3/1, Berry) reports, "The firearms were purchased in the Clarksdale and Tunica areas from federally licensed firearms dealers. The defendants purchased them for family members and friends, or for the exchange of money or drugs, according to Robert Browning, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … 'Our office will be relentless in pursuing these investigations,' said Browning, who is with the New Orleans division of firearms for ATF." The Mississippian adds, "The investigation began as a result of the recovery of firearms in Chicago, and the case has been impending for the past couple of years, Browning said. … 'We're cracking down on it,' he added. "Enough is enough." … The investigation was conducted by ATF, the Chicago Police Department and the Illinois State Police. Agents from the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics and Deputy U.S. Marshals also assisted ATF with the arrests. … If proven guilty charges, the people arrested will be given a sentence of anywhere from five to 10 years, Browning said."

DOJ_NMG_0139144

DOJ Probe Finds Misspending Of Marshals Funds. USA Today (3/2, Kelley) reports, "A U.S. Marshals Service official misspent $4.3 million meant for courthouse security and witness protection to pay for fitness centers and firing ranges at federal buildings, a Justice Department investigation found." USA continues, "The Office of Management and Budget repeatedly told David Barnes not to use construction money on exercise and training facilities, citing agency policy and appropriations laws that restricted the money for improved prisoner security, the report said. … Barnes, who oversees courthouse space for the agency, concealed the spending from his superiors and directed $2.6 million in construction money for fitness centers and firing ranges at 20 federal courthouses from 2000 to 2005, according to a copy of the 41-page report obtained by USA TODAY. … The agency has not acted on the report, which it received last April." USA adds, "Barnes also used nearly $900,000 budgeted for witness protection to build a firing range in the Miami federal courthouse, and he used nearly $400,000 in construction money to hire fitness center staff and clerical workers at the Marshals Service headquarters, where Barnes works, the investigation found. Some workers were friends or relatives of Barnes and his subordinates and were unqualified for the jobs, the report said. … Barnes' lawyer, Charles Printz, said his client had the authority to spend construction money on firing ranges and fitness centers. Printz said the investigation was spurred by disgruntled employees and he expected his client to be cleared. … 'No monies were misappropriated,' Printz said in an e-mail response. … Barnes remains on the job, pending an administrative review. He could be fired, suspended or cleared."

OMB Warned USMS About Spending. USA Today (3/2, Kelley) reports, "Ten years ago, the White House budget office warned the U.S. Marshals Service to get its priorities straight: Money designated to improve courthouse security was not to be used for fitness centers or firing ranges. … The agency's construction account should be spent on securing areas used by prisoners, such as elevators, holding cells and entrances, Kenneth Schwartz, an Office of Management and Budget (OMB) official, said in a letter to a top Justice Department administrator. … 'We are concerned with the oversight and priority setting within this program and request that the department continue to monitor USMS expenditures from this account closely,' Schwartz wrote." David Barnes, who oversees courthouse space for the Marshals Service, pressed the OMB to change the policy in several telephone conversations in 2001, Lisa Ward of the budget office told investigators. His arguments, repeated in letters, e-mails and statements to investigators: Marshals Service officers need to stay physically fit and practice their marksmanship, and facilities to do so were often expensive and far from their offices. … Eventually, the General Services Administration and the Justice Department agreed that the Marshals Service could request exemptions for the construction of firing ranges. The GSA is the independent agency responsible for construction and renovations of federal buildings. … Barnes' office asked for 14 waivers during 2003, but all were denied, records show." USA notes, "In 20 cities, Barnes found ways without waivers to get the GSA to build or renovate firing ranges and fitness centers, an internal Justice Department investigation found. … The investigation by the department's inspector general found Barnes shifted money among various construction projects and bypassed his supervisors to spend nearly $3.9 million on firing ranges and fitness centers at courthouses from Alaska to Florida, and wasted $440,000 in fees by paying for contractors and construction through the GSA rather than his agency. … In the report, Justice Department investigators cited the Marshals Service's lax oversight as a reason why Barnes' spending sometimes went undetected. A 2003 report from the department's inspector general found that the service couldn't always show it was spending its money the way Congress directed …"

DOJ_NMG_0139145

Man In Minnesota Explosives Probe Left Homeless, Says Attorney. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/2, Xiong) reports, "A Bloomington man who was jailed then released after federal authorities confiscated several firearms and explosive materials from his house has been left homeless after the city condemned his house, according to his attorney." The Tribune continues, "Terry L. Dahlen, 60, and his wife are living with relatives after a city official said the couple have mice and too much clutter in their basement, garage and back yard, said attorney Joe Rymanowski. … 'Normally they don't condemn for that,' Rymanowski said. 'They say, "Clean it up."' Rymanowski said the couple were given until March 8 to clean up the house. … Dahlen has not been charged with any crime and was released from jail Wednesday afternoon. He agreed to be named for this story." The Tribune adds, "FBI agent Paul McCabe said only that the case is still under investigation. The state Bureau of Criminal of Apprehension and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) are part of the joint investigation into Dahlen. … Speaking on Dahlen's behalf, Rymanowski said his client is a gun and pyrotechnics hobbyist who used to be a licensed weapons manufacturer in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The materials and firearms seized by authorities are left over from the days he made firearms for sale to other hobbyists, Rymanowski said. … 'None of it was illegal,' he said. 'He wasn't building a bomb. He wasn't threatening anybody.' … Rymanowski said he's puzzled as to why federal authorities searched Dahlen's house, but added that they have been cooperative and professional. … Federal authorities have not said why or for how long Dahlen has been investigated. The Bloomington and Minneapolis bomb squads were called out to his home Monday in the 1700 block of W. 84th Street. Authorities also searched a commercial retail building at 5200 47th Av. S. in Minneapolis on Tuesday that belongs to his wife, who runs a salon at the address. 'Explosive materials' that required a bomb squad and the skills of military personnel also were found there. … Steve Bogdalek, assistant special agent in charge of the ATF, has said the materials found at both locations were not in danger of exploding."

FBI To Launch Northern Virginia Anti-Gang Task Force. The Washington Times (3/2, Taylor) reports, "The head of the FBI's Washington Field Office yesterday said he has created a new task force to pursue federal gun and racketeering charges against gang members in Northern Virginia." The Times continues, "Joseph Persichini Jr., the assistant director in charge of the field office, said the task force began its work about a week ago and is made up of eight to 10 agents and representatives from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and local law-enforcement agencies. … He said authorities hope to prosecute gang members using federal gun statutes and the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO). … 'We're looking for RICO indictments of people,' Mr. Persichini said during a wide-ranging interview with editors and reporters at The Washington Times. 'The key here also is using ATF and all the gun charges [because] many of those crimes are committed with weapons.'" The Times notes, "Mr. Persichini, who was appointed head of the field office in November after serving as its acting director since January 2006, said the effort is part of an increased focus on dealing with local violent crime, which he called a 'very serious concern.' … He also pointed to a recent uptick in violence in parts of the District. Mr. Persichini said he has spoken extensively with Acting Metropolitan Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier about gathering and sharing intelligence and that he talked with Mayor Adrian M. Fenty as recently as Wednesday night about comprehensive plans to thwart violent crime."

FBI's "Best Undercover Agent" Profiled. Under the headline "Meet the FBI's 'Best Undercover Agent,'" the New York Sun (3/1, Capeci) writes, "At 6-foot 4-inches and more than 300 pounds, veteran FBI agent Joaquin 'Jack' Garcia is a small mountain of a man who is hard to miss. That's never stopped him from being a master of disguises. In recent years, the expert undercover agent's appointment calendar must have read a bit like the script for the 1960s screwball comedy 'If It's Tuesday, This Must Be Belgium.'" Garcia "surfaced last year when he took the stand in a closed courtroom to describe how he had played the role of a Gambino associate for 27 months. At the same time, Mr. Garcia was also posing as a New York capo in a 36-month FBI sting against crooked Florida cops in which four police officers were nailed last week on corruption charges (thus the reason for the secret testimony). That wasn't all: Sources tell Gang Land that Mr. Garcia worked undercover in three other successful organized crime and corruption cases during the same time frame. In Boston, he posed as a drug lord," and "during the same period, sources said, Mr. Garcia worked undercover in two separate cases in Atlantic City. In one involving Asian organized crime, he played the role of a wiseguy. In a political corruption probe that resulted last fall in guilty pleas by three city council members -- two from Atlantic City and one from Camden -- he posed as a Wall Street financier."

DOJ_NMG_0139146

Four Men From Chicago Suburbs Charged In Drug-Trafficking Probe. The Chicago Tribune (3/1, Rozas) reports, "Four west suburban men have been charged in a nationwide investigation into a Mexican drug trafficking and money laundering ring that resulted in the arrests of 400 people in the last 20 months, authorities announced Wednesday." The Tribune continues, "The investigation, called Operation Imperial Emperor, targeted a Mexico-based drug trafficking organization authorities say is responsible for supplying tons of cocaine and large amounts of methamphetamine and marijuana to distribution cells on a monthly basis throughout the United States, U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales announced in San Diego." The Tribune adds, "In Illinois, Melrose Park authorities worked with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to arrest four men alleged to be selling drugs through two Melrose Park businesses. Jose Payan, Saul Leyva and Bogar Santana were each charged with conspiring with others with intent to distribute and distribution of more than 100 grams of heroin. According to the complaint, Payan told a cooperating source that he could go to Santana Automotive Inc. in the 3400 block of West Lake Street in Melrose Park to get a sample of the heroin, said Assistant U.S. Atty. April Perry. In the course of the Payan investigation, authorities seized more than 310 grams of methamphetamine and more than 240 grams of heroin, Perry said. … In a separate complaint, authorities charged Florentino Velazquez of Villa Park with conspiring with others to distribute and distribution of more than 1 kilogram of cocaine. He and an unknown man are alleged to have distributed 2 kilos of cocaine to a cooperating source, Perry said. Velazquez is alleged to have used an unnamed Melrose Park restaurant to sell the drugs and collect money, Perry said."

Law Enforcement Taking Lead In Sports Doping Probes. The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Shipley) reports, "The battle against the use of illegal performance-enhancing drugs by athletes is increasingly being led by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies as part of an expanding cooperative effort with the U.S. Olympic Committee's primary anti-doping body, according to law enforcement and anti-doping officials." The Post continues, "The latest manifestation of this collaboration came this week in the multi-state crackdown on illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs that led to the arrests Tuesday of eight people in three states, the officials said." The Post adds, "In the run-up to the bust, Drug Enforcement Agency agents in Mobile, Ala., contacted federal investigators involved in the probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, or Balco, in Northern California that has implicated dozens of Olympic and professional athletes, including baseball slugger Barry Bonds. The California investigators put them in touch with officials from the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency, with whom they have been closely cooperating for the past four years. … Within days, the USADA sent a chemist to Mobile to offer his expertise. Several DEA agents flew to Colorado Springs, where the anti-doping agency is based. There were frequent phone conversations. The cooperation illustrated the changing landscape of anti-doping enforcement, investigators say." The Post notes, "USADA officials say the collaboration also reflects the failure of a more than three-decade effort to contain the use of performance-enhancing drugs by competitive athletes through testing. These officials say that with the Beijing Olympics less than 18 months away they fear the use of even more sophisticated drugs and masking agents by athletes will continue to outpace testing methods. … The crackdown on the online pharmacies this week suggests how the relationship already is benefiting both sides. While law enforcement agents have said they are targeting the pharmacies and not necessarily their customers, the California investigators urged DEA agents to turn over evidence of any involvement by high-profile athletes to the USADA so it could start disciplinary proceedings against them."

Murder Of Medical Marijuana Provider Highlights Risks Of Even Legal Sales. The New York Times (3/2, Johnson) reports from Denver, "Ken Gorman, an aging missionary of marijuana, was found murdered in his home here two weeks ago. The unsolved crime is exposing the tangled threads at the borderland of the legal and illegal drug worlds he inhabited." The Times continues, "Mr. Gorman, who was 60, legally provided marijuana to patients under Colorado's medical marijuana law, but he also openly preached the virtues of illegal use, and even ran for governor in the 1990s on a pro-drug platform. … In recent years, he had grown frightened as the mainstream medicine of cannabis care bumped against the unregulated and violent terrain of the illicit drug market. He had been robbed more than a dozen times in his home on Denver's west side, had recently gotten a gun and also talked of installing a steel door and gates." The times adds, "Some legal experts say Mr. Gorman's death could lead to a reconsideration of how medical marijuana is administered here and elsewhere. Providers are often left exposed and vulnerable because of the nation's conflicting drug laws, with marijuana use illegal under federal law but legalized for some medicinal purposes here and in 10 other states. … Since 1997, after the first medical marijuana law was passed in California, as many as 20 legal marijuana providers have been killed around the country, mostly in robberies, said Allen St. Pierre, the executive director of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or Norml, a nonprofit advocacy group in Washington." The Times notes, "Some in law enforcement, including Colorado's attorney general, John W. Suthers, say the Gorman killing illuminates more clearly than ever that crime and marijuana cannot be disentangled. … Many people in the medical marijuana supply system say the central risk comes down to the fact that they work in the shadows, where law enforcement officials are often either conflicted or hostile and crime is rampant. … Some critics said Mr. Gorman was caught up in his own image as a rebel, thwarting even the rules about medical marijuana that could further the causes he espoused. … And he had become an angry, fearful man, his friends and acquaintances said. Though he had served time in prison — five years for a felony drug conviction in the mid-1990s — and often seemed to scoff at the law, he had grown increasingly frustrated about being a crime victim himself."

DOJ_NMG_0139147

US Global Survey Scrutinizes Counter-Narcotics Efforts. The AP (3/2) reports the United States "said yesterday that top antiterror allies Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Colombia had fallen short in the war on drugs despite enhanced counter-narcotics efforts, and it criticized perennial foes Iran, North Korea, and Venezuela for not cooperating. … In its annual global survey of the drug war, the [State Department] said massive opium poppy production in Afghanistan…continued to pose a major threat due to its links with groups such as the Taliban."

The Washington Times (3/2, Seper) reports the State Department "also said drug smugglers were hiding in the 'shadows of an open society' to link themselves with sophisticated criminal and terrorist organizations to launder millions of dollars in illicit profits."

Opium Production Rises In Afghanistan. The Hindustan Times (3/2) reports the US "has praised India's good record on counter-narcotics, but is worried that an alarming increase in poppy cultivation in Afghanistan is helping Taliban terrorists fund attacks on US and NATO forces. … The resurgence of Afghan opium cultivation has increased the flow of heroin to Europe, Russia and the Near East, which 'undermines those societies and the consolidation of democracy and security in Afghanistan,' the report stated."

Bloomberg (3/2) reports Afghanistan's opium production "reached a record in 2006 and the drug trade is supporting the Taliban insurgency to overthrow the government of President Hamid Karzai," according to the State Department. The country "produced 5,644 metric tons of opium compared with 4,475 metric tons in 2005, the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs said in a report."

Venezuela Seen As Enabling Drug Trade. El Universal (3/1) reported US authorities said Thursday that Venezuela, "with 'a rampant high level of corruption, weak judicial system and lack of international counternarcotics cooperation' is increasingly enabling a growing illicit drug transshipment industry. This forms part of the conclusion of the 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategy Report." The report "states that according to officials from the US embassy in Caracas, Venezuelan security forces are involved in the drug traffic."

USA Today (3/2) reports, "The number of flights from Venezuela suspected of ferrying Colombian cocaine to the Dominican Republic and Haiti — key transfer points for U.S.-bound shipments of the drug — increased 167% last year, State Department Assistant Secretary Anne Patterson said. She added that the leftist government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, a frequent critic of the United States, has allowed drug trafficking to flourish."

McClatchy Newspapers (3/2) writes, "In its harshest assessment yet of drug trafficking in Venezuela, the State Department on Thursday said the country is turning into a haven for smugglers because of corruption and the government's refusal to cooperate with other nations. … The Bush administration stepped up its criticism of Venezuela after Chavez ousted Drug Enforcement Administration agents from Venezuelan government facilities in late 2004, allegedly because they were spying. The two countries later negotiated an agreement to allow DEA agents to return, but Venezuela has so far refused to sign it, the report says." The Kansas City Star, San Jose Mercury News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, and Myrtle Beach Sun News used the McClatchy story.

DOJ_NMG_0139148

Federal Officials Baffled By Mail Bomb Suspect. The AP (3/2, Hollingsworth) reports from Kansas City, MO, "He calls himself the Bishop. Exactly why is just one of the many mysteries surrounding the increasingly menacing figure. … The man -- and investigators believe they are dealing with a man -- is suspected of sending at least a half-dozen threatening letters to financial institutions over the past 18 months and mailing two dud pipe bombs that arrived a day apart in Kansas City and Chicago in January." The AP continues, "In his letters, the Bishop has demanded that financial companies move the prices of certain stocks to certain levels, often $6.66 -- an apparent reference to the Antichrist, said corporate counterterrorism expert Fred Burton. … Burton, whose security firm in Austin, Texas, has been hired by financial companies to find the Bishop, said the pipe bombs were assembled with crucial components deliberately left out, in what was probably a warning. Next time, Burton said, the bombs could be real. … But catching the Bishop and figuring out exactly what his grudge is could require help from the public, Burton said." The AP adds, "The Bishop, like the Unabomber, is probably mentally ill, highly intelligent and a loner, Burton said. … Postal inspectors are offering a reward of up to $100,000 for information. The investigation also includes the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and local police."

Alabama Man Accepts Plea Bargain In Bomb Case. The Mobile (AL) Press-Register (3/2, Kirby) reports, "A Flomaton man originally accused of making bombs has accepted a plea bargain, admitting to a misdemeanor." The Press-Register continues, "Gregory Wendell Nichols pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Mobile on Wednesday to improper storage of explosives. He faces a maximum of one year's incarceration, but prosecutors have agreed to recommend probation. U.S. Magistrate Judge Bert Milling Jr. set sentencing for March 23." The Press-Register adds, "A jury in January failed to reach a verdict in Nichols' case, and both sides were preparing to retry it this month. Jury selection had been scheduled for Monday. … But Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis and Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden struck a deal prior to Wednesday's hastily called hearing. Neither could be reached for comment Thursday. … As recently as Tuesday, both lawyers expressed confidence about winning the second round." The Press-Register notes, "Agents for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5 after getting a tip. Nichols permitted the agents to search his white Ford Ranger pickup truck, and they reported finding five homemade explosive devices. … Nichols admitted that he made the devices using spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He told jurors last month that he packed the cylindrical canisters -- which were about 2 inches long -- with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape and attached a firecracker fuse. … But Nichols insisted the devices were firecrackers, not bombs. He told jurors that he made them so that he and his fiancée could drop them into a river. He said he never intended to hurt anyone."

IMMIGRATION:

Kennedy Denies Taking "Secretive" Approach To Immigration Bill. The Washington Times (3/2, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Far from being secretive, the top senator drafting the major Senate immigration bill this year says he has invited a host of senators to help out and has kept the Bush administration in the loop the entire time, despite accusations to the contrary." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, "chairman of the immigration subcommittee, has held several meetings with lawmakers, including a recent one with top Republican and Democratic senators on the issue. He also talked with President Bush in January and last week spoke with White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten about the bill, Mr. Kennedy's office says." Kennedy said yesterday, "I look forward to introducing a comprehensive immigration reform bill with Sen. John McCain and our House colleagues in the coming weeks and continuing to work with the bipartisan coalition behind the legislation that passed the Senate last year." On Wednesday, Sen. Arlen Specter, "the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee, used the committee's first immigration hearing of the year to publicly accuse Mr. Kennedy of leaving him and his staff out of the process."

DOJ_NMG_0139149

NYTimes Derides Chertoff, Gutierrez Silence On "Path To Citizenship." The New York Times (3/2, 1.16M) editorializes, "On Wednesday, Congress took its first crack at immigration reform since the great nothing of 2006. The Senate Judiciary Committee invited Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez to testify on the issue. With a new Congress and a new comprehensive immigration bill expected to be introduced in the Senate within days, the hearing could have been the first spark of a rejuvenated campaign by an alliance of Congressional Democrats, moderate Republicans and the Bush administration to finally solve a problem that has festered for too long." But "it wasn't. That's because both Mr. Chertoff and Mr. Gutierrez slunk away from a central pillar of comprehensive reform: a path to citizenship that would give illegal immigrants -- the ones who wait and prove they deserve it -- the chance to participate fully and proudly in the life of this country." The Times adds that if President Bush "is too weakened to stand up for comprehensive reform, then Democrats and Republicans in Congress need to unite and do it for him."

LATimes Says Colorado's Case Illustrates Failure Of "Strictly Punitive Approach." The Los Angeles Times (3/2, 850K) editorializes, "Immigrants are fleeing Colorado because of harsh laws passed during a special session of the Legislature last summer that require state identification for government services and allow police to check suspects' immigration status. The ID laws have raised the ire even of many native-born people, who complain about hassles for those trying to get a driver's license. If chasing away immigrants has caused problems in Colorado, imagine the economic chaos it would bring to California, where immigrants make up about a third of the workforce and the agriculture industry dwarfs Colorado's." Colorado "is learning a painful lesson about the foolishness of a piecemeal, state-by-state response to illegal immigration and about the economic effect of a strictly punitive approach."

TAX:

SEC Probing Google's Tax Accounting Methods. The Financial Times (3/2, Waters) reports, "Google's method of accounting for income taxes has come under the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission, the first time since its 2004 initial public offering that it has attracted the attention of securities regulators." The Times continues, "The internet search company disclosed the informal inquiry in its latest 10K annual report, which was filed on Thursday. The SEC had first approached it for information about its tax accounting in March last year, the company said, leading to an exchange of letters that is still ongoing." The Times adds, "The SEC's initial approach came just weeks after Google had surprised Wall Street with the news that its tax rate had climbed unexpectedly in the final quarter of 2005. That, in turn, dented its profits, contributing to a slide in its share price that persisted for much of last year. It took nine months for Google's shares finally to climb decisively back above their level of early January. … Google blamed the high tax charge on a shift in its business mix, which had seen more of its investment spending move to faster-growing international markets and away from the US. As a result, a higher proportion of its profits were attributed to its operations in its domestic market, where it generally faces a higher tax rate than elsewhere."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Walter Reed Commander Relieved Of Duty. Maj. Gen. George Weightman has been relieved of duty as commander of the Walter Reed Army Hospital. ABC World News (3/1, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Weightman "was relieved of his command because wounded troops at Walter Reed were found to be living in substandard conditions and not getting the care they deserved." ABC (Kerley) added Weightman "was in the job for six months. But Pentagon leaders say they lost trust and confidence in General Weightman's leadership." Robert Gates, Secretary of Defense: "I don't have very much patience with people who don't step up to the plate, in terms of addressing problems." Kerley: "Secretary Gates says change was needed, after last week's stunning 'Washington Post' investigation, of this outpost facility for wounded troops, known as Building 18." Today, the Army "tapped Lieutenant General Kevin Kiley, who ran Walter Reed between 2002 and 2004 to return temporarily some are surprised with his appointment. Just last week, he toured Building 18 and toured the conditions there." Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, MD, Army Surgeon General: "While we have issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure of Walter Reed." Kerley: "Veterans advocates say they complained for years to Kiley about wilding 18."

DOJ_NMG_0139150

The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 4, 2:30, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "The Army fired Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman at the urging of Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who today met with a panel to investigate conditions at Walter Reed." Emerging from "a closed door briefing with Gates, Senator Jack Reed predicted it won't end with Weightman, who had been in charge at Walter Reed for only six months." Sen. Jack Reed: "My sense is whatever responsibility he shares is not his alone, and that they have to look carefully at others." Martin: "Congressman Bill Young, who used to visit Walter Reed frequently, says commanders have been ignoring complaints about patient care ever since the war started." Rep. C. W. Bill Young: "We felt that the command was very unhappy with our presence because they didn't like us calling attention to their problems."

NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 4, 2:20, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "The growing scandal centers around Building 18, where wounded soldiers were forced to live in roach- and rat-infested rooms with mold-covered walls. An Army statement today said senior Army leadership has lost trust and confidence in the commander's leadership ability. But the Army's decision to put the former Walter Reed commander temporarily back in charge has created still more controversy. Lieutenant General Kevin Kiley was in charge at Walter Reed until six months ago and only last week appeared to play down concerns over conditions at Building 18." Pentagon officials "say Kiley's temporary assignment upset Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who hinted Kiley could also get the ax." Robert Gates, Secretary of Defense: "I don't have very much patience with people who don't step up to the plate in terms of addressing problems that are under their responsibility."

The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Vogel, Branigin, 690K) reports the "appointment of Kiley, who had earlier been the facility's commander, surprised some Defense Department officials because soldiers, their families and veterans' advocates have complained that he had long been aware of problems at Walter Reed and did nothing to improve its outpatient care." The action "came 10 days after a Washington Post series exposed the squalid living conditions for some outpatient soldiers at Walter Reed and bureaucratic problems that prevented many from getting the care they need." Kiley was "commander at Walter Reed until 2004. He has called the Post stories a 'one-sided representation' of conditions at the facility." The Army is "already cracking down on some staff members after the reports of poor care. A number of soldiers have been reassigned from their duties at Walter Reed, including a captain and several sergeants, according to an Army official." The Army said "the decision to relieve Weightman was made Wednesday after several days of consideration. Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey consulted with Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, and Gen. Richard A. Cody, the vice chief of staff, according to Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman."

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Havemann, 850K) reports, "Deteriorating conditions at Walter Reed -- especially during a war in which the ratio of wounded soldiers to killed is far higher than in any previous conflict -- have posed a problem for President Bush, who speaks regularly to the nation's debt to its returning soldiers. He frequently has visited the hospital and its patients."

USA Today/AP (3/2, 4A, Burns) reports the Army said Weightman "was the wrong person to fix embarrassing failures in the treatment of wounded soldiers that have soiled the institution's reputation as a first-class hospital." Secretary Gates "issued a brief statement Thursday endorsing Harvey's action against Weightman."

The New York Times (3/2, Cloud, 1.16M) reports the "revelations about conditions at the hospital, one of the Army's best-known and busiest centers for treating soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan, have embarrassed the Army and prompted two investigations, several Congressional inquiries and a rush to clean up the accommodations for outpatients, where residents lived with mold on the walls, stained carpets and other problems." Treatment of "wounded soldiers has also been spotlighted recently in a documentary recounting the treatment received by the ABC News anchorman Bob Woodruff, who was wounded in Iraq last year."

The Financial Times (3/2, Sevastopulo) reports the Pentagon "has been quick to condemn the conditions at Walter Reed, which were revealed as President George W. Bush attempts to shore up moribund support for his military 'surge' in Iraq. A recent ABC News/Washington Post poll showed that public support for the conflict in Iraq continues to slide." The Walter Reed "scandal has generated bi-partisan criticism from lawmakers who have in recent weeks been more busy debating the merits of the surge." Sen. Hillary Clinton said, "Our nation has a duty to honour and support those who have served and sacrificed so much in the defence of our nation. Yet these recent news reports indicate that for nearly four years since the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq began, not enough has been done to assist these courageous men and women in recovering from the wounds of battle." The Times adds the "response from the Pentagon stands in contrast to the aftermath of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Donald Rumsfeld, the former secretary of defence, came under criticism for not firing any senior officers over the scandal which tainted the US image worldwide."

DOJ_NMG_0139151

Senate Freshmen Take Lead On Response To Walter Reed Scandal. McClatchy (3/2, Goldstein) reports Sens. Claire McCaskill and Barack Obama "led the charge this week on one of the hottest war-related controversies since Abu Ghraib," introducing "legislation that would ensure that wounded soldiers are housed in clean conditions, have quick access to care and face an easier time claiming their disability benefits."

Nicholson Says Walter Reed Circumstances "Unacceptable." ABC World News (3/1, story 4, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Secretary for Veterans Affairs called the circumstances at Walter Reed absolutely unacceptable. Jim Nicholson also told the House Budget Committee that improvements in wounded veterans' care overall will be made, including new efforts to identify and treat traumatic brain injury, which Bob Woodruff has been covering for this broadcast."

WPost Questions Kiley's Appointment To Head Walter Reed. The Washington Post (3/2, A12, 690K) says in an editorial, "We are glad that the Army is finally taking the issue of outpatient care seriously enough to effectively end the career of a major general for presiding over the disgraceful condition of Building 18. But the evidence compiled so far suggests that Gen. Kiley has been more complicit in the scandalous neglect of Walter Reed's outpatient facilities for longer than Gen. Weightman has been. It also indicates that the Army's reshuffle is really about projecting the appearance of accountability, not punishing those most responsible." As Rep. Bill Young "said yesterday of Gen. Weightman, 'I don't know him. But I know he's the fall guy.'"

Rice Names Critic Of US Iraq Policies To Counselor's Post. The Washington Post (3/2, A5, Kessler, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has named Eliot A. Cohen, "a prominent writer on national security strategy and an outspoken critic of the administration's postwar occupation of Iraq," as her counselor, State Department officials said yesterday. Despite Cohen's "sometimes caustic views on administration policies," officials said he has "impressed both Rice and President Bush with his writings," especially "Supreme Command," a study of the relationship between civilian commanders in chief and their military leaders. In selecting Cohen, Rice "has lured a leading figure of the neoconservative movement as her policies toward North Korea and Iran draw fierce attack from the Republican Party's right wing." The position "does not require Senate confirmation," and Cohen is expected to formally take the post in April.

Defying Veto Threat, House Democrats Pass Union Bill. The AP (3/2, Abrams) reports, "Democrats rewarded organized labor Thursday for helping them retake control of Congress, passing a House bill that would make it easier for workers to start unions against companies' wishes." The legislation, "passed 241-185 on a nearly party-line vote, would take away the right of employers to demand secret-ballot elections by workers before unions could be recognized." The House action "was the second triumph for labor following the Democratic takeover of Congress. The House and Senate also have voted on separate bills to raise the minimum wage." Labor groups "saw the Employee Free Choice Act as one way of halting the downward trend of union membership, now about 12 percent of the work force." But "the celebrations may be short-lived. Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., has pledged to block the bill and the White House says President Bush will veto the measure if it reaches his desk." The House vote "was short of the two-thirds majority that would be needed to overturn a veto."

The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Maher, 2.04M) reports, "The Employee Free Choice Act would let workers choose to join a union once a majority sign cards, a process that would be quicker and less open to employer opposition than a traditional secret-ballot election. Union officials believe it would help reverse labor's decline." Union membership "currently stands at 7.4% of the private-sector work force, down from roughly 20% in the early 1980s."

The New York Times (3/2, Greenhouse, 1.16M) notes Republicans "argued that the bill, the Employee Free Choice Act, was a betrayal of workers' access to a secret-ballot election. Some called it the 'employee intimidation act,' maintaining that the process of majority sign-up could well entail union organizers' bullying workers into signing pro-union cards." Speaker Nancy Pelosi, meanwhile, "called the bill 'the most important labor law reform legislation of this generation.'"

DOJ_NMG_0139152

USA Today (3/2, 6A, 2.27M) briefly notes the vote, while the Washington Post (3/2, A4, Russakoff, 690K) cats the House Democratic move as the continuation of "the populist tone of its first 100 hours." The lobbying campaign "leading up to the vote featured AFL-CIO ads highlighting workers who were fired during union-organizing campaigns, and who waited years to get jobs back or to receive back pay." The "business community's campaign was led by a coalition of 300 business organizations in all 50 states, calling itself the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace. The group aired radio ads calling the legislation anti-worker and antidemocratic, and said its efforts generated 27,000 contacts of House members from within the targeted districts."

The Washington Times (3/2, Lengell, 88K) notes McConnell "vowed to fight the bill. 'We will not allow the progress already made on behalf of U.S. workers to be undone, nor will we allow coercion by employers or unions,' Mr. McConnell said." The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Henessy-Fiske, Simon, 850K) also reports the story.

Kimberley Strassel writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/2, 2.04M), "For Big Labor, this week's 'card check' victory marked the ultimate payoff for past Democratic election support. For House Democrats, it marked the end of the honeymoon. … The card check will be the biggest change in labor law in decades," yet Democrats "allowed but a single hearing and markup on the issue. That hearing was held in the middle of the House's very public Iraq debate, the better to avoid any notice." The issue "exploded nonetheless, and it was the party's moderate wing that got caught in the crossfire." Pelosi "might remember that she only won last year's election because of the success of these moderate candidates."

Bush's Pick To Head Consumer Product Safety Commission Riles Critics. The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "President Bush said Thursday that he would nominate a senior executive of the largest organization representing the nation's manufacturers to head the government agency assigned to protect consumers from dangerous products." Bush's "choice of Michael E. Baroody, executive vice president of the National Assn. of Manufacturers, to be chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission drew an angry response from consumer advocates and predictions of a tough battle for Senate confirmation from the Democratic majority." Critics, "noting Baroody's work for an organization that aims to ease restrictions on a long list of companies making consumer goods, said the nomination would reflect an administration effort to restrict government regulations by executive order and action, rather than by congressional approval."

Ambassadorial Nomination May Be Blocked Over Swift Boat Vets Donation. The New York Times (3/2, Luo, 1.16M) reports, "Senator John Kerry may get his parting shot after all. After his having name sullied during the 2004 presidential campaign by the opposition group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, Mr. Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat, got the chance on Tuesday to sharply question Sam Fox, a major Republican donor who was recently nominated to be ambassador to Belgium, about his $50,000 contribution to the group." In addition, "some of Mr. Kerry's Democratic colleagues on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee now say they will consider voting against Mr. Fox's nomination." Kerry "declined on Thursday to say how he would vote."

Bill Would Ease Release Of Presidential Papers. The Washington Post (3/2, A11, Williamson, 690K) reports a bipartisan proposal "targeting White House rules on the release of presidential papers would claw back power over public records from the executive branch, advocates of the bill say." The House measure, "introduced yesterday, would overturn President Bush's 2001 executive order adding layers of review before presidential papers are made public. Historians and archivists say the order has kept thousands of documents from public view." In a statement, one of the bill's sponsors, Oversight and Government Reform Chairman Rep. Henry A. Waxman, said, Bush's order "gave current and former presidents and vice presidents broad authority to withhold presidential records or delay their release indefinitely." The Post adds co-sponsors "include Reps. Todd R. Platts (R-Pa.), William Lacy Clay (D-Mo.) and Dan Burton (R-Ind.)."

Hoyer Bill Would Reduce Health-Care Premium Costs For Federal Employees. The Washington Post's (3/2, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) introduced a bill that would increase the government's contribution toward federal employee health-care premiums -- as he had pledged he would to two unions earlier this week. Under the proposal, the government would pay 80 percent [instead of the current 72 percent] of the cost of premiums in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, saving the average federal worker about $500 annually." The Post adds that while the "rate of premium growth in the federal employee program has slowed in recent years," a "number of insurance plans in the federal program raised their premiums by more than the average 1.8 percent increase. Premiums for health maintenance organizations, for example, rose by 6.3 percent, and some Washington area federal HMOs raised their rates higher." The Post adds, "The prospects for Hoyer's proposal are uncertain, in part because Congress is under pressure to reduce the federal deficit and rein in spending. His proposal also runs counter to a Bush administration plan, announced last month, that would reduce the government's contribution to health-care premiums for new retirees with less than 10 years of federal service."

DOJ_NMG_0139153

Cheney Fires Up Activists With Speech At Conservative Conference. The Washington Times (3/2, Curl, 88K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney yesterday fired up hundreds of conservatives at their annual conference in Washington, drawing cheers when he upbraided Democrats for not realizing an 'inconvenient truth' -- that Iraq is the central front in the global war on terrorism." Taking "direct aim at former Vice President Al Gore, who starred in the film 'An Inconvenient Truth' that won an Academy Award last week for best documentary," Cheney said, "In these circumstances it's worth reminding ourselves that, like it or not, the enemy we face in the war on terror has made Iraq the primary front in that war. To use a popular phrase, this is an inconvenient truth." Speaking at "the Conservative Political Action Conference on its opening night," Cheney touted "the president's tax cuts and health care proposal," and "also chastised Democratic senators for moving to trim funding for the war and deliver a vote of no-confidence against Mr. Bush, as when the House passed a nonbinding resolution criticizing Mr. Bush's troop 'surge' proposal. 'The fact is that every statement we make has multiple audiences,' he said. 'The enemy listens, and so do the Iraqi people. A watching world needs to know that the United States is determined to prevail because we're a nation that keeps its word, and because we understand the consequences of failure,' he said to applause."

Angry Conservatives Suggest Withholding Support From '08 GOP Hopefuls. The Boston Globe (3/2, Milligan, 413K) reports, "Leading conservatives Thursday attacked the Republican Party as big-government, free-spending coddlers of illegal immigrants, and said the country's conservatives should withhold support from the GOP's current slate of presidential nominees to force them to the right. 'I feel very angry and betrayed' by the GOP, some of whose elected officials have backed a 'guest worker' immigration plan, abortion rights and tax increases, said Richard Viguerie, chairman of Conservative-HQ.com. 'We should withhold support from all major Republican [presidential] candidates today. Not one of them deserves our support today,'" he said "at the Conservative Political Action Conference annual meeting Thursday." He also said "conservatives should withhold 'all support' from GOP national committees, which Viguerie said have not produced federal candidates who adhere to conservative principles." The Globe notes, "Conservatives said they are frustrated and angry, blaming the GOP's massive losses in the 2006 elections on Republicans who deviated from a hard-line conservative agenda. The mood also puts added pressure on a slew of GOP presidential candidates set to speak to the CPAC meeting Friday."

Despite Low Poll Ratings, Bush Remains Fundraising Heavyweight For GOP. The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "President Bush insists that he will stay out of the race over who will succeed him, at least until a Republican nominee is chosen. But that isn't keeping him from becoming the chief fundraiser for Republicans, his low poll ratings notwithstanding. Bush helped raise $10.4 million for the Republican Governors Association earlier this week, and he will be the star attraction at a fundraising dinner Friday in Louisville for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, a Kentucky Republican, and the National Republican Senatorial Committee. It is expected to bring in more than $2 million." GOP "activists and advisers say the president is likely to speak at several fundraising events a month in each of the coming months, showing that Bush still has considerable power to help his party even though his approval ratings have averaged well below 50 percent throughout his second term."

NYTimes/CBS Poll Shows Bush Approval Rating Dropping Among Republicans. The New York Times (3/2, Connelly, 1.16M) reports that a New York Times/CBS News

DOJ_NMG_0139154

Poll shows President Bush's "approval rating dropped 13 percentage points since last fall among Republicans, 65 percent of whom now say they approve of the way he is handling his job as president, compared with 78 percent last October." Twenty-nine percent "of all Americans" say "they approve of the way he is doing his job, compared with 34 percent at the end of October. Sixty-one percent disapproved, compared with 58 percent in October." Meanwhile, 23% "of those polled approved of the way Mr. Bush is dealing with the situation in Iraq," while 25% "approved of his handling of foreign policy. Even the president's campaign against terrorism, long his signature issue, is seen positively by only 40 percent of those polled, while 53 percent disapprove." And 75%, "including 52 percent of Republicans, say there is not much the United States military can do to reduce the sectarian fighting in Iraq. Over all, 23 percent of the public say the country is going in the right direction and 68 percent see it as 'on the wrong track.'" The nationwide telephone survey of 1,281 adults was conducted Feb. 23-27 and has a margin of error of +/- 3%. Among Republicans, the margin of error is +/- 5%.

Krauthammer Defends Funding Manned Space Exploration. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (3/1, A13, 690K), columnist Charles Krauthammer writes that there are two sets of critics to President Bush's program envisioning a moon base by 2020 and a future journey to Mars: "the Luddite left and the science purists." He says, "They would not build a moon base at all. The Luddites have long opposed manned exploration as a waste of resources when, as the mantra goes, we have so many problems here on Earth. I find this objection incomprehensible. When will we stop having problems here on Earth?" The "idea this time is not to go to plant a flag, take a golf shot and leave, but to stay and form a real self-sustaining, extraterrestrial human colony." Science purists say that unmanned missions are more cost-effective. "Pound for pound, dollar for dollar, manned exploration does bring back less science than robots. But it still brings back science. Humans can discover things through intuition and pattern recognition that machines thinking in algorithms cannot. Imagine the scientific possibilities if today we had humans patrolling Mars rather than the brilliantly programmed but still limited golf carts now roaming the surface."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Lower, But Markets Appear To Steady. The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 5, 1:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Stocks resumed their slide after a one-day break. The Dow lost 34 points today, the NASDAQ about 12. But it could have been worse." CBS (Mason) added, "It was another whip-saw day here on Wall Street. … At the opening bell, the Dow went into a panicked plunge. In just four minutes, it plummeted more than 200 points." But "stocks steadied helped by a strong manufacturing report, and then rallied back."

The New York Times (3/2, Bajaj, Peters, 1.16M) reports "the Dow recovered and traded in positive territory for brief periods before ending the day down 34.29 points, or 0.3 percent. The volatility was a reminder that concerns persist." The S.& P. 500 "closed down 0.3 percent, or 3.65 points, at 1,403.17." NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 7, :25, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on "another wild ride on Wall Street today." The Wall Street Journal (3/2, C1, McKay, 2.04M), USA Today (3/2, 3B, Shell, 2.27M) and Washington Post (3/2, D1, Cho, Tse, 690K), among other newspapers, also report the stock numbers this morning.

Manufacturing Report Shows Signs Of Recovery. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Whitehouse, Aeppel, 2.04M) reports, "The US manufacturing sector showed signs of recovering from a recent slump, striking a positive note that boosted stocks and eased concerns the nation's economy could be headed for recession." The Institute for Supply Management "reported yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity rose to 52.3 in February from 49.3 the previous month. The index for new orders, an indicator of future activity, rose to 54.9 from 50.3. Any reading above 50 suggests the sector is expanding." The ISM survey "caught some economists and investors by surprise, because other recent indicators had shown manufacturing faltering."

Paulson Says Economy's Outlook Remains Strong. The Financial Times (3/2, Callan) reports, "The outlook for the US economy is healthy, though concerns remain about domestic protectionism and the slow pace of Chinese currency appreciation, US Treasury secretary Hank Paulson said on Thursday." The remarks, in a speech to the Economic Club of Washington, "followed positive figures on US personal incomes and manufacturing, which helped lift the Dow Jones index from an earlier 209-point drop. 'I am watching developments carefully, and I believe that the US economy is healthy,' he said." But "the turbulence in US markets indicated investors remain worried about the economy, with concern centred on doubts about what will happen next in two sectors that are important contributors to growth: housing and manufacturing."

DOJ_NMG_0139155

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (3/2, D1, Henderson, 690K) reports that "after several days of financial market turmoil and conflicting economic reports, analysts are having second thoughts. Yesterday, several said they saw rising risks of higher inflation and much weaker economic growth." But "more-optimistic observers pointed yesterday to a Commerce Department report that consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of the nation's economic activity, rose briskly in January, while incomes climbed even more rapidly."

Greenspan Says Recession Not "Probable." The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Man, McCallum, 2.04M) reports, "Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan toned down his warning that the US might slip into a recession later this year, saying he doesn't think such a slowdown is 'probable,' according to investment bank CLSA Asia-Pacific Markets, which hosted Mr. Greenspan's speech. 'It is possible we can get a US recession toward the end of this year, but I don't think it's probable,' Mr. Greenspan was quoted by CLSA as telling the audience here."

The New York Times (3/2, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "They are marketed as 'intimate conversations' with…Greenspan, and groups pay about $150,000 to hear his economic outlook." But yesterday, "for the second time this week, these private chats went public, jolting financial markets around the world and upstaging Ben S. Bernanke, Mr. Greenspan's successor as chairman of the Federal Reserve." The Times adds, "First on Monday and then again on Thursday, Mr. Greenspan upset stock markets merely by uttering the word 'recession' and saying that one might but probably would not occur by the end of this year."

Bernanke's "Steady Hand" Praised. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Lawmakers in both parties welcome Fed chief's reassuring midweek testimony, which followed market-rattling commentary from predecessor Greenspan. Rep. Jim Cooper praises Bernanke for a 'steady hand' at the central bank." The Journal adds, "Treasury's Paulson, on the job less than a year, spoke by phone with Bush but offered little publicly to calm investor jitters."

Krugman Predicts "Great Meltdown" Is Underway. In a column dated "Feb. 27, 2008," Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (3/2, 1.16M), "The great market meltdown of 2007 began exactly a year ago, with a 9 percent fall in the Shanghai market, followed by a 416-point slide in the Dow. But as in the previous global financial crisis, which began with the devaluation of Thailand's currency in the summer of 1997, it took many months before people realized how far the damage would spread." Krugman says "all sorts of implausible explanations were offered for the drop in US stock prices. It was, some said, the fault of Alan Greenspan, the former chairman of the Federal Reserve, as if his statement of the obvious -- that the housing slump could possibly cause a recession -- had been news to anyone. One Republican congressman blamed Representative John Murtha, claiming that his efforts to stop the 'surge' in Iraq had somehow unnerved the markets." Krugman continues, "By early 2007, the collapse of the US housing boom had brought with it widespread defaults on subprime mortgages — loans to home buyers who fail to meet the strictest lending standards. Lenders insisted that this was an isolated problem, which wouldn't spread to the rest of the market or to the real economy. But it did."

Poll Finds Majority Favors Guarantee Of Health Insurance. The New York Times (3/2, Toner, elder, 1.16M) reports that a nationwide New York Times/CBS News poll of 1,281 adults conducted Feb. 23-27, with a margin of plus or minus 3 percent, found "a majority of Americans say the federal government should guarantee health insurance to every American, especially children, and are willing to pay higher taxes to do it." The Times continues, "While the war in Iraq remains the overarching issue in the early stages of the 2008 campaign, access to affordable health care is at the top of the public's domestic agenda, ranked far more important than immigration, cutting taxes or promoting traditional values." The Times also notes that those polled "showed a striking willingness…to make tradeoffs to guarantee health insurance for all, including paying as much as $500 more in taxes a year and forgoing future tax cuts." However, "Americans remain divided, largely along party lines, over whether the government should require everyone to participate in a national health care plan, and over whether the government would do a better job than the private insurance industry in providing coverage."

DOJ_NMG_0139156

McCain Pledges To Accept Public Funds For General Election. The New York Times (3/2, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports Sen. John McCain "joined Senator Barack Obama on Thursday in promising to accept a novel fund-raising truce if each man wins his party's presidential nomination." The promises by McCain and Obama "are an effort to resuscitate part of the ailing public financing system for presidential campaigns." Such a "pact would eliminate any financial edge one candidate might have and limit each campaign to $85 million for the general election. The two candidates would have to return any private donations that they had raised for that period." Obama "laid out his proposal last month to the Federal Election Commission, seeking an opinion on its legality. The commissioners formally approved it on Thursday."

The Politico (3/2, Vogel) reports Sen. McCain "raised the stakes Thursday in an emerging campaign finance showdown among the major presidential candidates." The moves "by McCain, the senior senator from Arizona, and Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, seemed designed to solidify their positions as the field's leading advocates for reducing the influence of money in politics. But their pledges will also put some pressure on the other leading candidates from both parties to follow." Democrats Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards "both indicated they might take that newly open option. But neither went as far as Obama or McCain." Among the GOP contenders, "former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani plans to start collecting general election money, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is considering it. Neither would match the pledges made by McCain or Obama."

The AP (3/2, Kuhnhenn) reports McCain's campaign said he "will opt out of the post-Watergate presidential public financing system unless the Democratic nominee agrees to campaign under the same financial restrictions." The McCain camp's "decision came after the Federal Election Commission eased some political fundraising rules in hopes of salvaging the tattered presidential financing system in the 2008 campaign. By a 5-0 vote, the commission said presidential candidates may solicit private contributions for the general election now and still be eligible for public financing if they become their party's nominee."

McCain Apologizes For Saying Soldiers' Lives "Wasted." The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 6, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "McCain did not expect to be trailing anyone at this point in his second run at the Republican nomination. What happened?" CBS (Schieffer) added, "Well, he surely didn't, and now Giuliani has a big lead in the polls, at least. I think it is because John McCain is a Senator. He has a record. Anything he does, he gets a lot of publicity, like last night on Letterman, he said a lot of lives were being wasted in Iraq. The blogs and the Democrats attacked him. Today he had to apologize and say what he meant to say was a lot of lives were being sacrificed. On the other hand, Giuliani is so far sort of running under the radar. He's campaigning a lot but he's not holding many news conferences. He's not being on national television very much. So he is not being cut on for being pro-gay rights and pro-abortion, things a lot of Republicans don't like. Eventually he's going to have to answer those questions, but right now, he's managed to keep the focus on being a smart and decisive leader on 9/11. That cannot last once he has to start asking these and answering these questions. But for now it is working, and John McCain, Katie, is the one being hurt by it."

NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 5, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Nobody questions John McCain's military credentials, but it's something he said when he announced his presidential campaign last night that has some people today questioning his choice of words in what is already a tough campaign this early on." NBC (Gregory) added, "On the campaign trail today, the man known for straight talk was instead taking back something else he told David Letterman about Iraq." Sen. John McCain: "We wasted a lot of our most precious treasure which is American lives over there." Gregory: "Today this statement from McCain – 'Last evening, I referred to American casualties in Iraq as wasted. I should have used the word sacrificed as I have in the past.' The Letterman appearance was seen as an attempt to breathe new life into a campaign that's been stumbling." Byron York, National Review: "I think this is an effort to show the energetic, hard-charging McCain is back at it." Gregory: "At a gathering of conservatives in Washington, activists were distributing a 23-page attack on McCain, saying, he's no Ronald Reagan and listing his positions they oppose." David Bossie, conservative activist: "He has bucked the conservative issues year after year in the United States Senate and why now should he be rewarded with being the standard bearer of the Republican Party?"

ABC World News (3/1, story 6, :50, Gibson, 8.78M) did not report on the controversy over McCain's remark, but reported he "has confirmed what everyone expected. He's running for president. All the candidates are looking for ways to make their announcement stand out. Senator McCain made his declaration on the David Letterman show last night." Sen. John McCain: "I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0139157

Another AP story (3/2, Sidoti) says "the episode underscored the intense scrutiny in store for McCain -- the freewheeling candidate of 2000 -- while he seeks the presidency as one of the GOP's strongest contenders and as the country wages an unpopular war to which McCain is perhaps forever linked." The AP adds that "10 months before the first primary votes, McCain's work to woo the GOP base -- and become the party's standard-bearer -- is just beginning, and he must overcome a spate of hurdles to get the Republican nomination." He "must convince Republican primary voters that they can trust him to be a loyal party champion who will adhere to GOP's core principles -- and not waver."

The New York Times (3/2, Nagourney, 1.16M) notes Sen. Barack Obama "made a similar remark in a visit to Iowa after announcing his candidacy. 'We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged, and to which we now have spent $400 billion and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted,' he said." McCain "was criticized on Thursday by the Democratic National Committee for making the remark, just as Mr. Obama had been criticized by conservative groups." The Washington Times (3/2, Bellantoni, 88K) also reports the story.

Santorum Says He Would Back Any GOP Candidate Except McCain. The Politico (3/2, Budoff) reports, "Former Sen. Rick Santorum has drawn at least one conclusion about the Republican presidential primary field: Anybody but John McCain." Santorum, "who signed a contract Thursday as a Fox News contributor, said that he has spoken with every GOP candidate except the senator from Arizona but that it's still too early for him to endorse. 'The only one I wouldn't support is McCain,' Santorum said during an interview in his office at the Ethics and Public Policy Center in Washington, where he is a senior fellow. 'I don't agree with him on hardly any issues,' Santorum said. 'I don't think he has the temperament and leadership ability to move the country in the right direction.'"

FEC Gives Obama Leeway To Accept Public Financing. The Chicago Tribune (3/2, McCormick, 617K) reports the Federal Election Commission "said Thursday that presidential candidates may accept private contributions for potential general election campaigns and still remain eligible for public financing if they ultimately win their party's nomination." The ruling "came after a request for clarification from Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who has suggested he would like the option of running a publicly financed general election campaign — with its associated spending limits — if he could convince a future Republican opponent to do the same." However, political observers "say the ruling is likely a moot point since a financial truce is highly unlikely in an era where political advertising, organization and travel are extremely expensive and both parties will be ferociously fighting for a White House with no incumbent." The decision, "in a 5-0 vote, comes as front-runners from both parties have forgone public funds and spending limits for the primaries."

The Financial Times (3/2, Luce) reports the FEC "unanimously upheld a request by Barack Obama, one of the leading Democratic presidential candidates, to continue to raise private funds without closing off his right to public financing if he were nominated as his party's candidate." Obama said he "would do all that he could to preserve the US's virtually broken system of public election financing. His stance contrasts sharply with that of Mrs Clinton, who announced in January that she would rely solely on private sources of money for both the party primaries and the general election."

The Politico (3/2, Vogel) reports the FEC's decision "is likely to have little practical long-term impact. And it could leave Obama, the junior senator from Illinois and among the front-runners for the Democratic nomination for president, in a tricky spot." Election lawyers and political analysts "say the fiscal and political landscape of the 2008 campaign make it unlikely that either major party nominee will use that flexibility." Together, the nominees "are expected to spend upwards of $1 billion on their campaigns. By that calculation, nominees who go the new route could be required to return roughly $165 million each soon after their respective conventions – typically the start of an expensive advertising blitz that continues through the November general election – in order to qualify for $85 million in matching public funds."

WPost Says All Candidates Should Pledge To Take Public Financing. The Washington Post (3/2, A12, 690K) says in an editorial, "Thanks to an innovative request from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, the Federal Election Commission voted yesterday to try to salvage the endangered public financing system for presidential elections. Now it is up to presidential candidates who claim to support that system to put real commitment behind their rhetoric." Candidates who "are sincere supporters of public financing ought to be willing to pledge to stay within the system if they win their party's nomination and the other side's nominee promises to do the same."

DOJ_NMG_0139158

Clintons, Obama To Appear At Selma Commemoration On Sunday. The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Kornblut, 690K) reports on its front page that ex-President Bill Clinton will join New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "at a commemoration of the 1965 civil rights march in Selma, Ala., on Sunday, bringing his star power and popularity among African Americans to a weekend of events that had been shaping up as a showcase for the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama," who "announced several weeks ago that he would deliver the keynote speech at a service honoring the march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge." Obama "has gained significantly among black voters in recent months, according to a recent Washington Post-ABC News survey, jeopardizing Clinton's early lead in the Democratic primary field. Reluctant to give any ground to Obama," Sen. Clinton "decided early last week that she, too, would go to Selma this weekend. She arranged a simultaneous appearance at a church just steps away from the one where Obama will speak Sunday morning, and she agreed to accept a civil rights award on behalf of her husband." The Post notes, "The imminent collision of the two candidates…offers a vivid snapshot of how important the campaigns believe black voters will be in the primaries. And the swift move by the Clintons to try to claim the spotlight at the event demonstrates that the former first lady does not intend to cede the black vote to Obama."

The AP (3/2, Fouhy) reports that Bill Clinton on Sunday "will be inducted…in the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame," creating "another high-profile opportunity for the Clintons to grab the spotlight from the charismatic Obama. The joint appearance marks the first time the Clintons have appeared together publicly since she announced her candidacy in January. … Obama spokesman Bill Burton said the more people who attend the anniversary events, the better."

Obama Ancestors Said To Have Owned Slaves. The Baltimore Sun (3/2, Nitkin, Merritt, 257K) reports, "Many people know that Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's father was from Kenya and his mother from Kansas." But "an intriguing sliver of his family history has received almost no attention until now: it appears that forebears of his white mother owned slaves, according to genealogical research and Census records." The records, "which had never been addressed publicly by the Illinois senator or his relatives -- were first noted in an ancestry report compiled by William Addams Reitwiesner, who works at the Library of Congress and practices genealogy in his spare time. The report, on Reitwiesner's Web site, carries a disclaimer that it is a 'first draft' -- one likely to be examined more closely if Obama is nominated." According to the research, "one of Obama's great-great-great-great grandfathers, George Washington Overall, owned two slaves who were recorded in the 1850 Census in Nelson County, Ky. The same records show that one of Obama's great-great-great-great-great-grandmothers, Mary Duvall, also owned two slaves." The Sun "retraced" much of the research, and "an Obama spokesman did not dispute" it, saying "the senator's ancestors 'are representative of America.'"

Romney Hits McCain On Immigration, Giuliani On Guns, Abortion, Gay Rights. The AP (3/2, Johnson) reports, "Republican Mitt Romney assailed his two leading presidential rivals Wednesday, criticizing John McCain's stance on immigration and dismissing Rudy Giuliani's support for gun control, abortion and gay rights as a losing combination in the GOP primary." The AP adds, "Running a distant third in national polls, Romney used a campaign stop in New Hampshire to challenge McCain's support for stronger border security paired with an eventual path to citizenship for some of the 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States." Also, "in an interview with the Christian Broadcasting Network," Romney "criticized Giuliani for his moderate stands on abortion, gays and gun control -- even though Romney expressed similar views in previous campaigns."

Giuliani Apparently On Way To Victory In South Carolina Straw Poll. The AP (3/2) reports, "In a sign of what die-hard Republicans may think of the field of presidential contenders, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani was leading 10 other candidates Thursday in a straw poll in conservative" Spartanburg County, SC. The AP notes, "With 71 of 75 precincts reporting, Giuliani garnered 123 votes. California Rep. Duncan Hunter was running in second place with 110 votes, and Arizona Sen. John McCain was third with 86 votes, according to county GOP officials. Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback had 68 votes, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney had 59 votes and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee rounded out the front-runners with 18 votes. The voting isn't binding and comes as the county party goes about the business of organizing precincts and ultimately sending people to its county convention and the state GOP convention in May." Spartanburg County GOP Chairman Rick Beltram "said before the straw poll he expected fewer than 2,000 people to vote. After the voting, he blamed rainy weather for the low turnout."

DOJ_NMG_0139159

Democratic Candidates Accused Of School Choice Hypocrisy. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (3/2, A11, 2.04M), Clint Bolick, president and general counsel of the Alliance for School Choice and senior fellow at the Goldwater Institute, lambastes Democrats in Washington who oppose school choice while sending their own children to private schools. "Indeed, a nearly perfect correlation exists among Democratic presidential candidates who have exercised school choice for their own children and those who would deny such choices to the parents of other children." Bolick cites former President Bill Clinton's daughter Chelsea's attendance of "the elite private Sidwell Friends School," juxtaposing this against Clinton's veto of a school choice bill for D.C. "And today presidential candidate Mrs. Clinton continues to stridently oppose school choice." Bolick continues to outline the positions on the issue—and the status of the children—of other Democratic presidential candidates, singling out Illinois Sen. Barack Obama for calling for both parties to be open to "anything that works."

Early Start To Campaign Could Give Gingrich, Gore An Opening. The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 6, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "You talk about this campaign starting earlier than ever. How do you think that the change the dynamics of the race?" CBS (Schieffer) added, "Well, I think what could happen, Katie, is if the frontrunners in both parties keep cutting on each other and cutting each other down, I think by this summer, you may begin to see an opening for other candidates to come into the race. People like Newt Gingrich on the Republican side, maybe even Al Gore on the Democratic side. But the thing to remember, Katie we are at the very beginning of this race."

Washington State Senate Urged To Call For Bush Impeachment. The New York Times (3/2, Stolz, 1.16M) reports, "Mayor Rocky Anderson of Salt Lake City appeared before a committee of the State Senate in Olympia in support of a resolution asking Congress to begin impeachment proceedings against President Bush. Mr. Anderson, a Democrat, said the case for impeachment was not partisan. He said the president should face impeachment for 'heinous human rights violations, breaches of trust, abuses of power injurious to the nation, war crimes" and "misleading Congress and the American people."

Doubts Raised About Accuracy Of US Intelligence On Iran, North Korea. In a news analysis, the New York Times (3/2, A8, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports, "For more than three years, American intelligence officials have insisted that they learned from their mistakes in the months leading to the Iraq war, when murky information about Saddam Hussein's weapons programs was presented as fact and inconclusive judgments were hardened into statements of near certainty." As a result, the "more calibrated intelligence assessments that have come to light in recent weeks, particularly on Iran and North Korea, appear to show a new willingness by American spy agencies to concede the limits of their knowledge." The "new caution" reflects adherence to what some officials now call "the Powell Rule," that is "intended to avoid a repetition" of former Secretary of State Colin Powell's "humiliation" at the U.N. Security Council. The Times notes that former DNI John Negroponte formalized "new analytical procedures in a directive issued in January" as "one of his last acts." The intelligence community's "renewed emphasis on debate and dissent" has also been "reflected in decisions about which officials earned promotions in the aftermath of the Iraq intelligence failures."

Also in an analysis, the AP (3/2, Jahn) says, "New doubts are arising about the accuracy of US intelligence on the nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran, only a few years after faulty warnings about weapons of mass destruction helped President Bush justify the invasion of Iraq." The AP also notes that Bush administration officials, including Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, are "toning down assertions that such a program had been developed."

White House Defers Questions To Intelligence Community. The Washington Post's (3/2, A11) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that reporters yesterday "pressed White House spokeswoman Dana Perino on news reports that the administration is backing away from its absolute claims that North Korea has a uranium-enrichment program." Perino responded, "I think what I need to do is refer you to the intelligence community," which Kamen notes is "a crowd long known for on-the-record briefings on its sources and process."

DOJ_NMG_0139160

More Commentary. In an editorial, the New York Times (3/2, 1.16M) writes, "We would like to believe that the Bush administration has finally figured out how dangerous and counterproductive it is to hype intelligence," but "we doubt it." The Post says it suspects that "this week's confessions of doubt about North Korea had less to do with a sudden burst of candor than the fact that Pyongyang has agreed to readmit nuclear inspectors" and "the White House's eagerness for a diplomatic win in these bleak times."

The Washington Post (3/2, A12, 690K) says "the weakening of the intelligence about an ongoing uranium program does not mean that the United States can drop the issue in the next phase of negotiations. On the contrary, a crucial test of the diplomatic process will be whether the North will reveal what it did with the centrifuges and other materials it is known to have acquired. Pyongyang's response will show whether it, like the Bush administration, is more inclined to conduct serious negotiations than it was four years ago."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (3/2, 2.04M) writes, "White House officials say President Bush has earned the benefit of the doubt on North Korea and that he'll insist on dismantling all of its nuclear facilities. We hope he's not relying on the US intelligence community to tell him when that's happened."

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, 850K) editorializes, "For the second time, serious questions have been raised about the credibility of US assessments of the potential nuclear threat posed by an enemy nation. Are these charges justified? Given the US need to enlist other nations to adopt sanctions to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions and deal with other proliferation challenges, that's a question that demands an answer."

Pyongyang Reasserts Pledge To Denuclearize. The Washington Post/AP (3/2, A10) reports North Korea's "No. 2 leader," Kim Yong Nam, "reiterated Thursday his country's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons," as the nation "sought a resumption of aid in its first high-level talks with South Korea." Kim said that "the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula is the dying wish" of the country's founding president, Kim Il Sung, who died in 1994. North Korea "will make efforts to realize it," he told South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jae Joung in Pyongyang. The Washington Times (3/2, 88K) also publishes this AP report.

Under the headline "US, North Korea Soften Their Stances," the Wall Street Journal (3/2, A3, Ramstad, King, 2.04M) reports North Korea and the US "are showing signs of softening toward one another" as negotiators from both sides plan to meet Monday to discuss steps toward normalizing relations. The US is also reportedly "close to resolving a high-profile crackdown" on a Macau bank used by the North Korean government. Meanwhile, the Financial Times (3/2, Mitchell) reports frozen North Korean funds in Macao's Banco Delta Asia "could be released by the end of this month," according to an executive for a company whose accounts have been affected. Colin McAskill, who heads Hong Kong-based Koryo Asia, said the head of a Macao government-appointed committee now in charge of Banco Delta Asia told him recently that some of the funds "could be released soon."

Meanwhile, McClatchy (3/2, Landay, Hall) reports there are "new questions about the Administration's assertions" that Banco Delta Asia "knowingly laundered proceedings from North Korean narcotics trafficking, cigarette smuggling and counterfeit American currency." An audit of the bank's finances by accounting firm Ernst & Young "found no evidence that the bank had facilitated North Korean money-laundering, either by circulating counterfeit US bank notes or by knowingly sheltering illicit earnings of the North Korean government."

Diplomats Report Progress On Iran Sanctions. The AP (3/2, Lederer) reports diplomats "made progress Thursday on possible new sanctions against Iran" as officials from the US, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany held a two hour conference call. In a statement, the State Department said, "They had a good productive discussion during which they made progress in agreeing on the elements of a resolution. A few more issues remain for discussion, and the political directors agreed to convene another conference call on Saturday morning." The Department said it expects that ambassadors "could begin drafting the text of a resolution next week."

China Urges Iran To Return To Talks. The AP (3/2) reports China Thursday urged Iran "to halt uranium enrichment and step up efforts to reach a peaceful, negotiated solution to the international dispute over its nuclear program amid a visit by Iran's deputy foreign minister." Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang told reporters, "We hope that Iran can give a positive response to the appeal of the international community and faithfully abide by resolution 1737."

DOJ_NMG_0139161

Iran, Saudi Arabia To Hold Summit On Regional Crises. The New York Times (3/2, Fattah, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will visit Saudi Arabia Saturday for "a summit meeting with King Abdullah intended to tackle the Middle East's growing sectarian and political crises," Iranian officials announced Thursday. The visit, Ahmadinejad's first state visit to Saudi Arabia, "was initiated by Iran," according to a former Saudi official with knowledge of the discussions. It also "marks the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts by the two regional powers, as well as other Arab countries, to settle the political standoff in Lebanon, cool sectarian violence in Iraq and possibly even avert a looming confrontation with the United States." The trip is seen by some "as a defensive move by an increasingly isolated Iran while to others it marks the start of another public relations offensive for the bellicose president."

The AP (3/2, Nasr) calls the visit "an indication that weeks of talks between their envoys on simmering conflicts in Iraq and Lebanon have made some headway."

Democrats Move To Require Approval For Iran Strike. Responding to fears that President Bush may be preparing to launch a military strike against Iran, McClatchy (3/2, Talev) reports Senate Democrats "are drafting legislation that would require the White House to seek congressional approval before any such action." Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., who is leading the effort, said Thursday "that he's still working on the details, but he intends to introduce his measure next week as an amendment to the $93.4 billion war spending bill."

Jordanian King To Address US Congress. The Washington Times (3/2, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "King Abdullah II of Jordan will address a joint session of Congress next Wednesday, becoming the first world leader to address such a meeting under the new Democratic-led Congress. Merissa Khurma, spokeswoman for the Jordanian government in Washington, tells us the king's speech will partly address the crisis in neighboring Iraq and ways to restore security and stability there. Congress, no doubt, will be all ears."

State Department Report Accuses Venezuela Of Drug Trafficking. McClatchy (3/2, Bachelet) reports, "In its harshest assessment yet of drug trafficking in Venezuela," the State Department Thursday "said the country is turning into a haven for smugglers because of corruption and the government's refusal to cooperate with other nations." The department's 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategies Report "also expressed uneasiness over Bolivia's efforts to expand" coca cultivation and "offered rare praise for Cuba for deporting a Colombian trafficker to Bogota." The report "also praised three countries -- Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico -- that Bush will visit this month during a swing through Latin America, saying the three were trying to halt drug smuggling, if not succeeding."

USA Today (3/2, 6A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports as evidence of Venezuela's drug trafficking, Assistant Secretary of State Anne Patterson said the "number of flights from Venezuela suspected of ferrying Colombian cocaine to the Dominican Republic and Haiti -- key transfer points for US-bound shipments of the drug -- increased 167% last year."

Mexican Ambassador Praises Upcoming Bush Visit. In its "Embassy Row" column, the Washington Times (3/2, Morrison, 88K) reports Mexico's new ambassador, "when he presented his diplomatic credentials at the White House this week, praised President Bush for his upcoming visit to Mexico City." The two-day visit beginning March 12 will "strengthen the already firm foundations on which our bilateral relationship rests," Ambassador Arturo Sarukhan said.

US Wants Missile Radar In Caucasus. The AP (3/2, Lekic) reports the director of the US Missile Defense Agency "said Thursday that Washington wants to base an anti-missile radar in the Caucasus, a move that could provoke a further rift with Russia." Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering" declined to specify which country the long-range radar could be installed in," but noted that "it would be very useful for the anti-missile system." Speaking on a stop at NATO headquarters in Brussels, he said the US "would like to place a radar in...the Caucasus." Meanwhile in Moscow, Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Grushko said the missile elements already planned by Washington for Poland and the Czech Republic would become a "factor that we will have to take into account while determining our steps in the military-political sphere and military development."

DOJ_NMG_0139162

Ukrainian Opposition Leader Calls For Early Elections. In an interview with the Washington Times (3/2, Sands, 88K), Ukrainian opposition leader Yulia Tymoshenko said his country's "revived Orange Coalition will press for early elections in a bid to halt Russia's growing influence and control over the country's vital energy assets." Tymoshenko, a former prime minister and key figure in the Orange Revolution, "said Ukraine's sovereignty and hopes for better relations with the West are in jeopardy if the government of pro-Moscow Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych serves out its full term to 2011."

Negroponte Begins Tour Of Asia. AFP (3/2) reports Deputy Secretary of State Negroponte Thursday "started an Asian tour in which he is expected to discuss a breakthrough nuclear deal with North Korea." Negroponte arrived in Tokyo where he "is likely to meet Foreign Minister Taro Aso and other officials on Friday," a ministry official said. After a three-day stay, Negroponte travel to China and South Korea.

US Says China Expanding Nuclear Sub Fleet. The Washington Times (3/2, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports on its front page that China's military is "engaged in a major buildup of submarines that includes five new strategic nuclear-missile boats and several advanced nuclear-powered attack submarines," according to the Office of Naval Intelligence. The new nuclear-powered missile submarines will be outfitted with new 5,000-mile range JL-2 missiles that "will provide China with a modern and robust sea-based nuclear deterrent force," the ONI stated. The buildup is "raising new concerns among senior Pentagon planners already worried by Beijing's broader strategic nuclear-forces buildup."

Beijing Likens Cheney Criticism To Nosy Neighbor. The Washington Times (3/2, Lanfranco, 88K) reports Chinese Foreign ministry spokesman Qin Gang responded yesterday to Vice President Dick Cheney's remarks about China during his recent Asia trip "with an earthy metaphor about home invasion and a barbed eight-point statement outlining China's diplomatic philosophy." Qin's comments "strayed far from the tepid boilerplate answers normally issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs." For example, Qin was quoted as saying, "If you had a neighbor always standing at your doorstep, peering into your household and constantly shouting at you, 'Why don't you open your door and let me see what's in your house, what's in your family,' how would you feel about that?"

US May Seek Limit On Chinese Paper Imports. On its front page, the New York Times (3/2, A1, Weisman, 1.16M) reports the "problems of paper mills" in the Appalachians "and elsewhere around the country have become a test case for a possible new confrontation between the United States and China, which many industry officials and members of Congress hope could lead to new tariffs on imports not only of Chinese-made paper but also of steel, furniture, textiles and plastics." In coming weeks, the Commerce Department is expected to impose duties on high-gloss paper, known as "coated paper," from China. The Bush administration's decision "to face the issue of subsidies comes at a time of mounting pressure by Congress for a tougher stance on trade" and when "many lawmakers say it is time to stop treating China with kid gloves."

US, Brazil Negotiating Ethanol Partnership. USA Today (3/2, 6A, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "U.S. and Brazilian officials are negotiating details of an ethanol partnership in advance of President Bush's scheduled visit to Brazil next week." If "completed, the planned deal would help increase both nations' production of ethanol, creating significant economic as well as political implications." Expanding "world ethanol markets would help the USA and other nations reduce their dependence on foreign oil. Also, reduced demand for oil might reduce the clout of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez." USA Today adds, "Today, officials from the United States, Brazil, China, India, South Africa and the European Commission will announce the creation of the International Biofuels Forum. The group, affiliated with the United Nations, will work to create worldwide ethanol standards." During his visit to Brazil next week, President Bush "is scheduled to discuss alternative energy sources with President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva." Brazilian Foreign Minister Celso Amorim "said Brazil...plans to ask the United States to cut tariffs on ethanol imports." But "members of Congress from corn-growing states have already said they oppose cutting ethanol tariffs."

African Peacekeeping Force Arrives In Somalia. USA Today (3/2, 6A, 2.27M) reports 30 Ugandan troops "flew into Somalia, the first contingent in an African peacekeeping force to shore up a United Nations-backed transitional government threatened by Islamic militants."

DOJ_NMG_0139163

US Stirs Debate Over Home Of Africa Development Bank. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, A1, Phillips, 2.04M) reports on its front page that "to the Bush administration, it seems obvious: The African Development Bank's headquarters should be in black Africa." Four years ago, the bank "fled civil war in its longtime home in Ivory Coast for a temporary refuge in Tunisia," but now the US "says it's time for the bank to leave Tunisia, give up hopes of returning to Ivory Coast, and find a new permanent home somewhere else south of the Sahara." While "many black African and European member nations agree in principle that the bank should have its headquarters in a sub-Saharan country," some fear leaving Ivory Coast permanently "would signal that a country once hailed as a model of African hope is now just another horror story."

Discouragement Of Multiple Sex Partners May Slow Spread Of AIDS In Africa. In a front page article, the Washington Post (3/2, A1, Timberg, 690K) reports that a "growing number of studies single out" the practice of multiple sex partners "as the most powerful force propelling" the spread of AIDS in Africa. This "new understanding…helps explain why the disease has devastated southern Africa while sparing other places" and "also suggests how the region's AIDS programs, which have struggled to prevent new infections even as treatment for the disease has become more widely available, might save far more lives: by discouraging sexual networks."

WSJ Criticizes UN Official On Women's Rights. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/2, 2.04M) writes, "On the occasion of the annual meeting of the U.N.'s Commission on the Status of Women, the American delegation decided to organize a panel on the subject of 'State-Sanctioned Mass Rape in Burma and Sudan.' After years of reporting by human-rights organizations about atrocities committed by government forces against women in both countries, that sounds like a reasonable topic to discuss." However, U.N. "bureaucrat" Sylvie Cohen of the Division for the Advancement of Women "refused to list the panel discussion on the U.N.'s Web site" because it "would be perceived as offensive to named member states." The Journal calls it "amazing" that a U.N. organization "that purports to look out for the interests of women seems more concerned about defending the sensibilities of the governments who harbor and support their rapists."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Chief of Walter Reed Hospital Fired Over Troop Treatment."
"Holding New Hampshire's Primary In Place."
"Iraq's Displaced Trickle Home."
"Wall Street Charges Recall Heyday Of Insider Trading."
"Artist's War Depiction Has Many Faces, Rough Edges."
"School Mentor Hoops Upset L.A. Mayor."

USA Today:

"Where Did The Money Go?"
"More Colleges Banning Smoking."
"U.S. Marshals Official Accused Of Misspending Security Funds."
"Chip Foose Overhaulin' Mainstream Designs."

New York Times:

"General Is Fired Over Conditions At Walter Reed."
"Most Support U.S. Guarantee Of Health Care."
"Pressed By U.S., Pakistan Seizes A Taliban Chief."
"HUD Blocks Proposed Sale Of Starrett City."
"U.S. Reviewing Safety Of Children's Cough Drugs."
"A Cry To Limit Chinese Imports Rings At Paper Mill."
"California Enjoys Electoral Muscle."

Washington Post:

"Army Fires Commander Of Walter Reed."
"A Wider Front In Doping Battle."
"Shortages Threaten Guard's Capability."
"In Botswana, Speeding HIV's Deadly Spread."
"At Site of '65 March, An '08 Collision."
"Author Shaped Lens For Viewing U.S. History."
"13 Charged In Big Insider Trading Scam."

Washington Times:

"China Expands Sub Fleet."
"GOP Regroups To Foil War Plans Of Democrats."
"House back Bill To Ease Unionizing."
"N. Korea Again Pledges To End Nuke Program."
"Tymoshenko Seeks Early Elections."

DOJ_NMG_0139164

Detroit Free Press:
"Calloway Is Choice To Lead Schools."
"The Hot Dog."
"GM Sales Growth A Pleasant Surprise."
"State's Plan To raze Abandoned Homes Is Raising Hopes In Cities."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"'Barbie Bandit' Arrest Made."
"Tornado ravages Alabama School."
"State's Public health System 'In Crisis' Says House Panel."

Houston Chronicle:
"Spike In Flue Cases Takes 4 Lives."
"Will Texas Have Enough Power?"
"One The Floor Of The Gulf, A Sub On Wheels Will Seek Evidence Of Continent's Earliest Humans."
"Sex Abuse Reported At Second Youth Jail."
"Storm Have Alabama Students No Time To Turn."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Dangerous Tornados-Alabama; Dangerous Tornados-Analysis; Walter Reed Hospital; Nicholson-Congressional Hearings; Taliban Leader Captured; McCain's Presidential Announcement; Bush Visits-New Orleans; Post Katrina Justice; Fender Benders; Arthur Schlesinger Jr. Obit; Substance Abuse-High Schools; Peru 20 Second Late; Ball Player's Story.
CBS: AL Tornadoes; Al Tornadoes-Analysis; Upper Midwest Snows; Walter Reed Firing; Stock Markets; McCain Announcement; Urban Developer; Homeland Security Waste; Schlesinger Obit; Fiddle Maker.
NBC: Dangerous Tornados-Alabama; Dangerous Tornados-Analysis; Dangerous Weather; Walter Reed Hospital; McCain's Presidential Announcement; Bush Visits-New Orleans; Combat Doctors; Terrorism Charges Australian; USS John F. Kennedy-Decommissioning; Arthur Schlesinger Jr. Obit; Teenage Driving.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: GA, AL, MO-Tornadoes; US Plains And Upper Midwest-Blizzards; Walter Reed-General Fired; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Sunni Group Known As Islamic State Of Iraq-Kidnappings; San Francisco-Earthquake; AP-Paris Hilton News Blackout; USS JFK.
CBS: GA, AL, MO-Tornadoes; US Plains And Upper Midwest-Blizzards; Bush-Gulf Coast; Katrina Levies-Lawsuit; Anna Nicole Smith's Burial; Walter Reed-General Fired; Obama-Hospital Inspection Bill; State Department Report-International Drug Trade; GA-Teenage Girl Bank Robbers.
NPR: GA, AL, MO-Tornadoes; US Plains And Upper Midwest-Blizzards; Chinese Government Officials Expelled In Shanghai Pension Fund Scandal; Senegal Presidential Election; Wall Street; Walter Reed-General Fired; GA-Tax Break For Delta Airlines.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Visits Silver St. Elementary School, New Albany, Ind., open press; speaks on No Child Left Behind reauthorization, Silver St. Elementary School, New Albany, Ind., pool coverage; meets with students from The McConnell Center, Seelbach Hilton Louisville, Louisville, Ky., closed press; speaks at the McConnell for Senate and National Republican Senatorial Committee reception, Louisville, Ky., pool for cameras; open for correspondents.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Legislative Branch. Hearing on FY08 appropriations for the Architect of the Capitol. Acting Architect of the Capitol Stephen Ayers. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

US House: 9:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Interior, Environment and Related Agencies Subcommittee. hearing on FY08 budget for the Agency for Toxic Substance and Disease Registry, Chemical Safety Board, National Institute on Environmental Health Sciences. Location: Room B-308, Rayburn.

Other: SOUTH KOREAN FOREIGN MINISTER SONG MIN-SOON _ Highlights: 12:30 p.m. Speaks to the Center for Strategic and International Studies on the U.S.-South Korean alliance. Pavilion Room, Reagan Trade Building. Event contact: Andrew Schwartz, 202-775-3242. RSVP to 202-464-1987. Seating on first-come, first-serve basis. 2:30 p.m. Meets with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, State Dept.

AGRICULTURE _ The U.S. Department of Agriculture hosts its 83rd annual Agricultural Outlook Forum, ``Agriculture at the Crossroads: Energy, Farm and Rural Policy." Location: Marriott-Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington, Va.

CONSERVATIVES _ The Conservative Political Action Caucus holds its annual conference. Highlights: 7:30 a.m.

DOJ_NMG_0139165

Ronald Reagan Banquet, with speaker Rep. Mike Pence 8:30 a.m. Rep. Duncan Hunter. 9 a.m. Sen. James Inhofe, ranking member of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, gives presentation on global warming. 9 a.m. Black Republicans Awards ceremony with HUD Secretary Jackson. 10 a.m. Gov. Mike Huckabee. 12 p.m. Rudy Giuliani. 1 p.m. Rep. Tom Tancredo. 1:30 p.m. Sen. Sam Brownback. 2:45 p.m. Gov. Mitt Romney. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

HIV TESTING _ 8:30 a.m. The AIDS Institute holds a briefing on HIV testing in the U.S., with Rep. Maxine Waters, Bernard Branson of the CDC, others. Location: Room B-339, Capitol.

PENTAGON-IRAQ BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. Army Brig. Gen. Joseph Anderson, chief of staff for the Multinational Corps-Iraq, briefs live from Iraq. Location: DoD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

HOUSING-BUDGET _ 9 a.m. - 11 a.m. The National Housing Conference presents the FY'2008 Budget Forum Networking Breakfast sponsored by Fannie Mae. Topics and Speakers include: The Bigger Picture: Whats the Budget Outlook for FY 2008?, with Martha Coven; Senior Legislative Associate, Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. Priorities and Highlights of the FY 2008 HUD Budget Section 8 and Public Housing, with John Bohm, Department Head, Legislative Programs & Media, National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials (NAHRO); The Housing Finance System (GSEs, Federal Home Loan Banks and FHA), with Cheryl Patton Malloy, Senior Vice President of Multifamily and Governance, Mortgage Bankers Association (MBA); and Tax Issues, Robert M. Rozen, Partner, Washington Council, Ernst & Young LLP. Location: Room 325, Russell Senate Office Building.

MEDIA-CAMPAIGNS _ 9:30 a.m. George Washington University holds a program on the evolving role of media in political campaigns, with Chris Cillizza, politics writer, washingtonpost.com; Carol Darr, director, GWs Institute for Politics, Democracy, & The Internet; Chuck DeFeo, general manager, Townhall.com; Mo Elleithee, senior spokesperson, Hillary Clinton for President Exploratory Committee. Location: Room 1888, Russell.

SCOTUS-FREE SPEECH _ 10 a.m. ACLU holds a telephone briefing with Joseph Frederick, who will discuss his challenge to a 2002 high school suspension for displaying a sign saying ``Bong Hits 4 Jesis'' at an off-campus event. The case is to be heard March 19 by the Supreme Court. Contacts: Emily Whitfield, 212-549-2566. Notes: Callin Number: 888-423-3281.

STARRETT CITY _ 11 a.m. HUD Secretary Jackson holds a news conference with New York City officials about Starrett City. Location: 10th floor conference room, HUD, 451 7th St. SW.

BIOETHICS _ 12 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a program, ``Beyond Bioethics: A Proposal for Modernizing the Regbulation of Human Biotechnologies'' with Frances Fukuyama and Franco Furger, both of SAIS. Location: Room B-339, Rayburn.

CLEAN DIESEL _ 12 p.m. EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson holds a telephone news conference to make a clean diesel announcement. Contacts: Jennifer Wood, 202-564-4355. Notes: Callin number: 800-811-6040; passcode: 1400966.

COLOMBIA _ 12 p.m. The Institute for International Economics holds a luncheon meeting with Colombian Trade Minister Luis Guillermo Plata, focusing on free trade agreement between the U.S. and Colombia. Location: 1750 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAN _ 12:30 p.m. The Center for American Progress holds a panel discussion on containing and engaging Iran, with Geoffrey Kemp of the Nixon Center, Jacqueline Shire of the Institute for Science and International Security, and Karim Sadjadpour of the International Crisis Group. Location: 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

DNA TESTING-ANTHROPOLOGY _ 2 p.m. The National Press Club hosts a discussion on ``Sequencing Human History: The Genetics and Commerce of Personal Ancestry.'' Participants: Kathy Hudson, director, Genetics and Public Policy Center; Spencer Wells, director, Genographic Project, National Geographic; Aravinda Chakravarti, Institute of Genetic Medicine, Johns Hopkins University; Gina M. Paige, president, African Ancetry, Inc.; and Sandra Soo-Jin Lee, senior research scholar, Stanford Center for Biomedical Ethics. Location: National Press Club.

NATIONAL SERVICE-KATRINA _ 2 p.m. National Service Caucus briefing on national and community service programs, focusing on budget proposals and the role that national service has played in Hurricane Katrina recovery and rebuilding. Location: Room 2105, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0139166

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Australian Detainee Is First Charged Under New Military Tribunal System ... 3

Homeland Response:

Bush Acknowledges Slow Pace Of Katrina Recovery ... 3
US Said To Be "Ill-Prepared" To Handle Nuclear Attack ... 4
Civil Air Patrol Providing Reconnaissance In War Against Terrorism ... 5
Chertoff Announces Real ID Rules, Delays Deadline For Compliance ... 5
Lawmakers Unveil List Of Questionable Homeland Security Spending Items ... 6
DHS Official To Research Solutions For Departmental Morale Problems ... 6
NYTimes Lauds Bloomberg For Joining "Ground Zero Disease" Fight ... 6

War News:

Divided Democrats Abandon Plans To Derail "Surge." ... 6
Security Crackdown Appears To Be Reducing Baghdad Violence ... 8
US Official To Visit Syria For Talks On Iraqi Refugees ... 9
Sprawling US Embassy In Baghdad Hampering Reconstruction Efforts ... 9
Turkey Late In Wishing Talabani Well ... 9
Pakistan Arrests Senior Taliban Leader ... 9
Panel Says Wars Hindering National Guard's Domestic Role ... 10
Friedman Urges "Moral Surge" To "Delegitimize" Suicide Bombers ... 10

DOJ:

Domenici, Wilson Said To Have Pressured US Attorney To Indict Democrat ... 10
Ashcroft Cancels Plans For Pizza Party With Former DOJ Colleagues ... 12

Corporate Scandals:

Gonzales Cites "Protecting Integrity Of Business" As Top DOJ Priority ... 13
US Charges 13 In Insider Trading Probe ... 13
Judge Tosses SEC Suit Against Former Citigroup Officials ... 15
Former Omnicom Official May Help In Securities Fraud Suit ... 15
Nortel Will Again Restate Financial Results ... 15
Ferris Baker Officials Leave Amid Trading Probe ... 16
Frank Unveils Legislation On CEO Pay ... 16

Criminal Law:

Judge Says Libby Verdict Unlikely This Week ... 16
Draft Report Finds Problems With Execution Appeals Process ... 16
Federal Officials Aid Kentucky Authorities In Child Predator Crackdown ... 17
US Charges Man Accused In Missouri Kidnapping With Child Pornography ... 17
Son Of "Disgraced Political Boss" Sentenced For Bank Robbery ... 17
US Indicts Former Developer Of Wisconsin Casino ... 18
Maryland Police Arrest 11 Youths In Gang Stabbings ... 18
Murder Trial Of Convicted Florida Sex Offender Opens ... 18
FBI Agent's Testimony Links Gang To Slaying Of Toddler ... 19
Baltimore Man Charged With Running Ponzi Scheme ... 19
New Jersey "Christmas Tree Grants" Probed ... 19
Alleged DC Madam Threatens To Sell Client List ... 20
California Judge Sentences Man To Life For Murder Of Racing Icon, Wife ... 20

Civil Rights:

Louisiana Officials Awaiting Word On FBI Cold Case Probes ... 20
Navy Chaplain Dismissed Over Christian Prayers ... 21
Columnist Lauds DOJ's Religious Freedom Initiative ... 21

Antitrust:

EU Threatens New Sanctions Against Microsoft ... 21
EU Extends Probe Of Sony BMG ... 22
Motorola Stock Lifted By Icahn Move ... 22
China Eyes Legal Reforms To Handle Economic Demands ... 23
WSJ Decries "Power Plays" In Endesa Takeover ... 23
Antitrust Law Gets Little Attention In Congressional XM-Sirius Hearing ... 24
FTC OKs Carlyle's Purchase Of Philosophy Inc ... 24
FTC Clears Private Equity Firm's Purchase Of Mirant Power Plants ... 24
FCC Grants Internet Phone Access To Cable Firms ... 25
Oracle To Purchase Hyperion Solutions In $3.3 Billion Deal ... 25
Australian Antitrust Authorities Clear Qantas Buyout ... 26

Environment:

Maryland To Probe Montgomery County Dumping ... 26
Ignatius Highlights Systems' Vulnerability To Climate Change ... 26

WSJournal Calls For Killing Federal Programs To Save Energy 27

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Breaks Up Mississippi-To-Chicago Gun Connection..... 27
DOJ Probe Finds Misspending Of Marshals Funds 28
Man In Minnesota Explosives Probe Left Homeless, Says Attorney..... 29
FBI To Launch Northern Virginia Anti-Gang Task Force..... 29
FBI's "Best Undercover Agent" Profiled..... 30
Four Men From Chicago Suburbs Charged In Drug-Trafficking Probe 30
Law Enforcement Taking Lead In Sports Doping Probes 30
Murder Of Medical Marijuana Provider Highlights Risks Of Even Legal Sales 31
US Global Survey Scrutinizes Counter-Narcotics Efforts..... 31
Federal Officials Baffled By Mail Bomb Suspect 32
Alabama Man Accepts Plea Bargain In Bomb Case 32

Immigration:

Kennedy Denies Taking "Secretive" Approach To Immigration Bill 32

Tax:

SEC Probing Google's Tax Accounting Methods..... 33

Congress-Administration:

Walter Reed Commander Relieved Of Duty..... 33
Rice Names Critic Of US Iraq Policies To Counselor's Post..... 35
Defying Veto Threat, House Democrats Pass Union Bill..... 35
Bush's Pick To Head Consumer Product Safety Commission Riles Critics 35
Ambassadorial Nomination May Be Blocked Over Swift Boat Vets Donation 36
Bill Would Ease Release Of Presidential Papers 36
Hoyer Bill Would Reduce Health-Care Premium Costs For Federal Employees..... 36
Cheney Fires Up Activists With Speech At Conservative Conference 36
Despite Low Poll Ratings, Bush Remains Fundraising Heavyweight For GOP..... 37
Krauthammer Defends Funding Manned Space Exploration..... 37

Other News:

Stocks Lower, But Markets Appear To Steady..... 37
Poll Finds Majority Favors Guarantee Of Health Insurance 38
McCain Pledges To Accept Public Funds For General Election . 39
FEC Gives Obama Leeway To Accept Public Financing 40
Clintons, Obama To Appear At Selma Commemoration On Sunday..... 40
Obama Ancestors Said To Have Owned Slaves..... 41
Romney Hits McCain On Immigration, Giuliani On Guns, Abortion, Gay Rights..... 41
Giuliani Apparently On Way To Victory In South Carolina Straw Poll 41
Democratic Candidates Accused Of School Choice Hypocrisy .. 41
Early Start To Campaign Could Give Gingrich, Gore An Opening42
Washington State Senate Urged To Call For Bush Impeachment42
Doubts Raised About Accuracy Of US Intelligence On Iran, North Korea..... 42
Diplomats Report Progress On Iran Sanctions..... 43
Jordanian King To Address US Congress..... 43
State Department Report Accuses Venezuela Of Drug Trafficking 43
Mexican Ambassador Praises Upcoming Bush Visit..... 44
US Wants Missile Radar In Caucasus..... 44
Ukrainian Opposition Leader Calls For Early Elections..... 44
Negroponte Begins Tour Of Asia..... 44
US Says China Expanding Nuclear Sub Fleet 44
US May Seek Limit On Chinese Paper Imports 44
US, Brazil Negotiating Ethanol Partnership..... 44
African Peacekeeping Force Arrives In Somalia 45
US Stirs Debate Over Home Of Africa Development Bank..... 45
Discouragement Of Multiple Sex Partners May Slow Spread Of AIDS In Africa 45
WSJ Criticizes UN Official On Women's Rights 45

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 45

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 46

DOJ_NMG_0139169

TERRORISM NEWS:

Australian Detainee Is First Charged Under New Military Tribunal System. NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 9, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The US military today filed terrorism charges against an Australian man who is being held at the Guantanamo Bay Prison without charges for five years." David Hicks "was charged with providing material support for terrorism and could face life in imprisonment if convicted. He's the only Australian held at Gitmo and the first detainee to be charged under the new military tribunal system."

The Washington Post (3/2, A3, White, 690K) says Hicks, "in U.S. custody for more than five years, will face two counts of providing material support for terrorism." The filing of charges could "prompt Hicks's attorneys to initiate a legal challenge" of the Military Commissions Act of 2006. McClatchy (3/2, Rosenberg) says that under that law, Hicks "must be arraigned within 30 days. His trial must be within 90 days after that, meaning his case will go before a military commission by July. It would be the first U.S. war-crimes trial since World War II."

The AP (3/2, Flaherty) reports, "Hicks is a former kangaroo skinner captured in Afghanistan in December 2001. He has been held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for more than five years without trial." The AP adds, "According to government officials and documents, the Defense Department will announce that Hicks is being charged with 'providing material support for terrorism.' Hicks would be have a trial in a special military tribunal, established in a law that Congress passed last year, rather than a civilian court. Opponents have vowed to challenge the constitutionality of the military tribunal proceedings. … An earlier formulation of such military tribunals was declared unconstitutional last year by the Supreme Court." The AP notes, "Hicks' legal status has been a sore spot for Australia. Last month, nearly half the members of Australia's Parliament signed a letter to the U.S. Congress appealing for help repatriating him. … The topic was also discussed this month in a meeting between Vice President Dick Cheney and Australian Prime Minister John Howard. Under growing public pressure, and with elections due later this year, Howard has begun pushing U.S. officials to deal with Hicks' case more quickly."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Acknowledges Slow Pace Of Katrina Recovery. President Bush visited Biloxi, MS, and New Orleans to survey the area devastated by Hurricane Katrina. Much of the coverage focuses on his acknowledgement of the frustration of many residents. ABC and NBC noted the story in their evening broadcasts. ABC World News (3/1, story 7, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) said it was Bush's "first visit in six months to the region," and reported the President "acknowledged that people in the hurricane zone are angered by the slow pace of recovery. And he promised to speed up government efforts."

NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 6, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The President began his tour in Mississippi, driving through the still total devastation to see homes being rebuilt with Federal money. He then traveled to New Orleans, meeting over a meal with Mayor Ray Nagin and other officials there." NBC also said the President "acknowledged the frustration for the people of the region and promised to help speed up recovery efforts."

The AP (3/2, Feller) also reports Bush "acknowledged the deep frustration of Hurricane Katrina victims and said the federal government shares the blame for the slow recovery of the Gulf Coast." He "gave residents of the battered region a message: 'The federal government still knows you exist.'" In stops "across coastal Mississippi and Louisiana," Bush "defended the federal allotment of $110 billion in relief aid. Of that total, less than half has been spent." Said Bush, "If it is stuck because of unnecessary bureaucracy, our responsibility at the federal, state and local level is to unstick it." The AP adds the President "sought to fight the perception that those whose lives were devastated by the August 2005 storm had fallen off his agenda." The Administration's "initial response to the most destructive natural disaster in US history," says the AP, "was widely seen as a failure." Moreover, "the president is still dogged by criticism. Democratic lawmakers are pushing for more action."

The New York Times (3/2, Pear, 1.16M) notes that in New Orleans, Bush "had lunch with state and local officials at Li'l Dizzy's Café on the outskirts of the French Quarter. In brief remarks before the meal, Mr. Bush noted concerns about the rebuilding delays." But "at a meeting with local officials in Biloxi, he said: 'I fully understand that there's still work to be done. There's a continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times.'" The Times adds, "Some elected officials saw Mr. Bush's trip as an effort to make amends for the fact that he said nothing about the recovery in his State of the Union address on Jan. 23."

But the Washington Post (3/2, Fletcher, 690K) reports that "in a trip designed to highlight the progress made in the 18 months since the hurricane devastated New Orleans and the Mississippi coast," Bush also "insisted that 'people's lives are improving and there is hope.'" The Post adds, "In Washington, House Democrats renewed their own criticism of the administration. They promised to move legislation -- which has not been endorsed by Bush -- to forgive some federal loans to disaster-wracked communities while easing matching fund requirements tied to some federal aid." Bush's trip "was a continuation of his attempts to undo the political damage caused by the storm, which proved to be a pivotal event in his presidency. The federal government's bungled response to the disaster undermined the administration's claim to competence and helped propel Bush's approval ratings downward."

DOJ_NMG_0139170

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Reynolds, 850K) says "Administration officials" said the criticism from Democrats yesterday "was misdirected. 'I think there's been lots of progress over the last 18 months,' said Don Powell, the administration's Gulf Coast recovery coordinator. 'Children are in school. "Help wanted" signs are up. The port is 100% back. Restaurants are open.' He added: 'Is there more to be done? Absolutely.'"

The New Orleans Time-Picayune (3/2, Ritea) reports Bush also "took time to herald the city's innovative approach to reforming its long-failing public school system, particularly with its use of charters, public schools subject to state standards and oversight, but governed by individual boards that are given the freedom to take innovate approaches to education." Said Bush, "Charter schools, to me, say innovation, individuality." Even though Hurricane Katrina "did terrible devastation...it gave a great chance for renewal. And one of the areas where renewal is most evident is in the school system of New Orleans." Bush, however, "did not announce any plans to waive a state and local match currently required for federal aid, despite a prediction from several Louisiana officials that he would." The AP (3/2, Bohrer) also covers Bush's comments about charter schools, and notes "critics, including teachers' union leaders, believe charters are not the way to go, saying the charter model is unproven for providing solid academic results and has created a two-tier public education system here."

The Biloxi Sun Herald (3/2, Wilemon, 45K) reports it was the President's "14th visit to the Coast since the hurricane." Biloxi Mayor A.J. Holloway "gave Bush a gag gift of appreciation: a personalized car tag that read 'Bush 43.' 'You've been to the Katrina zone 14 times in 18 months,' Holloway said. 'It's not that we don't like seeing you, but you've been here so many times. It's about time you had one of these. Don't leave home without it.'" WLOX-TV Biloxi (3/1, 10:33 pm) noted that Bush "joked that once his Presidency is over and he owns a private car again, he'll put the plate on and head over to Mississippi from his home state of Texas."

Local TV stations from all around the country also covered the President's Gulf Coast visit. Some examples: WAFB-TV Baton Rouge (3/1, 10:06 pm) reports, "Bush is to attend services tomorrow morning at St. Louis Cathedral in New Orleans, observing the 18 month mark since Hurricane Katrina. … He arrived in Louisiana after an earlier stop in Gulf Coast, Mississippi."

WGNO-TV New Orleans (3/1, 6:03 pm) reported, "Before landing in the Crescent City, the President made the rounds in Mississippi. In Long Beach, the President met with state and local leaders. … Louisiana Senator Mary Landrieu today offered her thoughts on President Bush's visit to the Gulf Coast." The station showed Sen. Landrieu saying, "I am grateful for his visit. But it's going to take more than words and more than visits. It's going to take action to get the job done."

WBRZ-TV Baton Rouge (3/1, 10:12 pm) showed the President saying, "I told the people that I would work with the Congress to write a $110 billion check to help the people of Louisiana and Mississippi and that check has been written." This quote was aired by a number of other local TV stations in different parts of the country, including WDRB-TV Louisville (3/1, 10:41 pm), WSJV-TV South Bend (3/1, 10:36 pm), and WGHP-TV Greensboro (3/1, 10:34 pm).

New Orleans Justice System Still Struggling. ABC World News (3/1, story 8, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) described New Orleans' justice system as "one of the casualties of Katrina. … It was troubled before the hurricane. And then, the storm destroyed courthouses, washed away records, and drove defense lawyers out of town, never to return. The cumulative effect has been disastrous." ABC (Osunsami) continued, "A study commissioned by the Justice Department says it all: People who wait in jail with no charges. Trials that cannot take place, even for defendants who wish to plead guilty." Pam Metzger runs a law clinic that has "helped free nearly a thousand…defendants who were lost in the system." Prof. Pam Metzger, Tulane University Law School: "Think about trying to write the court and call the court and say, "When am I coming court," and there's no answer because no phone picks up. There's no phones. There were no phones." Osunsami: "That's still the case somewhat to this day?" Metzger nodded.

More Commentary. In an editorial, USA Today (3/2, 11A, 2.27M) says "the president could energize the rebuilding effort simply by putting it back in the national spotlight. Bush inexplicably failed to mention Katrina in his nationally televised State of the Union address last month. His visit Thursday brought a planeload of reporters to the Gulf Coast. Returning with the frequency he did in the first year after the disaster could boost tourism and help recruit more of the volunteers whose work has been essential to the recovery." Bush "will have to do more of what he did Thursday and a lot more in Washington."

US Said To Be "Ill-Prepared" To Handle Nuclear Attack. McClatchy (3/2, Gordon) reports that while the Bush Administration "has warned repeatedly about the threat of a terrorist nuclear attack and spent more than $300 billion to protect the homeland, the government remains ill-prepared to respond to a nuclear catastrophe." McClatchy interviews with "more than 15 radiation and emergency preparedness experts and a review of internal documents" suggest that, "absent a major preparedness push, the U.S. response to a mushroom cloud could be worse than the debacle after Hurricane Katrina, possibly contributing to civil disorder and costing thousands of lives." In a July 2005 draft of a confidential memo to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Pentagon analyst John Brinkerhoff wrote that the US "is unprepared to mitigate the consequences of a nuclear attack. … We were unable to find any group or office with a coherent approach to this very important aspect of homeland security." McClatchy (3/2, Gordon) also says the "number of experts who believe that terrorists could obtain the apparatus for a nuclear bomb is impressive and growing."

DOJ_NMG_0139171

Princeton Scholars Say Nuclear Transfer Should Be Crime Against Humanity. In a Washington Post (3/2, 690K) op-ed, Anne-Marie Slaughter and Thomas Wright of the Princeton Project on National Security write, "Current efforts to close down the nuclear black market have an Achilles' heel -- certain states will not cooperate and will even protect nuclear criminals. For instance, A.Q. Khan, Pakistan's 'father of the bomb,' lives comfortably under house arrest; U.S. officials have not been allowed even to interrogate him. Pakistan's government is too frightened of a domestic backlash to act harshly against a national hero. Globally, of the dozens suspected of involvement in his network, only three have been successfully prosecuted. … Making nuclear transfer a crime against humanity captures the enormity of the offense and would dramatically increase the cost of getting caught."

Civil Air Patrol Providing Reconnaissance In War Against Terrorism. The Washington Times (3/2, Hudson, 88K) reports the Civil Air Patrol, which will celebrate 65 years of operation this week, "is playing a vital role in the war against terrorism. The 56,000-member-strong organization is participating in a growing number of homeland security missions, conducting aerial reconnaissance of military ships and other offshore activity, protecting sensitive and critical infrastructure from terrorist attacks, and assisting the US Border Patrol." Meanwhile, "The volunteers of the Air Force auxiliary in Washington protect the country by acting as the enemy during monthly 'Falcon Virgo' exercises over the nation's capital, where they perform a high-tech game of hide-and-seek with armed Air Force jets."

Chertoff Announces Real ID Rules, Delays Deadline For Compliance. The Washington Times (3/2, Hudson, 88K) reports that in announcing regulations for implementation of the Real ID Act yesterday, DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said that the deadline for compliance with the law would be delayed, "bowing to pressure from federal and state lawmakers who say next year's deadline can't be met." Chertoff said the "standards correct glaring vulnerabilities exploited by some of the September 11 hijackers who used fraudulently obtained driver's licenses to board the airplanes in their attack against America." The deadline for states to begin compliance with the law "will be extended from May 2008 until December 2009, and up to 20 percent of state homeland security grants can be used to implement the program." Sen. Susan Collins "said she is 'grateful that Secretary Chertoff has listened to the concerns of so many state leaders and my colleagues on this important issue.'" Rep. Thomas M. Davis "called the delay reasonable but said the new ID standards remain an urgent national security priority."

The Washington Post and New York Times this morning focus on the cost and privacy concerns associated with the law -- rather than the announcement that the deadline for compliance would be delayed. The Washington Post (3/2, A5, Hsu, 690K) reports implementing the Real ID Act "will cost $23.1 billion over 10 years, require motorists born after 1935 to present birth certificates or passports, and add $28 to the cost of issuing each license, officials said yesterday." The release of "[l]ong-awaited" rules for the program "did not quell criticism from states, privacy advocates and libertarian groups," who said the law "represents an unfunded mandate and creates a national ID-card system that will increase the consequences of identity theft." The Post does not mention until its fifth paragraph that the new rules delayed the deadline for compliance with the law. Meanwhile, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that technology will ease, not increase, privacy threats, and that the federal government will not keep a central database of personal information." The secretary said he thought most would say $20 to "prevent people from getting on airplanes or getting in buildings and killing Americans" was money "well spent."

The New York Times (3/2, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "To help the states get started, Mr. Chertoff offered up to $100 million in federal grants this year, although the money would come from antiterrorism funds already promised to the states. So far, only $40 million in federal aid has been provided for the program." Sen. Susan Collins, "who had advocated delaying the start of the program," said DHS "has finally recognized that it simply was unfair to impose this burden on the states." However, "the plan received largely negative reviews from state officials and civil liberties experts. … The National Governors Association said the federal aid Mr. Chertoff offered, representing about 10 percent of the cost in the first year and an unknown amount in future years, was woefully inadequate."

DOJ_NMG_0139172

Lawmakers Unveil List Of Questionable Homeland Security Spending Items. The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 8, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The government spends billions of our tax dollars every year to keep the country safe. That, of course, means putting on puppet shows and lawn mower races. If that doesn't make sense to you, it also didn't make sense to the congressmen who discovered that is where some of our homeland security money is actually going." CBS (Keteyian) added, "Democratic Congressman Anthony Weiner of New York and Republican Jeff Flake of Arizona revealed a list of federal homeland security projects that put the boon in boondoggle. A series of taxpayer-supported programs that play like a punchline: $7,000 for bullet-proof vests for police and fire department dogs in Ohio. $8,000 for clown and puppet shows performed by fire safety officials in Wisconsin. $33,000 for customized trailers to be used at a mushroom festival. And lawn mower drag races in Texas. $200,000 for -- count them -- seventy security cameras to protect a remote Alaska fishing village, cameras the town admits on its Website, mostly no one watches." Recent reports on CBS have given "rise to those who question a formula set by Congress that requires every state, regardless of risk, get a slice of the Homeland Security pie." Weiner and Flake proposed "a public database that would hold states accountable for how they spend every DHS dollar." The lawmaker's "critique comes as Homeland Security is reviewing applications on how it will allocate nearly $2 billion to cities and states this year."

DHS Official To Research Solutions For Departmental Morale Problems. The Washington Post's (3/2, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that Paul A. Schneider, "joined the Department of Homeland Security as undersecretary for management two months ago," and House Homeland Security Committee's "subcommittee on management, investigations and oversight," members "expressed concern about morale of employees at Homeland Security, noting that the department got rock-bottom scores in important job-satisfaction, leadership and management areas in a survey conducted by the Office of Personnel Management. Schneider said the department plans to launch focus groups in the next 60 days to explore workforce issues and find solutions."

NYTimes Lauds Bloomberg For Joining "Ground Zero Disease" Fight. The New York Times (3/2, 1.16M) editorializes, "Mayor Michael Bloomberg has finally joined the urgent campaign to get Washington to care for the responders who helped New Yorkers after the Sept. 11 attacks. Many responders -- and people who studied, lived or worked around the World Trade Center -- are seriously ill, and Mr. Bloomberg can play an important role in making the federal government take responsibility for them." Bloomberg "was once skeptical about what is being called ground zero disease. But he is now campaigning to get Washington to pay $150 million a year for three health centers that already treat police officers, firefighters and others made sick by the attacks. The money is badly needed to improve care in these underfinanced, overworked centers."

WAR NEWS:

Divided Democrats Abandon Plans To Derail "Surge." The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "The Iraq war is proving a humbling experience not just for President Bush, but also for those in Congress who want to end it. Plagued by internal divisions, House Democrats have largely abandoned efforts to cap the increase in US troop levels for Iraq and will focus instead on highlighting the war's strain on the military and competing US interests in Afghanistan." The House Appropriations Committee "may add as much as $1 billion to Mr. Bush's request to beef up US operations in Afghanistan and shift additional funds to rural-development programs. More than $2 billion would be set aside to improve the readiness of strategic military reserves in the US, and provisions would be added to curb the frequent practice of stretching personnel in Iraq by extending combat tours for units already deployed." But "the White House is given discretion to bypass any such restrictions that it finds burdensome, and President Bush will have a relatively free hand to add the more than 21,500 soldiers and Marines he wants by the end of May."

In a similar report, the Christian Science Monitor (3/2, Chaddock, 59K) says that despite their "big antiwar mandate, Democrats are scrambling to find a way forward." Democrats have "balked at a proposal by Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, who chairs the Defense subcommittee on that panel, to use the war-funding request to rein in Bush's options as commander in chief. … After a fractious caucus meeting on Tuesday, House leaders backed off the Murtha proposal, but opened new rifts with liberals in their caucus who favor stronger moves to get US forces out of Iraq." Murtha, adds the Monitor, "has emerged as a lightening rod in an intense intraparty debate over how to end US involvement in Iraq. On the one hand, the 44-member Blue Dog Coalition, which is made up of fiscal conservatives, opposes moves that would either deprive US troops of funding they need or appear to micromanage the war."

Meanwhile, the AP (3/2, Flaherty) reports, "House Democratic leaders have coalesced around legislation that would require troops to come home from Iraq within six months if that country's leaders fail to meet promises to help reduce violence there, party officials said Thursday." The plan "would retain a Democratic proposal prohibiting the deployment to Iraq of troops with insufficient rest or training or who already have served there for more than a year. Under the plan, such troops could only be sent to Iraq if President Bush waives those standards and reports to Congress each time." The AP adds, "The proposal is the latest attempt by Democrats to resolve deep divisions within the party on how far to go to scale back US involvement in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0139173

As Democratic attempts to find a consensus position on the war continue, says the Washington Post (3/2, A4, Layton, 690K), "House Democrats wrangle over details of a $100 billion war spending bill -- including whether restrictions should be placed on troops sent to Iraq." Some "want to add significant money for agricultural relief, Hurricane Katrina reconstruction and other nonmilitary projects." Rep. Collin C. Peterson, "who chairs the Agriculture Committee, said yesterday that rural states hit hard by floods, droughts and snowstorms in the past two years need $4 billion in emergency farm relief. And attaching the request to the war bill is the best way to insure they get it, he said." The Post adds, "As of yesterday, Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), who chairs the House Appropriations Committee, had agreed to add about $3 billion to the war bill to help close military bases and relocate troops as part of the Base Realignment and Closure process. And he approved an additional $750 million for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a joint federal and state program that provides health care for six million poor children."

Meanwhile the Wall Street Journal (3/2, A4, Harwood, 2.04M), in its "Washington Wire" column, describes Democrats as "divided over how to confront Bush on Iraq troops levels," and reports they intend to change their focus to an "issue with broader appeal: accountability for billions in federal spending on Katrina and other issues they contend are rife with mismanagement and abuse. A House Republican Leadership aide argues that such initiatives mask Democrats' desires for higher spending: 'Republicans are trying to turn off the faucet on the front end, whereas Democrats keep looking for a bigger hose.'"

The New York Times (3/2, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports on the debate in the Senate, where "Democrats tried Thursday to bridge their political differences over how to confront…Bush on Iraq even as they acknowledged that agreement on an approach remained out of reach." The Democrats "face the challenge of coming up with "a plan that would satisfy antiwar lawmakers, keep the party's centrists on board and win over some Republicans." Yesterday, they "were somewhat defensive about their internal divisions, which have left them open to criticism that unlike the House of Representatives, they have yet to weigh in with a strong vote on the war even though public dissatisfaction with it contributed to their election gains in November." The Times adds, "Even as the Democrats searched for a policy solution, the political sensitivity over trying to restrict war spending was brought into sharp focus on Thursday." Sen. Kent Conrad, "Democrat of North Dakota and chairman of the Budget Committee, raised the idea of cutting $20 billion from the president's $145 billion request for next year for Iraq and Afghanistan." But "he quickly dropped that idea after fellow Democrats insisted on keeping the president's number in the nonbinding budget framework that is the first step toward bills financing all of the government's programs, not just the war."

Illustrating the Democratic split, Sen. Russ Feingold – usually identified with the most liberal wing of the caucus -- said on MSNBC (3/1, O'Donnell), "The best way to do it is to repeal the authority from 2002. And I've seen some drafts of this that would do exactly that. So that's very positive, and I think that's a good effort. There are other parts of it that have to be done right. If you sort of create a new mission or a new Iraq war that's more limited, I think that's unwise. Why should we do that? … It depends exactly whether we're creating something that really moves us out of Iraq or whether we're going to have loopholes that the Administration will exploit."

Republicans, meanwhile, appear to be coming together against any Democratic attempts to derail Bush's war strategy. The Washington Times (3/2, Miller, 88K) reports, "Republicans in Congress -- including most who have defected from…Bush's plan to send reinforcements to Iraq -- have closed ranks and are prepared to thwart the Democrats' continued efforts to undermine the war strategy. Most of the 17 House Republicans who voted for a resolution against the troop-surge plan -- which was about half the number predicted by Democrats -- now oppose moves to cut war funding or attach conditions to appropriations bills that would hamstring the war effort." And "all but one of the seven Senate Republicans that backed the anti-surge resolution in their chamber say they will not support any funding cuts. The one other dissident Republican -- Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska -- declined to comment on the issue."

Panetta Criticizes Democratic Proposals. The Washington Times (3/2, Lambro, 88K) reports, "A senior Democratic adviser said yesterday he is disappointed and dismayed by the efforts of House and Senate Democrats to change administration policies in Iraq, predicting they would lead to further division and stalemate in Congress on the war. 'If you stand back, the whole debate has been pretty frustrating. The bigger problem is that [Democratic leaders'] proposals are not going anywhere, such as some revised authority for the war,' said Leon Panetta, a key Democratic member of the Iraq Study Group whose proposals to stabilize Iraq were largely dismissed by…Bush." Panetta added that the Democrats' "efforts are doomed. Either they are going to be blocked in Congress or vetoed by the president, or both. The end result is that it will make us more divided and impotent on war policy." Panetta's "blunt complaints about how his party has bungled the war debate underscores a partywide discomfort among many Democrats that their leaders have failed to craft a politically viable compromise that can draw some bipartisan support."

DOJ_NMG_0139174

Cheney Says Iraq Pullout Would Allow Victorious Al Qaeda Fighters To Flock Into Afghanistan. The Washington Post (3/2, Raum, 690K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney said Thursday night that a too-soon withdrawal of US forces from Iraq could send victorious militants spreading out, with some flocking to Afghanistan to fight alongside a regrouping Taliban." He "demanded that the Democratic-controlled Congress support President Bush's military buildup 'on time and in full.'" The Post adds, "Speaking before a receptive audience of conservatives, the vice president -- just back from a trip that included unannounced stops in Afghanistan and Pakistan -- sharply criticized efforts by some Democrats to restrict funds for additional troops or to place restrictions on their deployment." Said Cheney, "I sincerely hope the discussion this time will be about winning in Iraq, not about posturing on Capitol Hill. Anyone can say they support the troops, and we should take them at their word. But the proof will come when it's time to provide the money and the support. … We expect the House and the Senate to meet those needs on time and in full." The Vice President "spoke at an annual dinner of the Conservative Political Action Conference. The audience included conservative activists, leaders and policymakers."

Martinez Says US Public Wants Success In Iraq. RNC Chairman Sen. Mel Martinez said on MSNBC (3/1, O'Donnell), "I believe the American people want to see us succeed in Iraq, that they still have hope that, if we have a winning strategy, that it ought to be employed. I think what people have is a frustration with Americans dying in Iraq, a frustration with the Iraqi government not doing some of the things that they're now doing. … If they do the political things to reach a political settlement -- we now have diplomacy in the region taking place -- and we also pacify Baghdad, I believe we're going to some success in the near future. And I think that's going to be a sign that the American people will respond to."

Security Crackdown Appears To Be Reducing Baghdad Violence. USA Today (3/2, 4A, 2.27M) reports, "Baghdad experienced one of its least violent days in months Thursday when there were two reported bombings and one fatality. The relative lull in violence came in the third week of a US-Iraqi plan to improve security in Baghdad." President Bush "has ordered an increase of 17,500 U.S. troops in the capital to conduct house-to-house searches and help disarm sectarian militias." USA Today adds, "A US military report said Monday that the number of roadside bombs was down 20% since the security initiative began in mid-February and sectarian murders were at their lowest levels in a year."

AFP (3/2) reports that "three weeks after the launch of the new US strategy in Iraq, Pentagon officials were cautious Thursday saying early signs were good, but that it was too soon to make concrete conclusions. 'I would say, just looking at the reports from the people on the ground. ... I think their assessment would be, 'It's too early to draw any conclusions,' because this is still in the early stages,' Pentagon number two Gordon England said."

Meanwhile the Los Angeles Times (3/2, Zavis, 850K), under the headline "Iraq's Displaced Trickle Home," reports that "encouraged by a major security clampdown that began Feb. 13, and reassurances from his neighbors," some Iraqi refugees are beginning to "test Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's recent pledge to reverse the tide of sectarian 'cleansing' sweeping Baghdad and move tens of thousands of people back home." However, "even if the government can convince families that their old neighborhoods are safe, there is no guarantee they can regain their homes. Many residences have been looted or torched, others commandeered by gunmen or occupied by families fleeing violence elsewhere."

Official Says "Surge" Will Require As Many As 28,500 Soldiers. USA Today (3/2, 4A, Brook, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush's planned increase of U.S. forces in Iraq will require as many as 28,500 troops, Pentagon officials told a Senate committee Thursday." Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England also "told the Senate Budget Committee that it will be clear within months whether the so-called surge in forces has succeeded in helping secure Iraq. 'By this summer we would have a much better indication in terms of the success of the program,' England said. 'And so at that time we would adjust however is appropriate to do so.'" In January, Bush "said he would send 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq. England said 6,000 to 7,000 support troops will be needed to back up the larger combat force."

Car Bomb Kills Seven In Fallujah. The New York Times (3/2, Rubin, 1.16M) reports, "A car bomb that was apparently aimed at a policeman's wedding party in Falluja, west of Baghdad, killed seven guests on Thursday and wounded six, the local police said." The attack "appeared to be part of a mounting battle in western Iraq between insurgents with ties to Al Qaeda and other local and tribal groups, local residents said." The bomb "exploded in the late afternoon as the wedding party was gathering at the home of the groom, a policeman. Neither the bride nor the groom was wounded, but those killed were friends and relatives of the couple, said Abu Khalid, a cousin of the groom."

50 Insurgents Killed In Western Iraq. The Washington Post (3/2, A9, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Iraqi security forces backed by Sunni tribesmen killed dozens of suspected Sunni insurgents over several hours of fighting Wednesday in a village in western Iraq, Iraqi police officials said Thursday." The fighting "was unusually fierce for an Iraqi-led operation and was also notable because of the collaboration of tribesmen in volatile Anbar province. In recent months, the US military has aligned itself with dozens of tribal sheiks who are collaborating in an effort to drive the Sunni insurgent group Al-Qaeda in Iraq from the vast desert territory."

DOJ_NMG_0139175

US Official To Visit Syria For Talks On Iraqi Refugees. Under the headline "New Signs Of US-Syria Thaw As Senior Official Sets Visit," AFP (3/2, Millikin) reports Washington announced Thursday that it was sending "a high-ranking official to Syria for the first time in two years, a move seen as a fresh sign of a possible thaw between Washington and Damascus." Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey will travel to Damascus "in coming weeks" as part of a regional tour dealing with "humanitarian issues related to Iraqi refugees," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "Seeking to play down the diplomatic significance of the trip," McCormack said Sauerbrey would be "paired" on the tour with a representative of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees and "would be authorized to meet with her Syrian counterparts to discuss the refugee issue."

Professor Urges US To Facilitate Resettlement Of Iraqi Refugees. Aimee Phan, author and professor at Washington State University, writes in a USA Today (3/2, 13A, 2.27M) op-ed, "With the Iraqi refugees count nearing 2 million…and the US government's recent plans to welcome 7,000 refugees for resettlement, a new community of Iraqi-Americans is inevitable. How Americans plan to respond to them and facilitate their resettlement is crucial." Phan noted that "considering the role US foreign policy has had on Iraqis' lives and displacement, it is the government's responsibility to offer them the resources to salvage their community."

Sprawling US Embassy In Baghdad Hampering Reconstruction Efforts. The Washington Post (3/2, A11, Williamson, 690K) reports the US embassy in Baghdad "is one of the largest foreign missions ever operated by the State Department. Its complexity and expense, some say, hampers reconstruction efforts and drains cash from diplomatic efforts worldwide." In addition, the mission's "closely guarded budget is a source of controversy at State, and across the federal government." In addition, the "teeming embassy masks a desperate need for civilians to aid the reconstruction effort," while the State Department "has discussed drafting personnel" for service in Iraq.

Turkey Late In Wishing Talabani Well. The Washington Times (3/2, Birch, 88K) reports, "Messages of good will have been flooding in" since Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was hospitalized in Jordan Sunday. "But a get-well wish from Turkey, one of Iraq's large neighbors, did not come until yesterday." However, the "delayed reaction" from Turkey "is not altogether surprising," but "with Iraq at a critical juncture, analysts fear its reticence limits its effectiveness as a regional power."

Pakistan Arrests Senior Taliban Leader. The Los Angeles Times (3/2, King, Meyer, 850K) reports, "Pakistani authorities have arrested the former defense minister of the Taliban, the most senior insurgent leader to be seized in five years, a government official said Thursday." Pakistan's government "issued no immediate official statement about the detention of Mullah Obaidullah Akhund earlier this week in the southern provincial capital of Quetta." The Times adds, "Local news reports said Akhund was detained Monday, the day Vice President Dick Cheney arrived for an unannounced visit to urge President Pervez Musharraf to take more robust steps against Islamic militants finding safe haven in Pakistan's tribal region near the Afghanistan border."

But the New York Times (3/2, Gall, 1.16M) says "it was not clear whether" the Taliban commander "was picked up before, during or after Mr. Cheney's visit." The timing "may be significant because Mr. Cheney's mission was intended to press Pakistan to do more to crack down on members of the Taliban and Al Qaeda who use Pakistan as a sanctuary. … While Mullah Obaidullah's detention may be a sign of a new commitment by Pakistan to move against the Taliban leadership, the arrest also seemed to confirm Western and Afghan intelligence reports that the Taliban were using Pakistan, and particularly Quetta, to organize their insurgency." A NATO spokesman in Afghanistan, Col. Tom Collins, "said he was not aware of any arrest. American government officials in Washington confirmed the capture, but cautioned that the arrest was unlikely to deal a significant setback to the insurgents."

ABC World News (3/1, story 5, 1:40, Ross, 8.78M) called the arrest "extremely significant. One, he is a man who is very close to the Taliban leader, Mullah Omar, who is close to Osama bin Laden. … And it's believed he may well know the locations of those wanted men."

US-Pakistan "Shotgun Marriage" Seen As Fraught With Danger. Zahid Hussain, who writes from Pakistan for the Wall Street Journal, says this morning (3/2, A11) that "the US-Pakistan partnership that came into being on Sept. 12, 2001 was a shotgun marriage and remains an uneasy alliance. … The outcome of this struggle will affect not only the fate of Pakistan, but also the ideological climate of the Middle East and the security of the world. Gen. Musharraf has provided the US with active support in the hunt for al Qaeda fugitives. His security forces have captured and delivered to the US. several of the most wanted al Qaeda leaders, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Ramzi bin al Shibh, the masterminds of the 9/11 attacks. … There is a huge danger that any new military operation in Waziristan under pressure from Washington will divide the army. Over the last couple years, several midlevel army officers have been court-martialed for refusing to fight in Waziristan. But a policy of appeasement would certainly allow al Qaeda and the Taliban to expand their terrorist base. The militants have already established their rule in the North Waziristan tribal region. The situation is more worrying as their influence spreads elsewhere."

DOJ_NMG_0139176

Bayh Says More US Troops Needed In Afghanistan. In a Thursday morning appearance on Fox News (3/1, Kendall), Sen. Evan Bayh discussed the situation in the Afghanistan-Pakistan border region, saying, "It's a tough situation. It's largely lawless. It has been for centuries. The Pakistani government has tried to some extent to bring that under greater control. They've lost some of their own troops. We're now trying to convince them to do even more. Because it's not good for Pakistan or Afghanistan to have a safe haven where Al Qaeda can operate, the Taliban can operate, they can go back and forth across the border. And we're concerned about a spring offensive in which it will be a very difficult year in Afghanistan. That's why I requested more troops for Afghanistan, because we have a chance to move Afghanistan in a better direction if we do what needs to be done. This year will be a pivotal year."

Panel Says Wars Hindering National Guard's Domestic Role. McClatchy (3/2, Brown) reports, "Stretched thin by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the National Guard is less prepared now than it's ever been to respond to a major terrorist attack, a natural disaster or another domestic crisis, a congressionally appointed panel has found." Because of the wars, the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves found, "88 percent of Army National Guard units and 45 percent of Air National Guard units that aren't deployed overseas have severe equipment shortages. That's reduced the Guard to its lowest readiness level ever and posed an unacceptable risk to Americans, said Arnold J. Punaro, the commission chairman and a retired Marine Corps major general." McClatchy adds, "In a report issued Thursday to Congress, the commission also faulted the Department of Homeland Security for failing to identify the domestic missions the National Guard should be expected to perform and criticized the Defense Department for not equipping the National Guard adequately for those missions."

The AP (3/2, Baldor) reports, "Calling those failures unacceptable," Punaro "said in an interview that federal agencies must get past their turf battles to better protect the public. 'This is unacceptable. The American people would find it unacceptable,' said Punaro, a retired Marine Corps general. 'These are not problems that have just cropped up in the last two years or five years. These are issues that have been pretty much ignored and glossed over for decades.'"

Punaro said on PBS' NewsHour (3/1, Woodruff), "There are no national security missions that we can carry out now or in the future that will not have the Guard and Reserve involved. … They're expected [to be] an operational reserve means that every day a part of that is actually out there, just like the active force, and the part that isn't gone has to be ready to go at a moment's notice. … We're in terrible shape, in terms of equipment availability, particularly for the National Guard. You can have the best-trained troops and the best-led troops, but if you don't have the equipment to do the job, that unit is not going to be as combat-effective as they need to be. Right now…88 percent of the Guard is not combat-ready when it comes to equipment."

The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Tyson, 690K) notes the report also "said prospects for Guard recruiting and retention remain 'highly problematic,' despite successes last year." The panel "is scheduled to issue its final report in January."

Friedman Urges "Moral Surge" To "Delegitimize" Suicide Bombers. The New York Times' (3/2) Thomas Friedman writes that in the wake of recent suicide bombings in Iraq and Afghanistan, "The Bush team is mute. It says nothing, because it has no moral authority. No one would listen. Mr. Bush is losing a P.R. war to people who blow up emergency wards. Europeans are mute, lost in their delusion that this is all George Bush's and Tony Blair's fault. But worst of all, Muslims, the very people whose future is being killed, are also mute." Friedman says that "no [troop] surge can work in Iraq unless we have a 'moral surge,' a counternihilism strategy that delegitimizes suicide bombers."

DOJ:

Domenici, Wilson Said To Have Pressured US Attorney To Indict Democrat. McClatchy (3/2, Taylor) reports, "Sen. Pete Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson of New Mexico pressured the US attorney in their state to speed up indictments in a federal corruption investigation that involved at least one former Democratic state senator, according to two people familiar with the contacts." The "alleged involvement of the two Republican lawmakers raises questions about possible violations of House of Representatives and Senate ethics rules" and "could taint the criminal investigation into the award of an $82 million courthouse contract." McClatchy adds, "The two people with knowledge of the incident said Domenici and Wilson intervened in mid-October, when Wilson was in a competitive re-election campaign that she won by 875 votes out of nearly 211,000 cast." David Iglesias, "who stepped down as US attorney in New Mexico on Wednesday, told McClatchy Newspapers that he believed the Bush administration fired him Dec. 7 because he resisted the pressure to rush an indictment."

DOJ_NMG_0139177

The Albuquerque Tribune (3/2) reports, "Sen. Pete Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson aren't saying whether they contacted then-U.S. Attorney David Iglesias in the weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 elections about the pace of his corruption investigation of New Mexico Democrats." The Tribune continues, "Domenici and Wilson, Albuquerque Republicans, have not returned phone calls from numerous news outlets asking for a response to Iglesias' allegations. … The Justice Department was unaware Iglesias had had conversations with members of Congress until Wednesday, Roehrkasse said. According to Roehrkasse, Iglesias should have reported the contact to department officials. … Roehrkasse would not say whether any member of the New Mexico delegation recommended that Iglesias be dismissed. … But Matt Farrauto, executive director of the New Mexico Democratic Party, on Wednesday called for Wilson to answer questions about Iglesias' dismissal, and whether she played a role in it. … 'It's not much of a leap to believe that Heather Wilson pressured or personally instigated pressure for an indictment,' Farrauto said. 'This should be investigated, and she should be held accountable.'"

House Committee Subpoenas Dismissed US Attorneys. The AP (3/2, Talhelm) reports, "A House committee is compelling four of at least eight U.S. Attorneys ousted from office in recent months to tell their stories under oath, after one prosecutor said he believes he was fired for political reasons." The AP continues, "Democrats on a House Judiciary subcommittee voted 7-0 Thursday to subpoena fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. 'Bud' Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Seattle. No Republican members of the panel attended Thursday's meeting, which lasted less than five minutes." The AP adds, "The lawmakers said they are troubled that the Bush administration may be punishing prosecutors for being too effective at pursuing political corruption cases. … The House subpoenas are the first issued by the new Democratic-controlled Congress. The U.S. Attorneys are scheduled to appear at a Tuesday hearing with other witnesses, including a representative from the Justice Department. … The Senate Judiciary Committee asked the four prosecutors to testify before it the same day."

The Washington Post (3/2, A4, Eggen, Kane) reports, "The moves mark the latest escalation in the battle between congressional Democrats and the Justice Department over the controversial dismissals of eight U.S. attorneys, at least five of whom were presiding over public corruption probes when they were fired. … 'Are these people being removed for doing their job and for it doing it too well?' asked Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Calif.), chairwoman of the panel, who called the subpoenas 'a last resort.'" The Post continues, "The controversy, which has been simmering for two months, boiled over this week after departing prosecutor David C. Iglesias of New Mexico alleged that two unnamed lawmakers had pressured him to speed up the prosecution of Democrats before the November elections. Iglesias said he believed that complaints from the lawmakers may have led to his dismissal, an allegation the Justice Department has disputed. … The state's top two Democrats, Rep. Tom Udall and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, and Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) have denied calling Iglesias. Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) and Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) have not responded to requests for comment over the past two days and deflected questions from the Associated Press about the allegations." The Post notes, "Iglesias's office was conducting a probe into allegations involving construction contracts and a prominent Democratic former state senator. … At the time of the alleged phone calls, Wilson, a close ally of Domenici's, was in a tight reelection battle with then-state Attorney General Patricia Madrid. Wilson won by fewer than 2,000 votes. … Iglesias said yesterday that he will identify the lawmakers only if compelled by a subpoena. … 'I fear retaliation,' said Iglesias, a Republican and former military defense lawyer who served as a model for a character in the movie 'A Few Good Men.' 'This is a small state and there are not too many employment opportunities, and I fear they will blacklist me.'" The Post adds, "Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that the department has been 'very forthcoming' with Congress about the dismissals and that any allegations that prosecutors were removed to interfere with investigations are 'completely wrong.' … Justice officials have said Iglesias and six others were fired for 'performance-related' reasons and have denied that any were targeted to disrupt public corruption probes. Officials have acknowledged that an eighth prosecutor, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, was removed to make way for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove."

The New York Times (3/2, Johnston) reports, "The House panel acted after the prosecutors privately told lawmakers that they would not testify voluntarily, not wanting to get in the middle of what has grown into a serious political embarrassment for the Justice Department, but that they would give testimony if compelled." The Times continues, "In floor speeches and at a hearing last month, Democrats have repeatedly attacked the dismissals as a politically motivated effort to replace independent-minded prosecutors with more pliable operatives of the Bush administration. … Several of the prosecutors had been engaged in politically sensitive cases involving Republicans, for instance Ms. Lam's continuing corruption investigation in the wake of a related guilty plea in 2005 by Representative Randy Cunningham of California." The Times notes, "Others had irritated Republicans in their state. Mr. McKay, for one, had decided against impaneling a grand jury to examine accusations of voter fraud in Washington State's 2004 election for governor, won by a Democrat, Christine Gregoire. … At a hearing last month, Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said most of the dismissals had been related to job performance, an assertion that brought protests from the ranks of the ousted prosecutors. … Several said they had been given no reason for their removal. Most had received favorable job evaluations from the Justice Department in formal performance assessments based on interviews with judges, law enforcement agencies and members of the office staff."

DOJ_NMG_0139178

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Schmitt) reports, "The prosecutors, directed to appear at a hearing Tuesday, were among at least eight who were abruptly removed in recent months by the Justice Department. Officials have said they dismissed the lawyers primarily because of concerns over their performance, as well as policy differences over whether they were pursuing department priorities such as cases of immigration fraud and child exploitation. … But the lawyers — all appointees of President Bush — have not gone quietly. They are publicly disputing the characterization the department has offered for their departures. … The result has been a political embarrassment for the White House and the Justice Department, and an odd spectacle of Democrats giving aid and comfort to Republican appointees." The Times adds, "The vote to issue the subpoenas illustrated a partisan divide: Republicans boycotted the proceeding; the seven Democrats present unanimously endorsed the move. … 'The former U.S. attorneys are alleging very serious charges against the administration, and we need to hear from them,' said Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. 'We want to hear their stories, and we want the administration to address the charges head-on.'"

Bloomberg (3/2, Schmidt, Rowley) reports, "Senator Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, said yesterday that Iglesias and other prosecutors were eager to testify. … 'We have inquired of the fired U.S. attorneys,' he said in remarks on the Senate floor. 'The overwhelming majority of them want to tell more but feel honor-bound not to do it, except if they were brought under the power of a subpoena.'" Bloomberg adds, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the agency has never removed a U.S. attorney in an effort to influence an investigation. On the Iglesias firing, Roehrkasse said the prosecutor served for more than five years and 'we made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns.'"

Nevada US Attorney Leaves Office With No Word On Successor. The Las Vegas Sun (3/2, Skolnik) reports, "U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden's last day in office came and went Wednesday with no word from the Justice Department about who will replace him." The Sun continues, "Even though Bogden was told by a department official soon after he was fired from the job that his office would be given the name of a replacement by the time he left office - Wednesday at midnight - no one had called, at least as of 6 p.m. … 'I've been sitting here, waiting for the call,' said Bogden, the well-regarded Bush appointee who said he has spent the bulk of his last day packing up his office. 'It would have been nice to have gotten some notice by now,' he said during a late afternoon interview." The Sun adds, "According to Bogden, federal statutes dictate that First Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Myhre would take over this morning as acting U.S. attorney, pending further word from Washington. … Bogden had received positive notices and work reviews by his Justice Department bosses - as had all but one of the six other fired U.S. attorneys, according to media reports - begging the question as to why the prosecutors were fired. Justice Department officials said it was because of poor job performance, a notion vehemently rejected by the U.S. attorneys and their supporters."

The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/2, Packer) reports, "Two high-ranking Department of Justice officials told outgoing U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden in December that his dismissal was unrelated to his job performance, and one of the officials indicated his firing was politically motivated, Bogden said Thursday. … 'I was given an explanation that seemed to me to be political in nature, that had nothing to do with any issues with my performance or issues with the performance of my office,' Bogden said. … He declined to elaborate on the discussion." The Review-Journal adds, "Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, called Bogden on Dec. 7 and asked him to step down from the post he had held since 2001. Battle could not provide an explanation, Bogden said, prompting him to call other officials within the Justice Department. … 'I said you have to give me something more; you can't just throw this bomb into my life,' Bogden said. … Bogden placed a call to an upper-level official at the Justice Department. He said he sensed from that conversation that his dismissal was politically motivated. During a second call to another official, his questions were more direct. … 'I said, "Look, did this decision have anything to do with my job performance or the performance of my office?"' Bogden said, relaying a conversation with an official he declined to name. The official responded: 'That did not enter into the equation.' … Bogden acknowledged he will have to divulge the officials' names if he is subpoenaed to testify before a congressional committee. … Bogden was not among four of the prosecutors a House subcommittee voted Thursday to subpoena to testify next week. The House Judiciary subcommittee said all four agreed to appear, and the Justice Department said it would dispatch a top official to the hearing."

Ashcroft Cancels Plans For Pizza Party With Former DOJ Colleagues. U.S. News and World Report (3/2, Ragavan) reports, "Former Attorney General turned lobbyist John Ashcroft canceled the pizza party he was scheduled to host yesterday for the political appointees from his days heading the Justice Department." US News continues, "The cancellation came after usnews.com reported that the department's ethics office had flagged the party as potentially troublesome in terms of appearance." USA News adds, "In an E-mail sent to the invitees, which Ashcroft's senior adviser, Juleanna Glover Weiss, provided to U.S News, Ashcroft said that he did not realize that 'our sharing of a pizza and soft drinks might erode the high levels of integrity we worked so diligently to engender' when he was attorney general. Ashcroft added that he did not 'believe for a second' that the invitees' integrity 'could be compromised for a piece of pizza.' But he said that 'no fellowship over lunch' was 'worth the sacrifice of any public confidence in the justice community.' Instead, 'Going back to my traditional brown bag lunch,' wrote Ashcroft, 'will not be too much of a challenge for me.'"

DOJ_NMG_0139179

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Gonzales Cites "Protecting Integrity Of Business" As Top DOJ Priority. The San Diego Daily Transcript via Yahoo! News (3/2) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales touted the Department of Justice's commitment to combating corporate fraud and public corruption in a speech Thursday in San Diego." The Transcript continues, "Gonzales, making his first appearance here since becoming attorney general two years ago, addressed the American Bar Associations' national institute on white-collar crime. … His remarks came two weeks after Carol Lam was reportedly forced out as U.S. attorney in San Diego because she concentrated too much on white-collar crime and not enough on border smuggling and illegal immigration." The Transcript adds, "In his speech, Gonzales said reliability and transparency are needed for a successful economy. … 'As attorney general, protecting the integrity of business and government is a top priority of mine,' he said. 'A free market cannot include the freedom to cheat, to defraud or to steal. Rules and enforcement are needed to protect the playing field itself and ensure fair competition.'" The Transcript notes, "The Justice Department established a corporate fraud task force in 2002, and it had obtained 1,100 convictions as of the end of last year. … Gonzales said the recent prosecutions involving Enron and WorldComm and the new restrictions imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act have changed corporate America. … Stanford Law School reported a 38 percent decline last year in class-action lawsuits involving securities issues. … But the attorney general said he does not want the Justice Department's renewed oversight to hamper American innovation or prevent individuals from taking risks. … 'The United States is the economic envy of the world,' he said, 'and we are dedicated to keeping it that way. That means we'll stand fast by the laws that keep the markets clean, but it also means we'll stay cognizant of the private sector's need for the oxygen that feeds innovation.' … He also praised the government's 'offensive against all types of white-collar crime.' … 'We have a strong record of prosecuting public corruption cases during my tenure as attorney general,' he said. 'As evidence of that commitment, we have added resources to this fight.'"

US Charges 13 In Insider Trading Probe. The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Johnson) reports, "Federal prosecutors unsealed criminal charges against more than a dozen people, including former executives at four of Wall Street's elite institutions, accused of engaging in thousands of improper trades in two schemes that netted more than $15 million in profit." The Post continues, "A grand jury in Manhattan indicted nine people on conspiracy, fraud and bribery charges. Among them were lawyers and officials responsible for protecting the integrity of the firms and the market, who instead became perpetrators, prosecutors said. They worked for such top-tier firms as UBS, Morgan Stanley, Bank of America Securities and Bear Stearns. … Four others, who agreed to plea bargains, helped investigators crack open the massive, six-year insider-trading plot and will provide testimony against their onetime associates, government officials said." The Post adds, "Together, the charges and guilty pleas mark one of the biggest and most prominent insider-trading busts since the era of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine, when handcuffed executives were marched out of investment firms two decades ago. … The six-month probe unearthed furtive meetings among the alleged conspirators, who used disposable cellphones and coded text messages to evade detection and paid kickbacks in the form of cash-filled envelopes. Investigators said they shook their heads at times as the case increasingly resembled the greed on display in the 1987 film 'Wall Street.'"

USA Today (3/2, 1B, Farrell) reports, "The criminal charges allege that traders from a handful of hedge funds and brokerages, acting on illegal inside information from some of Wall Street's biggest firms, netted $8 million in tainted gains from December 2001 to August 2006. … The Securities and Exchange Commission, which discovered evidence of the ring last year during a routine investigation, filed a parallel set of civil charges against 11 individuals and three hedge funds." USA continues, "While the $8 million pales in comparison with the enormous sums misappropriated by Boesky and others in the 1980s, the scheme exposed Thursday was nevertheless shocking, said Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement. … The majority of inside trading cases involve an individual who comes across inside information and can't resist the temptation to make a quick buck. The difference here,

DOJ_NMG_0139180

Thomsen said, is that the inside trading ring operated for five years, involved hundreds of tips and thousands of relatively small trades. Worst of all, the inside information allegedly came from three 'top tier' Wall Street firms: UBS, Morgan Stanley and Bear Stearns. 'It's particularly pernicious when Wall Street insiders … shamelessly compromise the markets' integrity and investors' trust for a quick buck,' she said. … Court documents filed by the SEC and Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, allege that the ring leaders of the scheme were: Mitchel Guttenberg, an executive director at UBS; Randi Collotta, an attorney in Morgan Stanley's compliance department; and Erik Franklin, a former portfolio manager for a hedge fund at Bear Stearns. Franklin has pleaded guilty. Attorneys for Collotta and Guttenberg could not be reached."

The New York Times (3/2, Anderson, De La Merced) reports, "It started in 2001 with two old friends meeting at the Oyster Bar in the basement of Grand Central Terminal in Manhattan, discussing a $25,000 debt. … It ended yesterday with federal authorities saying that they had exposed one of the most far-reaching insider trading schemes on Wall Street in decades, involving four investment banks and a web of hedge funds, day traders, lawyers and even a few supervisors, who upon discovering evidence of insider trading, blackmailed the traders to keep quiet about it." The Times continues, "Thirteen people were accused yesterday of taking part in the trading ring, including a former Morgan Stanley compliance official, a senior UBS research executive, three employees from Bear Stearns and a Bank of America employee. … The schemes described by federal authorities were unusual for their breadth and the seniority of the executives involved. … The tactics, however, were all too familiar: Wall Street executives tipping hedge fund traders about potential upgrades or downgrades of stocks, information sure to move a stock's price; leaking information about pending mergers and acquisitions, and taking kickbacks to get access to hot deals. In the middle, authorities say, was a hedge fund manager looking for an edge."

The Wall Street Journal (3/2, C1, Smith, Scannell, Davies) reports, "Mitchel Guttenberg was $25,000 in debt to Erik Franklin when the two friends got together in 2001 to settle the obligation. The scheme they allegedly concocted that day in New York's cavernous Oyster Bar restaurant grew into one of Wall Street's biggest insider-trading cases in years. … Mr. Guttenberg, now 41 years old, agreed to relay advance word of potentially market-moving stock analysis by the Wall Street arm of Swiss bank UBS AG, where he was a research executive, to Mr. Franklin, now 39, a hedge-fund manager in those days at Bear Stearns Cos., authorities said." The Journal continues, "The participants in what the SEC called a 'brazen' scheme allegedly earned about $15 million based on two strands of alleged inside information. The main one, from the UBS research, accounted for most of those gains. A second stemmed from leaks of takeover deals in the works at the blue-chip Wall Street firm Morgan Stanley. … The takeover-trading tips came from former Morgan Stanley lawyer Randi Collotta, 30, who was a compliance official responsible for monitoring adherence to securities rules, the SEC said. In a statement, Morgan Stanley said it was 'outraged' and had cooperated in the probe and would continue doing so. Ms. Collotta pleaded not guilty in federal court. … UBS depicted itself as a 'victim' of the scheme and said it is 'committed to safeguarding the integrity of its proprietary information.' Bear Stearns, whose employees allegedly traded on both the UBS and Morgan Stanley tips, said the actions described by regulators 'are clear violations of our policies and procedures.' Both UBS and Bear said they are cooperating as well."

The Financial Times (3/2, Masters) reports, "The ring capitalised on two key sources of inside information, according to US Attorney Michael Garcia. … Randi Collotta, a Morgan Stanley compliance officer, allegedly passed on news of pending mergers and acquisitions from 2004 to 2005. Mitchel Guttenberg, a UBS executive director, allegedly gave traders for several hedge funds advance warning of stock upgrades and downgrades for more than six years." The Times adds, "The stream of conspirators who passed on or used the inside information eventually grew to include 14 people, including eight Wall Street professionals, two broker-dealers and three hedge funds, including Lyford Cay, a Bear Stearns vehicle, the Securities and Exchange Commission said. … The SEC estimated that the participants netted more than $15m. If convicted, the defendants face potential maximum sentences ranging from 15 to 90 years, depending on their alleged level of involvement."

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Hamilton, Mulligan) reports, "Though it has receded from public view in the years since Boesky and others made headlines, authorities fear that insider trading is making a comeback on Wall Street amid the current bull market. In particular, they are worried that hedge funds -- private investment groups known for their aggressive styles -- are using such tips to make big profits. … In their case, Guttenberg and Franklin allegedly went to elaborate lengths to conceal their activity, using such dodges as disposable cell phones, coded text messages and clandestine meetings. … And, authorities said, there proved to be no honor among thieves, as several people who caught wind of the insider trading launched mirror trades of their own, and two people went so far as to blackmail the original perpetrators by threatening to expose them."

The New York Law Journal (3/2, Lin) reports, "The Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney's Office claims the defendants participated in two overlapping insider trading rings. The larger of the two was allegedly fed by Mitchel Guttenberg, an institutional client manager in the equity research group at UBS Securities, who tipped off several Wall Street traders over the past six years about upcoming recommendations by UBS analysts. … The second ring was fed by Randi Collotta, a former member of Morgan Stanley's global compliance group who in 2004 and 2005 passed along non-public information about mergers and acquisitions transactions on which the investment bank was advising. … The recipients of her tips included her husband, Christopher Collotta, a Bohemia, N.Y., labor and employment lawyer, and his friend Marc Jurman, a Florida-based broker. Jurman in turn tipped off Robert Babcock, a Bear Stearns & Co. broker who also participated in the UBS ring." The Journal adds, "The Southern District prosecutors also brought charges against two brokerage employees who helped conceal trading -- Samuel Childs and Laurence McKeever of Hoboken, N.J.-based Assent brokerage -- activity by Tavdy and Glass, as well as a Banc of America Securities broker who received a kickback for placing initial public offering shares with one of Franklin's hedge funds. … Among the inside information Guttenberg passed along was that UBS was going to downgrade the stocks of Caterpillar Inc. and Union Pacific and upgrade those of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Whole Foods Market Inc. The tippees shorted those stocks to be downgraded and accumulated those that were to be upgraded."

AFP (3/2, Cole) reports, "Officials said the ring went to exhaustive lengths to hide their improper trading activities from scrutiny. … Members of the ring met at Manhattan's famed Oyster Bar and also used disposable cell phones, secret codes and cash kickbacks to pull off their improper trades, according to investigators." AFP adds, "Other hedge funds named in the charging documents included the Q Capital hedge fund and the Chelsey Capital hedge fund. … 'Today's events should send a message to anyone who believes that illegal insider trading is a quick and easy way to get rich,' said SEC enforcement chief Linda Thomsen. … 'No matter how clever you are, no matter how hard you try to avoid detection, you underestimate us at your peril,' Thomsen warned. … The Justice Department and the SEC, who were aided by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, said their probes were ongoing and that financial penalties against those involved were also being sought."

Judge Tosses SEC Suit Against Former Citigroup Officials. The New York Law Journal (3/2, Bar) reports, "Charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission that two former Citigroup executives 'aided and abetted' their company in a scheme to cheat mutual fund investors of almost $100 million have been dismissed by a federal judge." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Judge Richard Conway Casey granted Thomas W. Jones and Lewis E. Daidone's motion for summary judgment, finding that the SEC's actions seeking civil penalties and an injunction against the executives were time-barred. … In Securities and Exchange Commission v. Jones, 05 Civ. 7044, the judge also held that the SEC's request for disgorgement was 'not supported by sufficient facts.' … The commission was successful in winning a $208 million settlement against Citigroup, which did not admit or deny guilt. It did not rule out an appeal of Judge Casey's verdict. … 'We are disappointed with the decision and are reviewing our options,' said spokesman John Heine." The Journal notes, "Jones was chief executive of Citigroup's asset management division, and Daidone was treasurer and chief financial officer of the Smith Barney mutual funds in question. … The case involves the 1999 establishment by the company's asset management division of an in-house transfer agent service and its decision to employ First Data, a processing services provider, as the sub-transfer agent."

Former Omnicom Official May Help In Securities Fraud Suit. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, B6, Lattman, O'Connell) reports, "New allegations by a former Omnicom Group Inc. executive could provide legal ammunition to claims in a four-year-old securities-fraud lawsuit that the ad giant created a sham entity, Seneca Investments, to improperly avoid taking write-downs on its Internet assets." The Journal continues, "In an amended complaint filed last month in federal court in Manhattan, the former chief executive of Seneca says Omnicom controlled the entity and no other party contributed any assets to it. The ad giant created Seneca in 2001 to move ailing Internet assets off its balance sheet." The Journal adds, "In the lawsuit, initially filed in December 2006, Michael Tierney, a former Omnicom executive who became CEO of Seneca, alleges Omnicom owes him stock options valued at roughly $1 million. Omnicom maintains the options never vested. Mr. Tierney left Seneca in March 2004. His amended complaint also raises questions about Seneca's independence from Omnicom, making allegations that match similar charges in the securities-fraud suit. … Omnicom lawyer Peter Wald said in a statement yesterday, 'We ... strongly dispute Mr. Tierney's contention that Omnicom controlled Seneca.' … Among possible evidence in Omnicom's defense is a 2001 deposition for an unrelated lawsuit. In that deposition, Mr. Tierney said that he was only employed by Seneca, and not Omnicom."

Nortel Will Again Restate Financial Results. The New York Times (3/2, Austen) reports from Ottawa, "Nortel Networks said Thursday that it would have to restate its results for the fourth time in four years, a move that will delay the filing of its 2006 annual report." The Times continues, "The latest restatement involves results from 2004, 2005 and the first nine months of 2006. The company said that the restatements were necessary to correct mistakes in recording income and because errors by an outside actuary firm caused pension liabilities to be misstated by $104 million over several years. … Over all, the company expects that the changes will raise revenue for the first three quarters of 2006 by about $24 million and increase earnings for the period by $15 million. That will be offset by reductions in the earlier years." The Times adds, "The first restatements stemmed from an accounting scandal that led to the firing of several top executives as well as criminal and securities investigations in both Canada and the United States. … The announcement Thursday was not expected. In recent public statements, Mr. Zafirovski has portrayed the company's accounting struggles as being behind it. Last month, when he announced that the chief financial officer, Peter W. Currie, would be leaving the company at the end of April, Mr. Zafirovski praised his work."

DOJ_NMG_0139182

Ferris Baker Officials Leave Amid Trading Probe. The Baltimore Sun (3/2, Adams) reports, "Ferris Baker Watts, the century-old investment brokerage with deep Baltimore roots, said yesterday that six executives and traders have resigned or taken temporary leave since federal officials and outside counsel began investigating the firm's trades for a former client accused of stealing millions of dollars." The Sun continues, "The list of temporary and permanent departures includes several top executives in Baltimore and Hunt Valley, indicating the investigations have disrupted management at the firm more broadly than company officials disclosed two weeks ago." The Sun adds, "The changes are fallout from a federal probe of an investment fund set up by a Cleveland man who, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission lawsuit, took in $50 million from investors and spent much of the money on stock trades placed through Ferris and other firms. Most of the money is missing. Ferris has stressed that neither it nor its clients lost money in the scheme and that it is cooperating with regulators and federal investigators. … Legal experts and former SEC enforcement officials say even the temporary absence of so many top people shows how seriously Ferris is taking the matter and suggests the firm faces a lengthy and costly probe of its internal controls designed to prevent fraud. Brokers are subject to extensive regulatory oversight and are required to police trading activity to ensure fairness in the market."

Frank Unveils Legislation On CEO Pay. The Financial Times (3/2, Grant) reports, "The first US legislative effort for two years aimed at curbing excessive executive pay emerged on Thursday as Barney Frank, a top Democrat, introduced a bill that would require public companies to allow non-binding shareholder votes on pay packets." The move "comes as companies prepare for the annual meetings season, when executive pay promises to be an issue with shareholders." Frank, chairman of the House financial services committee, "said his bill would require companies to include an advisory – or non-binding – vote in their annual proxies. The move borrows from the UK, where advisory votes have been routine for some years."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Says Libby Verdict Unlikely This Week. In a brief item, the New York Times (3/2, 1.16M) reports Judge Reggie Walton said jurors in I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury trial "seem unlikely to reach a verdict this week and will be allowed to end deliberations at 2 p.m. today to attend to personal matters." The Washington Post (3/2, A7, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) says on calling jurors into court Thursday afternoon on a separate matter, he "noted the jurors' casual clothing and said he 'knew we wouldn't have a verdict today.'"

The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/2) says "about half were wearing blue jeans. Most smiled broadly when Walton granted their request to leave early today. It appeared the seven women and four men were making their own visual aids to help sort out the complicated case. Jurors had asked for a large flip chart, masking tape, sticky notes and pictures of the witnesses almost immediately after beginning deliberations last week. Late Wednesday afternoon, they emerged to ask the judge for easel-sized pages to stick on walls."

Draft Report Finds Problems With Execution Appeals Process. USA Today (3/2, Willing) reports, "Death-sentence appeals take too long, traumatize victims' families and burden states with millions in extra costs for housing convicted killers, a draft of a new study commissioned by the Justice Department shows. … The study also found that death penalty cases are not hopelessly flawed by errors, as opponents of capital punishment have charged." USA continues, "The study, which reviewed state death sentences issued in the 1990s, found that 26% were reversed during the first level of the appeals process. Most of those 'direct appeals' were rejected because of sentencing errors. Some of the death sentences were later reinstated. … In only 11% of those cases did the appeals court find problems with the underlying murder convictions, says the unreleased study by Barry Latzer and James Cauthen, professors at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York." USA notes, "The study challenges a 2000 report that concluded the capital punishment system is "broken" because 68% of all death penalty cases from 1973 to 1995 were eventually overturned. The report, by a team led by Columbia University law professor and death penalty foe James Liebman, also found 41% of cases were reversed during direct appeals. … The Liebman study provided a false picture of the death penalty because it included many cases from the 1970s and 1980s, when the U.S. Supreme Court rewrote death penalty rules and caused many sentences to be reversed, the Justice Department's report says. … Latzer and Cauthen tracked 1,676 death sentences issued in 14 "representative" states from 1992 through 2002." USA adds, "Capital punishment foes say the lengthy appeals process may in itself be an argument for abandoning the death penalty. … 'If you like bureaucracy, you'll love the death penalty,' says David Elliot, spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty."

DOJ_NMG_0139183

Arkansas Inmate Seeks Immediate Execution. The AP (3/2, Kissel) reports from Little Rock, AR, "A death row inmate who wants an immediate execution had his request rejected Thursday." The AP continues, "The Arkansas Supreme Court ruled the request was premature and said the man's U.S. lawsuit challenging the way the state executes prisoners is still pending. … But over the past three months, convicted murderer Terrick Nooner, 35, has tried to exit the federal lawsuit and has asked the court to order his execution." The AP adds, "Nooner suffers from severe mental illness and believes Arkansas prison officials are abusing him by implanting a device in his body that controls him, federal public defender Julie Brain wrote Jan. 3 in a motion challenging Nooner's attempt to drop his lawsuit. … She said Nooner also claims prison staff is contaminating his food. … 'His overriding goal is to seek redress for, and relief from, the physical harm that he perceives is being repeatedly inflicted on him,' Brain wrote. … U.S. District Judge Susan Webber Wright has not ruled on Nooner's attempt to drop his lawsuit." The AP notes, "Nooner was convicted for the 1993 robbery and murder of Scot Stobaugh, 22, at a laundromat. … Nooner filed his lawsuit last May, saying lethal injection is unconstitutionally cruel and should be banned. Lawsuits nationwide claim the injections leave inmates in pain before they die."

Federal Officials Aid Kentucky Authorities In Child Predator Crackdown. The Kentucky Post (3/2) reports, "Kenton County Commonwealth Attorney Rob Sanders said his office will partner with the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Kentucky to aggressively prosecute child predators and gun-related cases." The Post continues, "As one of the first steps in that effort, Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney for Kenton County Laura Ward was sworn in Wednesday as a Special Assistant United States Attorney. Ward will help prosecute those types of cases at the federal level. … The new arrangement is part of the Department of Justice's Project Safe Childhood and Project Safe Neighborhoods initiatives, which are designed to coordinate efforts of local, state and federal law enforcement and officials, with a focus on prosecutions of child predators and gun violence. … 'These initiatives can only be accomplished through the hard work and cooperation of law enforcement and prosecutors at every level,' U.S. Attorney Amul Thapar said in a statement. 'This partnership shows the commitment that not only our office has, but that Rob Sanders has as well, on making the community safer for our families and our children.' … Sanders said his office has launched local initiatives aimed at combating child predators and gun violence that mirror those of Project Safe Childhood and Project Safe Neighborhood."

US Charges Man Accused In Missouri Kidnapping With Child Pornography. The AP (3/2, Leonard) reports from St. Louis, "A man accused of kidnapping and molesting two boys was indicted Thursday on federal charges he took pornographic pictures and videos of one of the youngsters. … The indictment marked the first federal charges against Michael Devlin, 41, a former pizzeria manager from the St. Louis suburbs." The AP continues, "Devlin is charged with kidnapping and other offenses in the 2002 abduction of Shawn Hornbeck, who is now 15, and the January abduction of 13-year-old Ben Ownby. Both boys were found in Devlin's apartment Jan. 12. … U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said four counts of the six-count indictment allege Devlin photographed and videotaped a minor engaged in sexually explicit acts between 2002 and this year. Two other counts allege he took the minor to Illinois and Arizona with the intent to sexually assault him." The AP adds, "Hanaway said all six counts involved the same child, identified only as 'S,' an apparent reference to Shawn. Authorities have alleged that Devlin held him captive from October 2002 until police found the boy in January." The AP adds, "Besides the federal charges, Devlin faces 75 state charges, including forcible sodomy, kidnapping and armed criminal action. He has pleaded not guilty to all those allegations. … Devlin's attorney, Michael Kielty, said he had not seen the prosecution's evidence, but he acknowledged that most child pornography cases are 'very emotional, very difficult.' … 'If there are photos and videotapes, that certainly would add some weight to the government's case,' Kielty said. … Shawn Hornbeck knew the federal charges would be filed and was with family members for moral support Thursday, said the family's attorney Scott Sherman."

Son Of "Disgraced Political Boss" Sentenced For Bank Robbery. The Chicago Tribune (3/2, 617K) reports Daniel N. Katalinic, "the son of disgraced political boss Daniel M. Katalinic, was sentenced in federal court Thursday to 10 years and 1 month in prison for robbing a Mt. Prospect bank last year. With his father watching, Daniel N. Katalinic shook his head back and forth as U.S. District Chief Judge James Holderman announced the sentence, warning that people who commit such crimes will face stiff penalties." Daniel M. Katalinic "is also a convicted felon, set to serve a year in federal prison for taking bribes in the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program. He received a reduced sentence because he became a key witness in the prosecution of Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich."

DOJ_NMG_0139184

US Indicts Former Developer Of Wisconsin Casino. The Chicago Tribune (3/2, Gibbard) reports, "The former developer of Kenosha (WI)'s proposed $808 million casino project was indicted Thursday on federal charges for allegedly funneling $100,000 in improper campaign contributions to Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle, who has final approval over Indian gaming in the state." The Tribune continues, "Dennis Troha, 60, of Kenosha, Wis., was charged with one count of fraud and one count of making false statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Attorney's office in Milwaukee said. If convicted, he could face up to 25 years in prison and a $500,000 fine. … The indictment alleges Troha used family members and businesses he controlled to send money to Doyle's campaign during the 2002 and 2006 campaigns. Troha would lend money to the family members, who would then write checks to Doyle's campaign, allowing Troha to circumvent the $10,000 cap on political donations by individuals. The money was only repaid early this year after federal investigators began looking into the case, the indictment said." The Tribune adds, "Prosecutors did not accuse Doyle, the first Democrat elected governor of Wisconsin in 16 years, of wrongdoing. … 'The indictment does not allege a quid pro quo,' said a spokeswoman for U.S. Atty. Steven Biskupic. … Doyle, in a statement, pledged to return the contributions if Troha is found guilty. … 'My campaign was aware of nothing to suggest that the contributions received from Mr. Troha were in any way inappropriate or unlawful,' Doyle said." The Tribune notes, "Wisconsin's Menominee tribe hopes to build one of the Midwest's largest casinos at the site of the Dairyland greyhound track, 10 miles from Illinois on Interstate Highway 94. To do that, the U.S. government must allow the property to be transferred into an Indian trust, because the site is not on the tribe's reservation. … Until last week, Troha was the tribe's developer and point man in Kenosha. On Feb. 23, after news of the investigation surfaced, he announced he had pulled out and sold his interest for an undisclosed sum to the Mohegan tribe of Connecticut. … The main opposition to the project has come from the Forest County Potawatomi Band, which operates its own large casino in Milwaukee. The tribe says the Kenosha casino would hurt its operation and be disrespectful because the Potawatomi have stronger historical ties to the area. … The regional office of the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs recommended in January that the project be approved by the U.S. Department of the Interior. It's uncertain when Washington might issue a recommendation, but Zeppos said it could come as soon as summer."

Maryland Police Arrest 11 Youths In Gang Stabbings. The Washington Post (3/2, B1, Aratani, De Vise) reports, "Eleven young gang members, including a 12-year-old, are facing attempted murder charges in connection with a rampage in Wheaton and Aspen Hill on Saturday that ended with a mentally challenged Silver Spring man being beaten and stabbed, Montgomery County police said yesterday. … Two of them also are accused of a double stabbing that occurred earlier that evening at the Wheaton Metro station. All three victims survived, but the Silver Spring man is hospitalized in critical condition." The Post continues, "The suspects, all males ages 12 to 17, claim to be members of the 'Hotboyz/Shoot 'Em Up' gang, police said. They have been charged with attempted first-degree murder, robbery and assault. Some of their parents reached yesterday evening said they are being falsely accused." The Post adds, "Montgomery police said the first stabbing occurred about 7 p.m. Saturday at the Metro station. The two young victims, both male, told police they believed the attackers were gang members. … Police said the second assault took place about 8:40 p.m., outside a party in the 3700 block of Bel Pre Road in Aspen Hill. Partygoers at an apartment complex spotted an unknown youth climbing inside a car belonging to a party host. They left the apartment to investigate and saw three teenagers standing by the car and 20 others near the building. … When one of the teenagers near the car displayed a gun, the partygoers went inside, except for the 31-year-old mentally challenged man. Police said the man, whom they did not identify, walked toward the suspects and was struck several times with the handgun, repeatedly kicked and then stabbed." The Post notes, "As Montgomery police conducted their investigation, they learned that Metro Transit Police were looking into the stabbing at the Wheaton Station. … Police arrested six suspects Monday and five Wednesday. All have been charged with first-degree attempted murder, armed robbery and first-degree assault. … The 12-year-old was charged as a juvenile and sent to the Alfred D. Noyes Children's Center before being released to family members. His name is not being released because he is a minor."

Murder Trial Of Convicted Florida Sex Offender Opens. The New York Times (3/2, Goodnough) reports from Miami, "The drifter charged with raping and burying alive a 9-year-old girl on Florida's west coast in 2005 went to trial here Thursday, after intense publicity forced the case to be moved 300 miles from where the child, Jessica Lunsford, was murdered." The Times continues, "The case provoked a nationwide crackdown on sex criminals, not least because the suspect, John E. Couey, was a convicted sex offender who had managed to skip required counseling sessions and move without telling parole officers. Many states have passed laws in Jessica's name, increasing minimum sentences for sexual offenses against children and requiring offenders to be closely tracked upon release." The Times adds, "Mr. Couey told detectives soon after his arrest in March 2005 that he had killed Jessica, even telling them where to find her body. But Judge Richard A. Howard of Circuit Court in Citrus County ruled the confession inadmissible because the detectives had refused Mr. Couey's requests for a lawyer. … Prosecutors say they have an airtight case nonetheless. In his opening statement, Ric Ridgway, a state prosecutor, told the jury that Jessica's fingerprints were found in Mr. Couey's bedroom and closet, her DNA was found in blood stains on his mattress and her body was found in a shallow grave in his yard. They are seeking the death penalty for Mr. Couey, who faces charges of first-degree murder, burglary, kidnapping and sexual battery. … 'The evidence will show that the one man responsible for all these acts is sitting right there,' Mr. Ridgway said, pointing to Mr. Couey, 48, who shifted nervously, covered his face with his hands and drew on a sketch pad during the proceedings. … Despite a vast search and the wide distribution of a photograph of Jessica, her body was not found until three weeks after she disappeared from her bedroom in the middle of the night. She had been buried in two garbage bags outside the trailer Mr. Couey shared with relatives near the Lunsford home in Homosassa."

DOJ_NMG_0139185

FBI Agent's Testimony Links Gang To Slaying Of Toddler. South Carolina's the State (3/2, Beam) reports, "A 2-year-old Swansea girl killed in a shootout in January was the victim of an attempted robbery by the Gangsta Killer Bloods, according to an FBI agent's courtroom testimony Thursday. The testimony connects for the first time one of the Midlands' most heinous crimes with the highly organized gang, which has national ties." The FBI "detailed the gang's violent and sophisticated drug trafficking business in documents filed last month as part of an extensive federal investigation." The girl's death "is the first homicide -- and at least the fifth violent crime -- connected to the gang, whose members allegedly speak in code to hide their crack cocaine distribution network."

Baltimore Man Charged With Running Ponzi Scheme. The AP (3/1, Nuckols) reports David McDowell Robinson of Baltimore, "who previously served prison time for fraud," is alleged to have "bilked more than 900 investors out of $8 million in a Ponzi scheme." Robinson "has been incarcerated since last March for violating the terms of his supervised release in the earlier case by running a business, said Joseph L. Evans, his federal public defender. He was arrested again today, a day after a federal grand jury indicted him on wire fraud and mail fraud charges." Robinson "was sentenced to eight years and 10 months in federal prison after pleading guilty in 1996 to charges of mail fraud arising from three different schemes. He also served prison time following 1989 convictions in Anne Arundel County for fraudulent misappropriation by a fiduciary and misconduct in public office. Robinson was released from federal prison in April 2003." He then set up Liberty Trade International Inc. "and began scamming investors again."

The Baltimore Examiner (3/2, Broadwater) says from April 2003 until March 2006, Robinson "was the sole shareholder, president and chief executive officer. … During that time, the grand jury alleges, he solicited investors throughout the country -- offering huge returns on investments, promising a 20 percent return on $2,500 in 60 days; a 25 percent return on $5,000 in 90 days; and a 30 percent return on $10,000 120 days." US Attorney Rod Rosenstein said, "The indictment alleges that David Robinson perpetrated an $8 million Ponzi scheme that victimized innocent investors, including Hurricane Katrina victims who were induced to invest their money in a worthless venture."

New Jersey "Christmas Tree Grants" Probed. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/2, Moroz, Ung, 385K) writes, "In Trenton, as it is in the nation's capital, tradition is under fire. For years, legislators at the state and federal levels have slipped grants for pet causes and hometown projects into the budget at the last minute. In New Jersey, they're known as Christmas tree ornaments. In Congress, they call them earmarks. In both places, you'll hear them referred to as 'pork.' And in both places, they have become key to keeping constituents happy. But now the longheld political practice, which typically plays out behind closed doors, is coming under major attack amid calls for greater government transparency and accountability." In New Jersey, "federal investigators have swarmed the Statehouse, demanding information about Christmas tree grants."

The AP (3/1, Hester) reports that a day after sending subpoenas to Corzine's office, US Attorney Christopher Christie "vowed to continue combating public corruption no matter where it might be found." Christie said, "I do not believe that any public corruption in the state of New Jersey by any public official is acceptable. So whether it is a zoning board member in Monmouth County or whether it's someone high up in state government, and everything in between, no public corruption is acceptable and we're going go after whatever we can find and we can prove beyond a reasonable doubt."

DOJ_NMG_0139186

WNBC-TV New York (3/1, 6:03 p.m.) reported, "Just yesterday, a FBI agent served a subpoena on the governor's office looking at records for three years worth of budget agreements that included earmarks requested by lawmakers. Today, US Attorney Chris Christie refused to talk about that case."

Alleged DC Madam Threatens To Sell Client List. The Washington Post (3/2, B1, Duggan) reports, "A woman accused of running a prostitution service catering to men in hotels and homes in the Washington area was indicted on federal racketeering charges yesterday in a case with a twist: She has threatened to peddle 'the entire 46 pounds of detailed and itemized phone records' of her clients to raise money for her defense." The Post continues, "Working out of her California home, Deborah J. Palfrey, 50, did business in Washington under the name Pamela Martin and Associates. On a Web site seeking donations to her legal defense fund, the company is described as 'a high-end adult fantasy firm which offered legal sexual and erotic services across the spectrum of adult sexual behavior.' … But federal authorities say it was a thriving call-girl service, begun in 1993, that dispatched college-educated women in their 20s to male clients in the Washington area who paid $275 to $300 per sexual encounter. The prostitutes kept half of the fees and mailed the rest to Palfrey in money orders, authorities allege in an affidavit filed in federal court." The Post adds, "The indictment says that in 13 years, the service employed 132 women and generated about $2 million in income 'through prostitution related activities.' … From January 2000 to September 2006, 'Palfrey received and deposited over $750,000 in money orders from various prostitutes' into bank and investment accounts, according to the affidavit. It also says that Palfrey was convicted of operating a prostitution service in California in 1991 and was jailed for 18 months. She 'started her current illegal prostitution business while still on probation,' the affidavit says. … Palfrey is scheduled to make her initial appearance in the criminal case at the D.C. federal courthouse next Friday. She had no comment on the charges yesterday, said her attorney, Montgomery Blair Sibley. He is representing Palfrey in a civil asset-forfeiture case brought against her last year by federal authorities in the investigation of the alleged prostitution service."

The Washington Times (3/2, McElhatton) reports, "Last fall, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed court papers to seize Miss Palfrey's assets. The civil forfeiture proceedings were ongoing. … The Washington Times first reported Feb. 21 that Miss Palfrey told federal authorities she would "make life miserable" for former customers and employees unless her case is dropped. The Times reported that government attorneys said Miss Palfrey had threatened to 'harass potential witnesses whose identifies remain secret ... through calculated public disclosures of former customers' and former co-workers' identities.' … On Wednesday, an attorney representing Miss Palfrey in the forfeiture proceedings said his client would sell customer records over the Internet to raise money for her legal defense."

California Judge Sentences Man To Life For Murder Of Racing Icon, Wife. The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Proctor) reports, "A Pasadena judge today sentenced Michael Goodwin, convicted in January of murdering racing legend Mickey Thompson and his wife, to two consecutive terms of life in prison without parole." The Times continues, "Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Teri Schwartz earlier rejected defense motions for a retrial and to dismiss the charges. Deputy Public Defender Elena M. Saris said she would appeal." The Times adds, Goodwin, 62, called Thompson's death a tragedy, but insisted on his innocence. … 'I can't apologize because I'm not guilty,' he said before the sentence was read. … The Thompsons' killings became a legendary Southern California mystery, the subject of nearly two decades of police investigation and several national television shows. … Thompson and his wife, Trudy, were gunned down in the driveway of their eastern Los Angeles County home on March 16, 1988 by a pair of hooded assailants, who then escaped on bicycles. Prosecutors said the gunmen shot Thompson repeatedly but kept him alive to watch his wife's murder before they shot him in the head. The gunmen were never identified." The Times notes, "Prosecutors always considered Goodwin, a former business partner of Thompson, the prime suspect in plotting the killings, even though no evidence linked him to the scene. … They alleged that the circumstances -- the killers didn't touch the $4,000 the Thompsons were carrying or the $70,000 worth of jewelry in the house -- showed the murders were motivated by revenge. And they argued that Goodwin was the only person who could want Thompson dead that badly. … Thompson, the first American to reach 400 mph in a piston-driven vehicle and the holder of numerous speed records, joined Goodwin in the mid-1980s to promote motor sports in Southern California."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Louisiana Officials Awaiting Word On FBI Cold Case Probes. The Monroe News-Star (3/2) reports, "Local and area law enforcement officials said today they have not been contacted by the FBI regarding investigating cold civil rights cases in the area." The News-Star continues, "FBI Director Robert Mueller said at a news conference Tuesday that the agency is investigating about a dozen cold civil rights cases in an effort to seek justice for victims of racially motivated killings. … FBI officials declined to identify the cases they are working to reopen. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said making that information public could hinder the investigations. … He also said the FBI will help local law enforcement authorities prosecute cases in which federal charges aren't applicable." The News-Star adds, "Mueller said the FBI and local authorities have made 10 to 12 cases a priority, but as many as 100 could be investigated. … The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center are assisting the effort. … The center has a list of 127 race-related killings between 1954 and 1968 — a number it concedes could be much higher."

DOJ_NMG_0139187

More Commentary. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/2) editorializes, "Washington Parish Sheriff's Deputy Oneal Moore was murdered 42 years ago, but the FBI says that it hasn't given up on the case, one of about a dozen unsolved civil-rights era murders that are getting renewed attention from the agency. … When these crimes took place decades ago, African-American victims had little hope of getting justice. Now, investigators will have to deal with the damage time itself has done to the cases. … But that's all the more reason to act quickly, and the FBI's decision to aggressively pursue cold cases that they believe were racially motivated is encouraging."

The Birmingham (AL) News (3/2) editorializes, "If justice delayed is justice denied, what is justice ignored? A national disgrace. … Too many times, civil rights-era murderers got away with their crimes. Too many times, law enforcement officials covered up cases, failed to investigate them fully and even wrongly classified some murders as accidental deaths. Too many times, there was no justice for the loved ones of victims, just grief and anger." The News continues, "Fortunately, the U.S. Justice Department has decided to reopen investigations into nearly 100 suspicious death cases from across the South during the civil rights era to see if they were racially motivated murders that can be solved and prosecuted. … If cases can be prosecuted and convictions won, it will bring a measure of justice where there has been none. Grieving families and friends of the victims who have carried deep emotional wounds for decades, knowing that killers had gotten away with their crimes - and sometimes knowing who those killers are - may find some small relief. … The Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. famously said, 'Let us realize the arc of the moral universe is long, but it bends toward justice.' … Recent convictions of civil rights-era crimes have bent that long arc toward justice. Tuesday's announcement bent it just a tiny bit more."

Navy Chaplain Dismissed Over Christian Prayers. The New York Times (3/2, Goodstein, 1.16M) reports, "Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, a Navy chaplain, has lost a three-year battle to stay in the chaplain corps after superiors warned him about delivering sectarian Christian prayers and sermons at a sailor's memorial service and other events attended by religiously diverse audiences." Klingenschmitt "became a hero to religious conservatives, but was court-martialed last year for wearing his uniform at a political protest in front of the White House. He received an honorable discharge."

Columnist Lauds DOJ's Religious Freedom Initiative. In a column for the Nashville Tennessean (3/2), Charles C. Haynes writes, "Here's one of the best-kept secrets about the Bush presidency: Over the past five years, the U.S. Justice Department has quietly, but vigorously, enforced civil rights laws designed to protect religious freedom. … Now Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wants to get the word out. On Feb. 20, he announced an initiative called the First Freedom Project to carry out 'even greater enforcement of religious rights for all Americans.'" Haynes continues, "Since presidents aren't shy about their accomplishments, I'm not sure why we haven't heard more about this before. Maybe we're so busy shouting past one another about church-state conflicts that we overlook threats to free exercise of religion. … The new report documents the Bush administration's efforts to take religious discrimination seriously. After establishing the first-ever Special Counsel for Religious Discrimination early in the administration, the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division dramatically increased enforcement of federal statutes protecting religious rights. … Administration critics aren't impressed. 'Expecting the Bush administration to defend religious liberty,' says Barry Lynn of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, 'is a little like asking Colonel Sanders to baby-sit your pet chicken.'" Haynes concludes, "From attacks on houses of worship to incidents of discrimination at school and work, the Justice Department over the past five years has investigated scores of cases involving religious rights of Christians, Jews, Muslims, Sikhs, Native Americans and others. … However much we disagree about the relationship between religion and government, surely we can agree that freedom of religion should mean freedom from religious discrimination."

ANTITRUST:

EU Threatens New Sanctions Against Microsoft. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, B3, Jacoby) reports, "New European Union charges against Microsoft Corp. that threaten the company with as much as $1 billion in fines highlight an increasingly fierce industry battle over how to sell business software." The Journal continues, "European regulators launched formal charges yesterday against Microsoft -- for the third time in three years -- accusing the tech giant of trying to overcharge competitors for information to make their products work well with Microsoft's ubiquitous Windows operating system. … The charges stem from a 2004 EU decision that Microsoft abused its near-monopoly position as the producer of Windows. Microsoft has already racked up close to $1 billion in fines in the case." The Journal adds, "The EU's latest move goes to the heart of a growing battle between Microsoft's traditional fee-based software business and challenges from International Business Machines Corp., Red Hat Inc. and Oracle Corp., which offer free or nominally priced 'open source' software. … Microsoft's competitors say they believe the company has structured its proposed charges for the programming information in such a way as to undermine their business models." The Journal notes, "The March 2004 EU decision requires Microsoft to offer licenses for the programming information on 'reasonable and non-discriminatory terms' to software rivals who need it. No companies have licensed the information yet. … The 2004 decision ordered Microsoft to help rivals write software linking back-office server computers with employees' Windows-driven desktop computers for a narrow range of functions, including the accessing and printing of documents and logging onto password-protected company systems. … 'The current view is that there is no significant innovation' in the programming information to warrant the price Microsoft is charging, EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement yesterday. … But Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said in an interview he was surprised by the aggressive new charges. 'I feel we need a more constructive approach to address very complicated and technical issues in a way that is going to make progress,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0139188

The Financial Times (3/2, Buck) reports, "The Commission refused to comment on the size of any new fine that could arise from yesterday's charges. However, Brussels could - in the worst-case scenario for Microsoft - hit the group with a penalty in excess of €800m." The Times continues, "The Commission accused Microsoft of demanding excessive royalties from companies wishing to license technical information about its Windows operating system. The order to make such information available to rivals formed a key plank of the Commission's March 2004 ruling against the group. … The Commission stressed that Microsoft was the first group to be accused of ignoring a European Union antitrust ruling. 'This is a company which apparently does not like to have to conform with antitrust decisions,' said the spokesman for Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner. … Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, rejected the Commission's allegations. He said Microsoft's proposed pricing scheme would be 30 per cent cheaper than comparable licensing fees."

The AP (3/2, Casert) reports, "The EU complained that three years after a landmark antitrust ruling to open up the market, the world's largest software maker still refused to cooperate. … Under a 2004 antitrust ruling by the European Union, Microsoft had to disclose complete and accurate interface documentation on reasonable and nondiscriminatory terms, allowing its competitors to interoperate with Windows PCs and servers." The AP adds, "Under a so-called 'statement of objections' released Thursday, the EU's executive Commission said there was 'no significant innovation' in the requested information. It also rejected 1,500 pages of submissions by Microsoft over the past three months and said Microsoft's price proposals were unreasonable. … 'I am therefore again obliged to take formal measures to ensure that Microsoft complies with its obligations,' EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement." The AP notes, "Smith complained Microsoft had asked for feedback half a year ago and only on Thursday received a reply thinly veiled in a threat. … 'We're disappointed that this feedback is coming six months later and in its present form, but were committed to working hard to address the Commissions Statement of Objections,' said Smith. … He added 'the findings appear to be an attempt to regulate the pricing of our intellectual property rights on a global basis' something which would go beyond the jurisdiction of the European Commission."

EU Extends Probe Of Sony BMG. The Financial Times (3/2, Buck) reports, "The music industry faces a prolonged period of regulatory uncertainty after the European Union's top antitrust regulator said yesterday it needed another four months to scrutinise the merger that created Sony BMG." The Times continues, "The European Commission waved through the original tie-up in 2004, arguing that the merger would not undermine competition in the market. However, its ruling was challenged and - in a rare move that shocked the music industry - a top European court decided last year to overturn the Commission's clearance decision." The Times adds, "For Sony BMG, the ruling meant it had to resubmit the merger to the Brussels watchdog for approval and a fresh investigation. … The Commission said it had completed an initial one-month assessment of the Sony BMG merger, but now needed more time to examine whether the deal 'strengthens or creates a dominant position in these relatively concentrated markets'. Brussels added it would take into consideration factors such as 'the growing sales of online music' "

Motorola Stock Lifted By Icahn Move. The Financial Times (3/2, Taylor) reports, "Shares in Motorola rose in early trading yesterday after the world's second largest mobile phone maker revealed that Carl Icahn, the billionaire Wall Street raider, was seeking to lift his stake in the company to about 6 per cent by acquiring another $2bn in stock." The Times continues, "If completed, the proposed stock purchase would lift the stake in Motorola acquired last month by Mr Icahn from 1.6 per cent, and turn him into the company's second biggest investor behind Barclays Global Investors. Barclays had a 6.82 per cent stake in Motorola at the end of December." The Times adds, "Mr Icahn's demand that Motorola use the bulk of its $11.6bn in cash to accelerate share buy-backs has helped prop up its share price in the wake of a series of setbacks. .. The company reported weak financial resultsearlier this year reflecting a fierce mobile phone price war and a lack of blockbuster products. … Profit margins in Motorola's core phone division shrank to 4.4 per cent in the fourth quarter from almost 12 per cent in the preceding three months as the company slashed prices in order to retain market share and remain competitive with Finland's Nokia, the world's largest mobile phone maker."

DOJ_NMG_0139189

China Eyes Legal Reforms To Handle Economic Demands. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Batson) reports, "China's leadership is stepping up its efforts to build a legal system that can handle the demands of a complex, market-driven economy, as managing the fast-growing nation becomes increasingly challenging. … That program will take the spotlight when China's legislature opens its annual session on Monday. The National People's Congress is scheduled to consider, and most likely pass, two crucial pieces of economic legislation. One would give private property new protections of unprecedented force and detail for China; another would require foreign and domestic companies to pay the same rate of tax." The Journal continues, "The property-rights law will be a symbolic milestone for the still nominally Communist nation, even though it falls far short of what more liberal reformers had initially advocated. For foreign businesses, the tax law will put them on a more-equal footing with local competitors, as it gradually brings an end to most of the special breaks offered in the past. Several other important laws will also be discussed at the meeting for passage later this year, including the country's first antitrust legislation and a measure that would give workers more say in contracts with their employers." The Journal adds, "All of these are the building blocks of the legal infrastructure that underpins the daily functioning of a market economy, although the country's legal code is still in its infancy and legal redress can be difficult to come by. Many of these laws have been in the works for years, and have provoked sometimes heated debate. They are coming to fruition this year as a consensus grows that the new legislation can fill some gaping holes and rectify obvious inequities in the current system. … The annual meeting of the National People's Congress, when nearly 3,000 delegates gather in Beijing, is one of the few occasions when China's leaders discuss their policies in public. Given the turmoil in China's stock markets this week, as fears spread that a government crackdown on speculation was imminent, this year's meeting is likely to be particularly closely watched for signals on financial policy, as well as progress in lawmaking."

Antitrust Measure Among Reforms Considered. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Connolly) reports, "With China's economy changing much faster than the legal system that is supposed to govern it, Beijing is moving quickly to create a system that can handle the demands of a complex, market-driven economy just as events like this week's Chinese market turmoil underscore how challenging managing the fast-growing nation has become." The Journal continues, "The annual session of China's legislature, the National People's Congress, which begins Monday, is to consider and likely approve two significant pieces of economic legislation, one giving private property new protections of unprecedented force and detail for China, the other requiring foreign and domestic companies to pay the same rate of tax. Several other important laws will also be discussed for passage later this year, including the country's first antitrust legislation and a measure that would give workers more say in contracts with their employers." The Journal adds, "Though vast numbers of Chinese now own their own homes and run their own businesses, it is difficult to settle precisely who owns what and what they are allowed to do with it, as Andrew Batson reports. Private-property rights, in the abstract, have been recognized in China's constitution through a series of amendments, beginning in 1988. But those vague principles are of little help in handling specific cases, such as the government's frequent confiscation of land for development. Nonetheless, the proposed law has attracted vocal opposition from leftist scholars concerned it will pave the way for the accelerated privatization of state companies and widen the gap between the wealthy and the poor. … The draft antimonopoly law, under discussion for more than a decade, has also been held hostage by disputes among policymakers. Some want to use it to break open still-closed parts of the economy, while others see giving the government new antitrust powers as a way to strengthen its control over businesses -- particularly powerful foreign companies that have dominant market share in China."

WSJ Decries "Power Plays" In Endesa Takeover. The Wall Street Journal (3/2) editorializes, "As corporate dramas go, few can match the long-running Endesa takeover story. But the latest plot twist, in which Italian utility Enel entered the scene, may have the Spanish electricity giant's shareholders feeling like they're watching a farce. As usual when it comes to Europe and energy, politicians appear to be the ones making a mockery of the market." The Journal continues, "A new chapter began Tuesday, when Enel bought a 9.9% stake in Endesa -- just three weeks before Endesa's shareholders were to consider bylaw changes that would allow Germany's E.On to move forward with a €41 billion purchase of the company. Yesterday Enel made arrangements to boost its holding to 17% -- Spanish law requires a regulatory review before an investor can buy more than 10% of a utility -- and said it would ask permission to keep buying up shares until it had nearly one-fourth of the company, at which point it would have to bid for the entire firm. … E.On's bid, which just last week seemed like a reasonably safe bet, is now in real danger. Spanish conglomerate Acciona owns 21% of Endesa and has indicated it won't sell to the German utility. Spain's public holding company owns 3%, so if Enel refuses to sell to E.On -- so far the Italians are being coy on that question -- the German company would have to win over almost all of the other shareholders to take control of Endesa. Even then, the large minorities might prove to be a thorn in E.On's side." The Journal adds, "This saga might have been all to the good for Endesa shareholders -- competing bids can't be bad, right? -- if this were a true competition. But that's not the case. As it stands, smaller shareholders probably won't get the chance to weigh E.On's offer. Investors who bought Endesa stock over the past year and a half, during which time the share price has doubled, may still have a chance to recoup handsome rewards -- if there are any takers still out there. … So why did Enel jump into the fray? There's plenty of reason to believe that the motivation was in part political. After failing to marry Endesa with Barcelona-based Gas Natural, Spanish Prime Minister José Luis Rodíguez Zapatero has been laboring for months to keep the company out of E.On's hands." The Journal concludes, "Brussels deserves credit for its persistence in the Endesa case, even if Enel may negate much of that good work. Still, the difficulty it's had in enforcing cross-border competition here shows that the balance of power still lies in national capitals. Recognizing this, EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes is threatening to break up energy companies into suppliers and distributors in order to boost energy-sector competition. … We think it's too early for such a drastic and largely irreversible step. But Madrid, Rome and Paris aren't doing themselves, their utilities or their citizens any favors by indulging in these power plays."

DOJ_NMG_0139190

Antitrust Law Gets Little Attention In Congressional XM-Sirius Hearing. The Deal (3/2, Lindell) reports, "The brand-new House Committee Antitrust Task Force took up the proposed merger between the nation's two satellite radio companies Wednesday, discussing technology, economics and personalities. Antitrust law, which will weigh big in the deal's ability to win government approval, received very little airtime." The Deal continues, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.'s CEO Mel Karmazin was the headliner at the standing-room-only event as he pitched his company's merger with rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. He did his best to express his willingness to work with regulators and Congress to get the deal approved. But if the deal is ultimately rejected, he said, both XM and Sirius would be able to go on as separate and viable businesses. … But David Rehr, president and CEO of the National Association of Broadcasters, repeatedly told the room that the merger would be a 'government-sanctioned monopoly,' and that allowing the combination 'portends great potential harm to the American public and to the many benefits of free local radio broadcasting.'" The Deal adds, "Representatives invited one antitrust lawyer not involved with the deal to shed light on how the Department of Justice would examine the merger. Charles Biggio, a partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, testified that the DOJ's antitrust division would likely issue a second request for information on the deal in order to adequately tackle the various issues. … 'The ultimate question the antitrust division will ask in reviewing the XM-Sirius transaction is whether the transaction will create or enhance market power; that is, whether it will cause prices to go up, output to go down, or quality or technological development to deteriorate in a relevant market affected by the transaction,' Biggio said. … The analysis, he continued, would look at advertising, distribution via retail outlets and car manufacturers, content purchases and consumer subscriptions. Only after evaluating the effects in those areas would the staff lawyers at the DOJ consider the benefits of the deal, which have been estimated to be extensive, since the combined company would cut costs by better utilizing its satellite spectrum."

FTC OKs Carlyle's Purchase Of Philosophy Inc. The AP (3/2) reports, "Federal antitrust regulators approved Carlyle Group's purchase of cosmetics and skin care company Philosophy inc., according to a notice issued by the Federal Trade Commission Thursday. … The FTC cleared the sale without requiring any changes." The AP continues, "Carlyle, a private equity group, announced the purchase Jan. 31, but did not disclose terms of the deal. Philosophy sells through retailers and television shopping channels and was the top beauty brand on QVC in 2006, Carlyle said. … Carlyle also said in announcing the deal that it was its third consumer and retail acquistion in 11 months, after its purchase of Dunkin' Brands in March 2006 and Oriental Trading Co. in July 2006."

FTC Clears Private Equity Firm's Purchase Of Mirant Power Plants. The AP (3/2) reports, "Federal antitrust regulators approved the $1.4 billion sale of six power plants by Mirant Corp. to LS Power Equity Partners, according to a notice issued Thursday by the Federal Trade Commission. … The FTC cleared the sale without requiring any changes." The AP continues, "Mirant said when announcing the sale in mid-January that it expects net proceeds of $1.32 billion, after paying off $83 million in debt. … The plants, all in the U.S., produce a total of 3,619 megawatts of power. Mirant is selling its Michigan Zeeland plant, its West Georgia plant, its Shady Hills plant in Florida, its Sugar Creek plant in Indiana, its Bosque plant in Texas and its Las Vegas-based Apex plant. … LS Power Equity is part of private equity firm LS Power Group."

DOJ_NMG_0139191

FCC Grants Internet Phone Access To Cable Firms. USA Today (3/2, 2B, Davidson) reports, "In a move that's expected to bring new discount phone services to millions of rural Americans, the Federal Communications Commission ruled Thursday that local phone companies cannot block cable providers' rival Internet-based phone offerings. … 'The commission must promote competition,' FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said." USA continues, "In an FCC petition last year, Time Warner Cable complained that rural carriers in South Carolina and Nebraska refused to set up connections so users of the company's Voice over Internet Protocol (VoIP) service and rural phone customers can exchange calls. The carriers also would not provide local phone numbers and 911 services. … Time Warner typically leases these services from MCI and Sprint, which, in turn, lease them from the rural phone companies." USA adds, "The rural carriers claimed a federal law promoting competition doesn't require them to provide the services because MCI and Sprint would not serve residents directly. They also noted VoIP has not been labeled a telecommunications service. State regulators in South Carolina and Nebraska sided with the rural carriers. Similar battles are playing out in other states. … But FCC staff said wholesale providers are entitled to the same network-leasing privileges as retail companies and that VoIP's classification is irrelevant."

The Washington Post/Bloomberg (3/2, D3, Peterson) reports, "AT&T and Verizon, the two biggest U.S. phone companies, supported Time Warner Cable's petition. … The FCC order overrides rulings by state regulators in South Carolina and Nebraska that barred certain carriers from connecting calls using voice-over-Internet protocol, or VOIP, to traditional local phone lines. The South Carolina regulators said Verizon had no right to route Internet-based phone calls through lines owned by rural-phone companies as part of a wholesale service it sells to Time Warner Cable, a unit of Time Warner Inc." Bloomberg adds, "The state rulings would have impeded phone competition, the commission said in its decision. They also would have hindered the deployment of high-speed Internet access, the FCC said. … Cable companies have invested more than $100 billion on broadband networks 'to offer consumers a wide array of new services, and this action will speed the rollout of digital voice service in many more markets,' said Kyle McSlarrow, president of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association."

Oracle To Purchase Hyperion Solutions In $3.3 Billion Deal. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, B3, Vara) reports, "Oracle Corp.'s roll-up of smaller software concerns continues to roll on, with a twist in emphasis. … The deal announced yesterday -- a tender offer for Hyperion Solutions Corp. for $3.3 billion, or $52 a share -- highlights the business-software giant's shift from buying head-on rivals in maturing markets to snapping up players in fast-growing niches. Hyperion specializes in business-intelligence software, a hot field where Oracle has been a relatively minor player to date." The Journal continues, "The transaction, which sent Hyperion's shares up 20% and moved the stocks of other companies in the sector, would be Oracle's largest acquisition since it acquired Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion in 2006." The Journal adds, "In the past two years, Oracle Chief Executive Larry Ellison has spent upward of $20 billion on buying more than 25 software firms. Early on, Oracle used big bids for major rivals such as PeopleSoft Corp. and Siebel to build itself into the No. 2 maker of applications for business tasks, such as finance and human resources, after German rival SAP AG. Those deals significantly beefed up Oracle's own applications business and customer list, while creating opportunities to increase profit by laying off employees in duplicate positions. … But lately, the company has focused on smaller acquisitions in areas such as security and content management, as well as firms focused on specific industries. … The Hyperion acquisition is the latest reflection of that plan. The company focuses on programs that help companies collect, analyze and share data about how their businesses are performing -- an increasingly important field as businesses seek to extract more usable knowledge from their growing troves of business data."

USA Today (3/2, 1B, Swartz) reports, "Oracle bagged Hyperion Solutions for $3.3 billion on Thursday, renewing a furious shopping spree to unseat business-software leader SAP. … The cash deal, if approved by regulators, gives Oracle the keys to Hyperion's line of software used by corporate executives to track their company's performance — software that is also widely used by SAP customers." USA continues, "The Hyperion acquisition is Oracle's biggest since it snapped up Siebel Systems for $6.1 billion last year. Oracle has spent more than $20 billion on almost 30 acquisitions in the past two years. … Oracle will pay $52 per share for Hyperion, a 21% premium above the most recent closing price of Hyperion's stock. Hyperion shares soared 20%, to $51.57, after the deal was announced Thursday. Oracle shares edged up 2%, to $16.77." USA adds, "Oracle's acquisition could trigger a ripple effect, tech analysts say. …

DOJ_NMG_0139192

AMR Research analyst Bruce Richardson says Canada-based Cognos could be a takeover candidate for IBM, and France-based Business Objects may be courted by SAP. Hewlett-Packard might also sniff around for a purchase, he says."

Australian Antitrust Authorities Clear Qantas Buyout. The AP (3/2) reports from Sydney, Australia, "The proposed $8.6 billion acquisition of Qantas Airways Ltd. by an investor group cleared a hurdle Thursday when the Australian competition watchdog said it will not oppose the sale." The AP continues, "The Australian Competition and Consumer Commission, or ACCC, said while market inquiries during a comprehensive review of the proposed acquisition had revealed a range of potential competition issues arising from the interests of the bidding consortium members, it ruled the deal is 'unlikely to substantially lessen competition' under federal trade laws." The AP adds, "Qantas' board has recommended shareholders accept the bid by Australia's Macquarie Bank, Forth-Worth based Texas Pacific Group, Canada's Onex Corp. and others, which was first announced mid-December. It would be one of Australia's biggest-ever corporate takeovers. … ACCC chairman Graeme Samuel said while the regulator has closely reviewed whether Macquarie Bank's 'partial direct and indirect interests' in Qantas and Sydney Airport could lead to discrimination in favor of Qantas by Sydney Airport management, it appeared there are 'not clear incentives' for the bank to do this. … The ACCC found there is not likely to be a substantial lessening of competition across a range of aeronautical services, domestic and international air passenger services, aircraft parts and leasing, airline catering and ticketing services."

The Financial Times (3/2, Minder) reports, "Peter Costello, Australia's treasurer, is expected in the next few days to receive a report from the Foreign Investment Review Board to determine whether the deal would run against the 'national interest'. … The consortium, which also includes Texas Pacific Group and Sydney-based Allco Equity Partners, has structured the deal so that foreign investors own only 39 per cent of the equity. … The Senate, the upper house of parliament, is also preparing to conduct a separate review of the deal."

ENVIRONMENT:

Maryland To Probe Montgomery County Dumping. The Washington Post (3/2, B1, Spivack) reports, "Two Maryland agencies are investigating a two-acre pile of debris that has been dumped by a landscaping firm for the past eight years on a secluded site near the Patuxent River, a source of drinking water for the region." The Post continues, "The dump sits on property owned by Pepco in northeastern Montgomery County and rises 20 feet in places. It contains yard and construction waste, including cable, concrete and closed canisters, said government officials who have inspected the site. At one point last year, the debris pile was smoldering and emitting steam. … County officials have been aware of the dump since early 2006, but they did not order removal of the debris or issue fines to Pepco or Kollins Landscaping, the Brinklow firm dumping on the site. The dumping stopped a year ago after a frustrated neighbor obtained a court order. Not until last month did county officials begin examining the dump's contents more closely to assess its toxicity." The Post adds, "Log entries made by a county investigator who examined the site in early 2006 indicate that Pepco knew about the dumping and allowed it to continue. … 'Through my conversation with Pepco it is clear that they are aware that Kollins Landscaping is placing materials at this location and that they have let it go on. However this still constitutes an illegal transfer station,' said a log entry written in early 2006 by Peter R. Dilima, an inspector with the county's Department of Environmental Protection. … Michael Boland, associate general counsel with Pepco, disputed that assessment. … 'I don't know the inspector or how accurate or inaccurate he might have been with his notes and recollections,' Boland said yesterday. 'We don't permit anything like this. As soon as we became aware of it, we addressed it, and the county inspector thought it had been addressed,' he said. … The county's inspector general, Thomas Dagley, whose office is independent of the executive branch, referred the matter to the state attorney general's office and the state Department of the Environment last month. Both agencies have sent investigators to the site in Ashton, state and local officials said."

Ignatius Highlights Systems' Vulnerability To Climate Change. Washington Post (3/2, A13, 690K) columnist David Ignatius describes a "startling new report" on global warming by futurist Peter Schwartz, who "turns the usual discussions upside down: Rather than starting with detailed estimates of climate change (how much temperatures will increase; how much sea levels will rise; what new diseases will be spawned), he looks instead at systems that already are vulnerable to such stresses. What Schwartz discovers with his stress-testing makes climate change even scarier." Schwartz writes that "climate change pushes systems everywhere toward their tipping point." A "first set of disasters waiting to happen involves stressed ecosystems. Human actions -- deforestation, overfarming, rapid urbanization -- have created special vulnerabilities to catastrophic natural events that are likely as the climate changes globally." In "Bangladesh, where millions of people live at or near sea level, even a small increase [in sea levels] could produce a catastrophe." In arid areas, climate change could produce "severe water shortages and even 'water wars.'" Finally, "there is the problem of maintaining social order in a stressed world." Ignatius concludes, "If we let ourselves visualize how bad it could get, as Schwartz does in this report, will we make changes that might reduce the disaster? That's the real stress test: It's coming at us. What are we doing about it?"

DOJ_NMG_0139193

WSJournal Calls For Killing Federal Programs To Save Energy. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/2, A10, 2.04M) writes that California Sen. Barbara Boxer "suggested last week that a first step in reducing greenhouse gases would be to require that federal buildings use more efficient light bulbs, and ask federal bureaucrats to turn off their computers at night. 'Don't you think it's time the federal government were a model of energy efficiency?' she asks. We warmly agree, not least since the United States Government is the largest single consumer of energy in the United States." The Journal adds, "It's also one of the most inefficient energy users." It "follows from all this that the best way to make the federal government more energy efficient would be to undertake a government-wide policy of...lights out, permanently. Save the environment; kill a federal program. Start, needless to say, with the Department of Energy, operating at an annual cost of $22 billion."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Breaks Up Mississippi-To-Chicago Gun Connection. The Chicago Tribune (3/1, Coen) reports, "The arrests of 19 people in Chicago and Mississippi in a gun-trafficking conspiracy offer a snapshot into the illegal gun trade in which gang members here end up with high-powered weapons, federal authorities said Wednesday." The Tribune continues, "A loose organization made up of relatives, their friends and associates allegedly arranged for the purchase of more than 100 guns in Mississippi, where laws are relatively lax, and transport here for sale to gangs such as the Gangster Disciples. … About three dozen weapons eventually were recovered at Chicago crime scenes, including a shootout last year in which two people were killed and a police officer wounded, investigators said. … 'When you add illegally obtained heavy-caliber firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago, the result to say the least is an unacceptable level of violence,' said Gary Shapiro, first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago." The Tribune notes, "Three people were in custody in Chicago and 15 in Mississippi after a team of agents from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and officers from the Chicago Police Department and Illinois State Police cracked down on the group early Wednesday. … Shapiro said gun-running operations like the one dismantled Wednesday contribute significantly to crime in the city. … It 'threatens not only those who try to enforce our laws, but also the law-abiding citizens who only wish to live their lives in the neighborhoods that the gangs are trying to dominate,' Shapiro said."

The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (3/1, Nelson) reports, "Nineteen people suspected of putting more than 300 Mississippi-purchased firearms in the hands of Chicago street gang members were arrested Wednesday, most in the Delta town of Jonestown in Coahoma County. … At least one of those guns is believed to have been used in a shootout with police in November that left an officer wounded and two alleged gang members dead." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "At a news conference in Chicago following the arrests, prosecutors displayed a table of weapons similar to those confiscated in the crackdown, including AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and an assault-style shotgun, The Associated Press reported. … 'They just weren't your regular handguns,' Monique Bond, a spokeswoman for Chicago Police Department, told The Clarion-Ledger. 'These were assault-type weapons - heavy artillery.'" The Clarion-Ledger notes, "According to Bond, brokers in Chicago arranged to have guns purchased in Mississippi because of the state's 'lax gun laws.' … Purchasers were recruited to buy the weapons at three different pawn shops in Clarksdale and Tunica, Bond said. Those purchasers knew the guns were going to be used illegally, she said. … The sellers have cooperated with authorities and are not suspected of being involved, said Senior Special Agent Austin Banks of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. He would not identify the shops."

The AP (3/1, Robinson) reports, "Nineteen people have been charged with taking part in gun-running operations from Mississippi to Chicago that provided high-powered weapons to street gangs, federal prosecutors announced Wednesday. … 'When you add illegally obtained firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago the result is an unacceptable level of violence,' said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago." The AP continues, "At a news conference, prosecutors displayed a table of weapons similar to those confiscated in the crackdown, including AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and a sinister-looking, assault-style shotgun. … Fourteen of those accused were charged in a complaint unsealed in Chicago on Wednesday. Three of those charged were arrested in Chicago Wednesday, and 10 were arrested in Mississippi. One other was already in jail, authorities said. … Five others were charged by federal officials in Mississippi."

The Chicago Sun-Times (3/1, Main) reports, "The Chicago defendants include convicted felons Eddie Nesby, 25, Julius Statham, 37, and Antonio Brunt, 30. … Nesby allegedly told investigators he recruited Percy Strong of Mississippi and others to buy guns for him there. Strong could buy guns because he was not a felon, officials say. … In 2005, Strong bought a 9mm Hi-Point pistol at a Clarksdale, Miss., pawn shop. The Hi-Point was recovered last October in the 3200 block of West Augusta after officers stopped a car containing gang members getting ready to shoot a rival, police said. The gangsters pointed the Hi-Point and an AK-47 at officers, who opened fire and killed two of them, police said." The Sun-Times adds, "Chicago Police, State Police and the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives have been investigating the Mississippi-to-Chicago gun pipeline since 2001. The defendants named Wednesday were allegedly responsible for 39 Mississippi guns recovered by law enforcement officials in Chicago. Authorities have not found 117 other Mississippi guns distributed in Chicago by the defendants, officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0139194

The WLS-TV, ABC 7, Chicago (2/28, Baca) reports, "Prosecutors said 301 guns confiscated by police and agents in Chicago over five years were traced to federally licensed gun dealers at four shops in Tunica and Clarksdale, Miss. … 'A majority of these firearms are purchased in gun and pawn shops in Mississippi. Despite the attempts to obliterate the serial numbers, Chicago police were able to trace the origins with good old-fashioned police work,' said Hiram Grau, Deputy Police Superintendent. … 'We've noticed in the last few years there's a definite trend to go with powerful were higher capacity, more lethal firearms,' said Andrew L. Traver, ATF special-agent-in-charge."

WMC-TV, Memphis (3/1) reports, "It's a growing crime on which the Feds are focused. … 'The movement of guns from the Mid-South to the streets of Chicago,' says U.S. Attorney Jim Greenley of the Northern District of Mississippi. … Nineteen people were rounded up Wednesday and charged with running guns. … 'In my 20 years of law enforcement with the ATF, this is the most successful arrest operation I've ever been a part of,' says ATF agent Robert Browning." WMC-TV adds, "In all, the Feds say 100 firearms went from North Mississippi to Chicago between 1999 and 2005. … Many of the weapons were distributed to gang members and used to commit serious crimes, including homicide. … 'Some of these guns were involved with officers getting shot,' says Coahoma County Sheriff Andrew Thompson. … Most of those charged in this latest round of arrests are from Jonestown, Mississippi in Coahoma County, but the weapons were purchased from pawn shops in Tunica and Clarksdale."

The Daily Mississippian (3/1, Berry) reports, "The firearms were purchased in the Clarksdale and Tunica areas from federally licensed firearms dealers. The defendants purchased them for family members and friends, or for the exchange of money or drugs, according to Robert Browning, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … 'Our office will be relentless in pursuing these investigations,' said Browning, who is with the New Orleans division of firearms for ATF." The Mississippian adds, "The investigation began as a result of the recovery of firearms in Chicago, and the case has been impending for the past couple of years, Browning said. … 'We're cracking down on it,' he added. "Enough is enough." … The investigation was conducted by ATF, the Chicago Police Department and the Illinois State Police. Agents from the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics and Deputy U.S. Marshals also assisted ATF with the arrests. … If proven guilty charges, the people arrested will be given a sentence of anywhere from five to 10 years, Browning said."

DOJ Probe Finds Misspending Of Marshals Funds. USA Today (3/2, Kelley) reports, "A U.S. Marshals Service official misspent $4.3 million meant for courthouse security and witness protection to pay for fitness centers and firing ranges at federal buildings, a Justice Department investigation found." USA continues, "The Office of Management and Budget repeatedly told David Barnes not to use construction money on exercise and training facilities, citing agency policy and appropriations laws that restricted the money for improved prisoner security, the report said. … Barnes, who oversees courthouse space for the agency, concealed the spending from his superiors and directed $2.6 million in construction money for fitness centers and firing ranges at 20 federal courthouses from 2000 to 2005, according to a copy of the 41-page report obtained by USA TODAY. … The agency has not acted on the report, which it received last April." USA adds, "Barnes also used nearly $900,000 budgeted for witness protection to build a firing range in the Miami federal courthouse, and he used nearly $400,000 in construction money to hire fitness center staff and clerical workers at the Marshals Service headquarters, where Barnes works, the investigation found. Some workers were friends or relatives of Barnes and his subordinates and were unqualified for the jobs, the report said. … Barnes' lawyer, Charles Printz, said his client had the authority to spend construction money on firing ranges and fitness centers. Printz said the investigation was spurred by disgruntled employees and he expected his client to be cleared. … 'No monies were misappropriated,' Printz said in an e-mail response. … Barnes remains on the job, pending an administrative review. He could be fired, suspended or cleared."

OMB Warned USMS About Spending. USA Today (3/2, Kelley) reports, "Ten years ago, the White House budget office warned the U.S. Marshals Service to get its priorities straight: Money designated to improve courthouse security was not to be used for fitness centers or firing ranges. … The agency's construction account should be spent on securing areas used by prisoners, such as elevators, holding cells and entrances, Kenneth Schwartz, an Office of Management and

Budget (OMB) official, said in a letter to a top Justice Department administrator. … 'We are concerned with the oversight and priority setting within this program and request that the department continue to monitor USMS expenditures from this account closely,' Schwartz wrote." David Barnes, who oversees courthouse space for the Marshals Service, pressed the OMB to change the policy in several telephone conversations in 2001, Lisa Ward of the budget office told investigators. His arguments, repeated in letters, e-mails and statements to investigators: Marshals Service officers need to stay physically fit and practice their marksmanship, and facilities to do so were often expensive and far from their offices. … Eventually, the General Services Administration and the Justice Department agreed that the Marshals Service could request exemptions for the construction of firing ranges. The GSA is the independent agency responsible for construction and renovations of federal buildings. … Barnes' office asked for 14 waivers during 2003, but all were denied, records show." USA notes, "In 20 cities, Barnes found ways without waivers to get the GSA to build or renovate firing ranges and fitness centers, an internal Justice Department investigation found. … The investigation by the department's inspector general found Barnes shifted money among various construction projects and bypassed his supervisors to spend nearly $3.9 million on firing ranges and fitness centers at courthouses from Alaska to Florida, and wasted $440,000 in fees by paying for contractors and construction through the GSA rather than his agency. … In the report, Justice Department investigators cited the Marshals Service's lax oversight as a reason why Barnes' spending sometimes went undetected. A 2003 report from the department's inspector general found that the service couldn't always show it was spending its money the way Congress directed …"

Man In Minnesota Explosives Probe Left Homeless, Says Attorney. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/2, Xiong) reports, "A Bloomington man who was jailed then released after federal authorities confiscated several firearms and explosive materials from his house has been left homeless after the city condemned his house, according to his attorney." The Tribune continues, "Terry L. Dahlen, 60, and his wife are living with relatives after a city official said the couple have mice and too much clutter in their basement, garage and back yard, said attorney Joe Rymanowski. … 'Normally they don't condemn for that,' Rymanowski said. 'They say, "Clean it up."' Rymanowski said the couple were given until March 8 to clean up the house. … Dahlen has not been charged with any crime and was released from jail Wednesday afternoon. He agreed to be named for this story." The Tribune adds, "FBI agent Paul McCabe said only that the case is still under investigation. The state Bureau of Criminal of Apprehension and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) are part of the joint investigation into Dahlen. … Speaking on Dahlen's behalf, Rymanowski said his client is a gun and pyrotechnics hobbyist who used to be a licensed weapons manufacturer in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The materials and firearms seized by authorities are left over from the days he made firearms for sale to other hobbyists, Rymanowski said. … 'None of it was illegal,' he said. 'He wasn't building a bomb. He wasn't threatening anybody.' … Rymanowski said he's puzzled as to why federal authorities searched Dahlen's house, but added that they have been cooperative and professional. … Federal authorities have not said why or for how long Dahlen has been investigated. The Bloomington and Minneapolis bomb squads were called out to his home Monday in the 1700 block of W. 84th Street. Authorities also searched a commercial retail building at 5200 47th Av. S. in Minneapolis on Tuesday that belongs to his wife, who runs a salon at the address. 'Explosive materials' that required a bomb squad and the skills of military personnel also were found there. … Steve Bogdalek, assistant special agent in charge of the ATF, has said the materials found at both locations were not in danger of exploding."

FBI To Launch Northern Virginia Anti-Gang Task Force. The Washington Times (3/2, Taylor) reports, "The head of the FBI's Washington Field Office yesterday said he has created a new task force to pursue federal gun and racketeering charges against gang members in Northern Virginia." The Times continues, "Joseph Persichini Jr., the assistant director in charge of the field office, said the task force began its work about a week ago and is made up of eight to 10 agents and representatives from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and local law-enforcement agencies. … He said authorities hope to prosecute gang members using federal gun statutes and the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO). … 'We're looking for RICO indictments of people,' Mr. Persichini said during a wide-ranging interview with editors and reporters at The Washington Times. 'The key here also is using ATF and all the gun charges [because] many of those crimes are committed with weapons.'" The Times notes, "Mr. Persichini, who was appointed head of the field office in November after serving as its acting director since January 2006, said the effort is part of an increased focus on dealing with local violent crime, which he called a 'very serious concern.' … He also pointed to a recent uptick in violence in parts of the District. Mr. Persichini said he has spoken extensively with Acting Metropolitan Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier about gathering and sharing intelligence and that he talked with Mayor Adrian M. Fenty as recently as Wednesday night about comprehensive plans to thwart violent crime."

DOJ_NMG_0139196

FBI's "Best Undercover Agent" Profiled. Under the headline "Meet the FBI's 'Best Undercover Agent,'" the New York Sun (3/1, Capeci) writes, "At 6-foot 4-inches and more than 300 pounds, veteran FBI agent Joaquin 'Jack' Garcia is a small mountain of a man who is hard to miss. That's never stopped him from being a master of disguises. In recent years, the expert undercover agent's appointment calendar must have read a bit like the script for the 1960s screwball comedy 'If It's Tuesday, This Must Be Belgium.'" Garcia "surfaced last year when he took the stand in a closed courtroom to describe how he had played the role of a Gambino associate for 27 months. At the same time, Mr. Garcia was also posing as a New York capo in a 36-month FBI sting against crooked Florida cops in which four police officers were nailed last week on corruption charges (thus the reason for the secret testimony). That wasn't all: Sources tell Gang Land that Mr. Garcia worked undercover in three other successful organized crime and corruption cases during the same time frame. In Boston, he posed as a drug lord," and "during the same period, sources said, Mr. Garcia worked undercover in two separate cases in Atlantic City. In one involving Asian organized crime, he played the role of a wiseguy. In a political corruption probe that resulted last fall in guilty pleas by three city council members -- two from Atlantic City and one from Camden -- he posed as a Wall Street financier."

Four Men From Chicago Suburbs Charged In Drug-Trafficking Probe. The Chicago Tribune (3/1, Rozas) reports, "Four west suburban men have been charged in a nationwide investigation into a Mexican drug trafficking and money laundering ring that resulted in the arrests of 400 people in the last 20 months, authorities announced Wednesday." The Tribune continues, "The investigation, called Operation Imperial Emperor, targeted a Mexico-based drug trafficking organization authorities say is responsible for supplying tons of cocaine and large amounts of methamphetamine and marijuana to distribution cells on a monthly basis throughout the United States, U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales announced in San Diego." The Tribune adds, "In Illinois, Melrose Park authorities worked with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to arrest four men alleged to be selling drugs through two Melrose Park businesses. Jose Payan, Saul Leyva and Bogar Santana were each charged with conspiring with others with intent to distribute and distribution of more than 100 grams of heroin. According to the complaint, Payan told a cooperating source that he could go to Santana Automotive Inc. in the 3400 block of West Lake Street in Melrose Park to get a sample of the heroin, said Assistant U.S. Atty. April Perry. In the course of the Payan investigation, authorities seized more than 310 grams of methamphetamine and more than 240 grams of heroin, Perry said. … In a separate complaint, authorities charged Florentino Velazquez of Villa Park with conspiring with others to distribute and distribution of more than 1 kilogram of cocaine. He and an unknown man are alleged to have distributed 2 kilos of cocaine to a cooperating source, Perry said. Velazquez is alleged to have used an unnamed Melrose Park restaurant to sell the drugs and collect money, Perry said."

Law Enforcement Taking Lead In Sports Doping Probes. The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Shipley) reports, "The battle against the use of illegal performance-enhancing drugs by athletes is increasingly being led by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies as part of an expanding cooperative effort with the U.S. Olympic Committee's primary anti-doping body, according to law enforcement and anti-doping officials." The Post continues, "The latest manifestation of this collaboration came this week in the multi-state crackdown on illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs that led to the arrests Tuesday of eight people in three states, the officials said." The Post adds, "In the run-up to the bust, Drug Enforcement Agency agents in Mobile, Ala., contacted federal investigators involved in the probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, or Balco, in Northern California that has implicated dozens of Olympic and professional athletes, including baseball slugger Barry Bonds. The California investigators put them in touch with officials from the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency, with whom they have been closely cooperating for the past four years. … Within days, the USADA sent a chemist to Mobile to offer his expertise. Several DEA agents flew to Colorado Springs, where the anti-doping agency is based. There were frequent phone conversations. The cooperation illustrated the changing landscape of anti-doping enforcement, investigators say." The Post notes, "USADA officials say the collaboration also reflects the failure of a more than three-decade effort to contain the use of performance-enhancing drugs by competitive athletes through testing. These officials say that with the Beijing Olympics less than 18 months away they fear the use of even more sophisticated drugs and masking agents by athletes will continue to outpace testing methods. … The crackdown on the online pharmacies this week suggests how the relationship already is benefiting both sides. While law enforcement agents have said they are targeting the pharmacies and not necessarily their customers, the California investigators urged DEA agents to turn over evidence of any involvement by high-profile athletes to the USADA so it could start disciplinary proceedings against them."

DOJ_NMG_0139197

Murder Of Medical Marijuana Provider Highlights Risks Of Even Legal Sales. The New York Times (3/2, Johnson) reports from Denver, "Ken Gorman, an aging missionary of marijuana, was found murdered in his home here two weeks ago. The unsolved crime is exposing the tangled threads at the borderland of the legal and illegal drug worlds he inhabited." The Times continues, "Mr. Gorman, who was 60, legally provided marijuana to patients under Colorado's medical marijuana law, but he also openly preached the virtues of illegal use, and even ran for governor in the 1990s on a pro-drug platform. … In recent years, he had grown frightened as the mainstream medicine of cannabis care bumped against the unregulated and violent terrain of the illicit drug market. He had been robbed more than a dozen times in his home on Denver's west side, had recently gotten a gun and also talked of installing a steel door and gates." The times adds, "Some legal experts say Mr. Gorman's death could lead to a reconsideration of how medical marijuana is administered here and elsewhere. Providers are often left exposed and vulnerable because of the nation's conflicting drug laws, with marijuana use illegal under federal law but legalized for some medicinal purposes here and in 10 other states. … Since 1997, after the first medical marijuana law was passed in California, as many as 20 legal marijuana providers have been killed around the country, mostly in robberies, said Allen St. Pierre, the executive director of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or Norml, a nonprofit advocacy group in Washington." The Times notes, "Some in law enforcement, including Colorado's attorney general, John W. Suthers, say the Gorman killing illuminates more clearly than ever that crime and marijuana cannot be disentangled. … Many people in the medical marijuana supply system say the central risk comes down to the fact that they work in the shadows, where law enforcement officials are often either conflicted or hostile and crime is rampant. … Some critics said Mr. Gorman was caught up in his own image as a rebel, thwarting even the rules about medical marijuana that could further the causes he espoused. … And he had become an angry, fearful man, his friends and acquaintances said. Though he had served time in prison — five years for a felony drug conviction in the mid-1990s — and often seemed to scoff at the law, he had grown increasingly frustrated about being a crime victim himself."

US Global Survey Scrutinizes Counter-Narcotics Efforts. The AP (3/2) reports the United States "said yesterday that top antiterror allies Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Colombia had fallen short in the war on drugs despite enhanced counter-narcotics efforts, and it criticized perennial foes Iran, North Korea, and Venezuela for not cooperating. … In its annual global survey of the drug war, the [State Department] said massive opium poppy production in Afghanistan…continued to pose a major threat due to its links with groups such as the Taliban."

The Washington Times (3/2, Seper) reports the State Department "also said drug smugglers were hiding in the 'shadows of an open society' to link themselves with sophisticated criminal and terrorist organizations to launder millions of dollars in illicit profits."

Opium Production Rises In Afghanistan. The Hindustan Times (3/2) reports the US "has praised India's good record on counter-narcotics, but is worried that an alarming increase in poppy cultivation in Afghanistan is helping Taliban terrorists fund attacks on US and NATO forces. … The resurgence of Afghan opium cultivation has increased the flow of heroin to Europe, Russia and the Near East, which 'undermines those societies and the consolidation of democracy and security in Afghanistan,' the report stated."

Bloomberg (3/2) reports Afghanistan's opium production "reached a record in 2006 and the drug trade is supporting the Taliban insurgency to overthrow the government of President Hamid Karzai," according to the State Department. The country "produced 5,644 metric tons of opium compared with 4,475 metric tons in 2005, the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs said in a report."

Venezuela Seen As Enabling Drug Trade. El Universal (3/1) reported US authorities said Thursday that Venezuela, "with 'a rampant high level of corruption, weak judicial system and lack of international counternarcotics cooperation' is increasingly enabling a growing illicit drug transshipment industry. This forms part of the conclusion of the 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategy Report." The report "states that according to officials from the US embassy in Caracas, Venezuelan security forces are involved in the drug traffic."

USA Today (3/2) reports, "The number of flights from Venezuela suspected of ferrying Colombian cocaine to the Dominican Republic and Haiti — key transfer points for U.S.-bound shipments of the drug — increased 167% last year, State Department Assistant Secretary Anne Patterson said. She added that the leftist government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, a frequent critic of the United States, has allowed drug trafficking to flourish."

McClatchy Newspapers (3/2) writes, "In its harshest assessment yet of drug trafficking in Venezuela, the State Department on Thursday said the country is turning into a haven for smugglers because of corruption and the government's refusal to cooperate with other nations. … The Bush administration stepped up its criticism of Venezuela after Chavez ousted Drug Enforcement Administration agents from Venezuelan government facilities in late 2004, allegedly because they were spying. The two countries later negotiated an agreement to allow DEA agents to return, but

DOJ_NMG_0139198

Venezuela has so far refused to sign it, the report says." The Kansas City Star, San Jose Mercury News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, and Myrtle Beach Sun News used the McClatchy story.

Federal Officials Baffled By Mail Bomb Suspect. The AP (3/2, Hollingsworth) reports from Kansas City, MO, "He calls himself the Bishop. Exactly why is just one of the many mysteries surrounding the increasingly menacing figure. … The man -- and investigators believe they are dealing with a man -- is suspected of sending at least a half-dozen threatening letters to financial institutions over the past 18 months and mailing two dud pipe bombs that arrived a day apart in Kansas City and Chicago in January." The AP continues, "In his letters, the Bishop has demanded that financial companies move the prices of certain stocks to certain levels, often $6.66 -- an apparent reference to the Antichrist, said corporate counterterrorism expert Fred Burton. … Burton, whose security firm in Austin, Texas, has been hired by financial companies to find the Bishop, said the pipe bombs were assembled with crucial components deliberately left out, in what was probably a warning. Next time, Burton said, the bombs could be real. … But catching the Bishop and figuring out exactly what his grudge is could require help from the public, Burton said." The AP adds, "The Bishop, like the Unabomber, is probably mentally ill, highly intelligent and a loner, Burton said. … Postal inspectors are offering a reward of up to $100,000 for information. The investigation also includes the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and local police."

Alabama Man Accepts Plea Bargain In Bomb Case. The Mobile (AL) Press-Register (3/2, Kirby) reports, "A Flomaton man originally accused of making bombs has accepted a plea bargain, admitting to a misdemeanor." The Press-Register continues, "Gregory Wendell Nichols pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Mobile on Wednesday to improper storage of explosives. He faces a maximum of one year's incarceration, but prosecutors have agreed to recommend probation. U.S. Magistrate Judge Bert Milling Jr. set sentencing for March 23." The Press-Register adds, "A jury in January failed to reach a verdict in Nichols' case, and both sides were preparing to retry it this month. Jury selection had been scheduled for Monday. … But Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis and Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden struck a deal prior to Wednesday's hastily called hearing. Neither could be reached for comment Thursday. … As recently as Tuesday, both lawyers expressed confidence about winning the second round." The Press-Register notes, "Agents for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5 after getting a tip. Nichols permitted the agents to search his white Ford Ranger pickup truck, and they reported finding five homemade explosive devices. … Nichols admitted that he made the devices using spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He told jurors last month that he packed the cylindrical canisters -- which were about 2 inches long -- with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape and attached a firecracker fuse. … But Nichols insisted the devices were firecrackers, not bombs. He told jurors that he made them so that he and his fiancée could drop them into a river. He said he never intended to hurt anyone."

IMMIGRATION:

Kennedy Denies Taking "Secretive" Approach To Immigration Bill. The Washington Times (3/2, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Far from being secretive, the top senator drafting the major Senate immigration bill this year says he has invited a host of senators to help out and has kept the Bush administration in the loop the entire time, despite accusations to the contrary." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, "chairman of the immigration subcommittee, has held several meetings with lawmakers, including a recent one with top Republican and Democratic senators on the issue. He also talked with President Bush in January and last week spoke with White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten about the bill, Mr. Kennedy's office says." Kennedy said yesterday, "I look forward to introducing a comprehensive immigration reform bill with Sen. John McCain and our House colleagues in the coming weeks and continuing to work with the bipartisan coalition behind the legislation that passed the Senate last year." On Wednesday, Sen. Arlen Specter, "the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee, used the committee's first immigration hearing of the year to publicly accuse Mr. Kennedy of leaving him and his staff out of the process."

NYTimes Derides Chertoff, Gutierrez Silence On "Path To Citizenship." The New York Times (3/2, 1.16M) editorializes, "On Wednesday, Congress took its first crack at immigration reform since the great nothing of 2006. The Senate Judiciary Committee invited Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez to testify on the issue. With a new Congress and a new comprehensive immigration bill expected to be introduced in the Senate within days, the hearing could have been the first spark of a rejuvenated campaign by an alliance of Congressional Democrats, moderate Republicans and the Bush administration to finally solve a problem that has festered for too long." But "it wasn't. That's because both Mr. Chertoff and Mr. Gutierrez slunk away from a central pillar of comprehensive reform: a path to citizenship that would give illegal immigrants -- the ones who wait and prove they deserve it -- the chance to participate fully and proudly in the life of this country." The Times adds that if President Bush "is too weakened to stand up for comprehensive reform, then Democrats and Republicans in Congress need to unite and do it for him."

DOJ_NMG_0139199

LATimes Says Colorado's Case Illustrates Failure Of "Strictly Punitive Approach." The Los Angeles Times (3/2, 850K) editorializes, "Immigrants are fleeing Colorado because of harsh laws passed during a special session of the Legislature last summer that require state identification for government services and allow police to check suspects' immigration status. The ID laws have raised the ire even of many native-born people, who complain about hassles for those trying to get a driver's license. If chasing away immigrants has caused problems in Colorado, imagine the economic chaos it would bring to California, where immigrants make up about a third of the workforce and the agriculture industry dwarfs Colorado's." Colorado "is learning a painful lesson about the foolishness of a piecemeal, state-by-state response to illegal immigration and about the economic effect of a strictly punitive approach."

TAX:

SEC Probing Google's Tax Accounting Methods. The Financial Times (3/2, Waters) reports, "Google's method of accounting for income taxes has come under the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission, the first time since its 2004 initial public offering that it has attracted the attention of securities regulators." The Times continues, "The internet search company disclosed the informal inquiry in its latest 10K annual report, which was filed on Thursday. The SEC had first approached it for information about its tax accounting in March last year, the company said, leading to an exchange of letters that is still ongoing." The Times adds, "The SEC's initial approach came just weeks after Google had surprised Wall Street with the news that its tax rate had climbed unexpectedly in the final quarter of 2005. That, in turn, dented its profits, contributing to a slide in its share price that persisted for much of last year. It took nine months for Google's shares finally to climb decisively back above their level of early January. … Google blamed the high tax charge on a shift in its business mix, which had seen more of its investment spending move to faster-growing international markets and away from the US. As a result, a higher proportion of its profits were attributed to its operations in its domestic market, where it generally faces a higher tax rate than elsewhere."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Walter Reed Commander Relieved Of Duty. Maj. Gen. George Weightman has been relieved of duty as commander of the Walter Reed Army Hospital. ABC World News (3/1, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Weightman "was relieved of his command because wounded troops at Walter Reed were found to be living in substandard conditions and not getting the care they deserved." ABC (Kerley) added Weightman "was in the job for six months. But Pentagon leaders say they lost trust and confidence in General Weightman's leadership." Robert Gates, Secretary of Defense: "I don't have very much patience with people who don't step up to the plate, in terms of addressing problems." Kerley: "Secretary Gates says change was needed, after last week's stunning 'Washington Post' investigation, of this outpost facility for wounded troops, known as Building 18." Today, the Army "tapped Lieutenant General Kevin Kiley, who ran Walter Reed between 2002 and 2004 to return temporarily some are surprised with his appointment. Just last week, he toured Building 18 and toured the conditions there." Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, MD, Army Surgeon General: "While we have issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure of Walter Reed." Kerley: "Veterans advocates say they complained for years to Kiley about wilding 18."

The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 4, 2:30, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "The Army fired Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman at the urging of Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who today met with a panel to investigate conditions at Walter Reed." Emerging from "a closed door briefing with Gates, Senator Jack Reed predicted it won't end with Weightman, who had been in charge at Walter Reed for only six months." Sen. Jack Reed: "My sense is whatever responsibility he shares is not his alone, and that they have to look carefully at others." Martin: "Congressman Bill Young, who used to visit Walter Reed frequently, says commanders have been ignoring complaints about patient care ever since the war started." Rep. C. W. Bill Young: "We felt that the command was very unhappy with our presence because they didn't like us calling attention to their problems."

NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 4, 2:20, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "The growing scandal centers around Building 18, where wounded soldiers were forced to live in roach- and rat-infested rooms with mold-covered walls. An Army statement today said senior Army leadership has lost trust and confidence in the commander's leadership ability. But the Army's decision to put the former Walter Reed commander temporarily back in charge has created still more controversy. Lieutenant General Kevin Kiley was in charge at Walter Reed until six months ago and only last week appeared to play down concerns over conditions at Building 18." Pentagon officials "say Kiley's temporary assignment upset Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who hinted Kiley could also get the ax." Robert Gates, Secretary of Defense: "I don't have very much patience with people who don't step up to the plate in terms of addressing problems that are under their responsibility."

DOJ_NMG_0139200

The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Vogel, Branigin, 690K) reports the "appointment of Kiley, who had earlier been the facility's commander, surprised some Defense Department officials because soldiers, their families and veterans' advocates have complained that he had long been aware of problems at Walter Reed and did nothing to improve its outpatient care." The action "came 10 days after a Washington Post series exposed the squalid living conditions for some outpatient soldiers at Walter Reed and bureaucratic problems that prevented many from getting the care they need." Kiley was "commander at Walter Reed until 2004. He has called the Post stories a 'one-sided representation' of conditions at the facility." The Army is "already cracking down on some staff members after the reports of poor care. A number of soldiers have been reassigned from their duties at Walter Reed, including a captain and several sergeants, according to an Army official." The Army said "the decision to relieve Weightman was made Wednesday after several days of consideration. Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey consulted with Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, and Gen. Richard A. Cody, the vice chief of staff, according to Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman."

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Havemann, 850K) reports, "Deteriorating conditions at Walter Reed -- especially during a war in which the ratio of wounded soldiers to killed is far higher than in any previous conflict -- have posed a problem for President Bush, who speaks regularly to the nation's debt to its returning soldiers. He frequently has visited the hospital and its patients."

USA Today/AP (3/2, 4A, Burns) reports the Army said Weightman "was the wrong person to fix embarrassing failures in the treatment of wounded soldiers that have soiled the institution's reputation as a first-class hospital." Secretary Gates "issued a brief statement Thursday endorsing Harvey's action against Weightman."

The New York Times (3/2, Cloud, 1.16M) reports the "revelations about conditions at the hospital, one of the Army's best-known and busiest centers for treating soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan, have embarrassed the Army and prompted two investigations, several Congressional inquiries and a rush to clean up the accommodations for outpatients, where residents lived with mold on the walls, stained carpets and other problems." Treatment of "wounded soldiers has also been spotlighted recently in a documentary recounting the treatment received by the ABC News anchorman Bob Woodruff, who was wounded in Iraq last year."

The Financial Times (3/2, Sevastopulo) reports the Pentagon "has been quick to condemn the conditions at Walter Reed, which were revealed as President George W. Bush attempts to shore up moribund support for his military 'surge' in Iraq. A recent ABC News/Washington Post poll showed that public support for the conflict in Iraq continues to slide." The Walter Reed "scandal has generated bi-partisan criticism from lawmakers who have in recent weeks been more busy debating the merits of the surge." Sen. Hillary Clinton said, "Our nation has a duty to honour and support those who have served and sacrificed so much in the defence of our nation. Yet these recent news reports indicate that for nearly four years since the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq began, not enough has been done to assist these courageous men and women in recovering from the wounds of battle." The Times adds the "response from the Pentagon stands in contrast to the aftermath of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Donald Rumsfeld, the former secretary of defence, came under criticism for not firing any senior officers over the scandal which tainted the US image worldwide."

Senate Freshmen Take Lead On Response To Walter Reed Scandal. McClatchy (3/2, Goldstein) reports Sens. Claire McCaskill and Barack Obama "led the charge this week on one of the hottest war-related controversies since Abu Ghraib," introducing "legislation that would ensure that wounded soldiers are housed in clean conditions, have quick access to care and face an easier time claiming their disability benefits."

Nicholson Says Walter Reed Circumstances "Unacceptable." ABC World News (3/1, story 4, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Secretary for Veterans Affairs called the circumstances at Walter Reed absolutely unacceptable. Jim Nicholson also told the House Budget Committee that improvements in wounded veterans' care overall will be made, including new efforts to identify and treat traumatic brain injury, which Bob Woodruff has been covering for this broadcast."

WPost Questions Kiley's Appointment To Head Walter Reed. The Washington Post (3/2, A12, 690K) says in an editorial, "We are glad that the Army is finally taking the issue of outpatient care seriously enough to effectively end the career of a major general for presiding over the disgraceful condition of Building 18. But the evidence compiled so far suggests that Gen. Kiley has been more complicit in the scandalous neglect of Walter Reed's outpatient facilities for longer than Gen. Weightman has been. It also indicates that the Army's reshuffle is really about projecting the appearance of accountability, not punishing those most responsible." As Rep. Bill Young "said yesterday of Gen. Weightman, 'I don't know him. But I know he's the fall guy.'"

DOJ_NMG_0139201

Rice Names Critic Of US Iraq Policies To Counselor's Post. The Washington Post (3/2, A5, Kessler, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has named Eliot A. Cohen, "a prominent writer on national security strategy and an outspoken critic of the administration's postwar occupation of Iraq," as her counselor, State Department officials said yesterday. Despite Cohen's "sometimes caustic views on administration policies," officials said he has "impressed both Rice and President Bush with his writings," especially "Supreme Command," a study of the relationship between civilian commanders in chief and their military leaders. In selecting Cohen, Rice "has lured a leading figure of the neoconservative movement as her policies toward North Korea and Iran draw fierce attack from the Republican Party's right wing." The position "does not require Senate confirmation," and Cohen is expected to formally take the post in April.

Defying Veto Threat, House Democrats Pass Union Bill. The AP (3/2, Abrams) reports, "Democrats rewarded organized labor Thursday for helping them retake control of Congress, passing a House bill that would make it easier for workers to start unions against companies' wishes." The legislation, "passed 241-185 on a nearly party-line vote, would take away the right of employers to demand secret-ballot elections by workers before unions could be recognized." The House action "was the second triumph for labor following the Democratic takeover of Congress. The House and Senate also have voted on separate bills to raise the minimum wage." Labor groups "saw the Employee Free Choice Act as one way of halting the downward trend of union membership, now about 12 percent of the work force." But "the celebrations may be short-lived. Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., has pledged to block the bill and the White House says President Bush will veto the measure if it reaches his desk." The House vote "was short of the two-thirds majority that would be needed to overturn a veto."

The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Maher, 2.04M) reports, "The Employee Free Choice Act would let workers choose to join a union once a majority sign cards, a process that would be quicker and less open to employer opposition than a traditional secret-ballot election. Union officials believe it would help reverse labor's decline." Union membership "currently stands at 7.4% of the private-sector work force, down from roughly 20% in the early 1980s."

The New York Times (3/2, Greenhouse, 1.16M) notes Republicans "argued that the bill, the Employee Free Choice Act, was a betrayal of workers' access to a secret-ballot election. Some called it the 'employee intimidation act,' maintaining that the process of majority sign-up could well entail union organizers' bullying workers into signing pro-union cards." Speaker Nancy Pelosi, meanwhile, "called the bill 'the most important labor law reform legislation of this generation.'"

USA Today (3/2, 6A, 2.27M) briefly notes the vote, while the Washington Post (3/2, A4, Russakoff, 690K) cats the House Democratic move as the continuation of "the populist tone of its first 100 hours." The lobbying campaign "leading up to the vote featured AFL-CIO ads highlighting workers who were fired during union-organizing campaigns, and who waited years to get jobs back or to receive back pay." The "business community's campaign was led by a coalition of 300 business organizations in all 50 states, calling itself the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace. The group aired radio ads calling the legislation anti-worker and antidemocratic, and said its efforts generated 27,000 contacts of House members from within the targeted districts."

The Washington Times (3/2, Lengell, 88K) notes McConnell "vowed to fight the bill. 'We will not allow the progress already made on behalf of U.S. workers to be undone, nor will we allow coercion by employers or unions,' Mr. McConnell said." The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Henessy-Fiske, Simon, 850K) also reports the story.

Kimberley Strassel writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/2, 2.04M), "For Big Labor, this week's 'card check' victory marked the ultimate payoff for past Democratic election support. For House Democrats, it marked the end of the honeymoon. … The card check will be the biggest change in labor law in decades," yet Democrats "allowed but a single hearing and markup on the issue. That hearing was held in the middle of the House's very public Iraq debate, the better to avoid any notice." The issue "exploded nonetheless, and it was the party's moderate wing that got caught in the crossfire." Pelosi "might remember that she only won last year's election because of the success of these moderate candidates."

Bush's Pick To Head Consumer Product Safety Commission Riles Critics. The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "President Bush said Thursday that he would nominate a senior executive of the largest organization representing the nation's manufacturers to head the government agency assigned to protect consumers from dangerous products." Bush's "choice of Michael E. Baroody, executive vice president of the National Assn. of Manufacturers, to be chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission drew an angry response from consumer advocates and predictions of a tough battle for Senate confirmation from the Democratic majority." Critics, "noting Baroody's work for an organization that aims to ease restrictions on a long list of companies making consumer goods, said the nomination would reflect an administration effort to restrict government regulations by executive order and action, rather than by congressional approval."

DOJ_NMG_0139202

Ambassadorial Nomination May Be Blocked Over Swift Boat Vets Donation. The New York Times (3/2, Luo, 1.16M) reports, "Senator John Kerry may get his parting shot after all. After his having name sullied during the 2004 presidential campaign by the opposition group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, Mr. Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat, got the chance on Tuesday to sharply question Sam Fox, a major Republican donor who was recently nominated to be ambassador to Belgium, about his $50,000 contribution to the group." In addition, "some of Mr. Kerry's Democratic colleagues on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee now say they will consider voting against Mr. Fox's nomination." Kerry "declined on Thursday to say how he would vote."

Bill Would Ease Release Of Presidential Papers. The Washington Post (3/2, A11, Williamson, 690K) reports a bipartisan proposal "targeting White House rules on the release of presidential papers would claw back power over public records from the executive branch, advocates of the bill say." The House measure, "introduced yesterday, would overturn President Bush's 2001 executive order adding layers of review before presidential papers are made public. Historians and archivists say the order has kept thousands of documents from public view." In a statement, one of the bill's sponsors, Oversight and Government Reform Chairman Rep. Henry A. Waxman, said, Bush's order "gave current and former presidents and vice presidents broad authority to withhold presidential records or delay their release indefinitely." The Post adds co-sponsors "include Reps. Todd R. Platts (R-Pa.), William Lacy Clay (D-Mo.) and Dan Burton (R-Ind.)."

Hoyer Bill Would Reduce Health-Care Premium Costs For Federal Employees. The Washington Post's (3/2, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) introduced a bill that would increase the government's contribution toward federal employee health-care premiums -- as he had pledged he would to two unions earlier this week. Under the proposal, the government would pay 80 percent [instead of the current 72 percent] of the cost of premiums in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, saving the average federal worker about $500 annually." The Post adds that while the "rate of premium growth in the federal employee program has slowed in recent years," a "number of insurance plans in the federal program raised their premiums by more than the average 1.8 percent increase. Premiums for health maintenance organizations, for example, rose by 6.3 percent, and some Washington area federal HMOs raised their rates higher." The Post adds, "The prospects for Hoyer's proposal are uncertain, in part because Congress is under pressure to reduce the federal deficit and rein in spending. His proposal also runs counter to a Bush administration plan, announced last month, that would reduce the government's contribution to health-care premiums for new retirees with less than 10 years of federal service."

Cheney Fires Up Activists With Speech At Conservative Conference. The Washington Times (3/2, Curl, 88K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney yesterday fired up hundreds of conservatives at their annual conference in Washington, drawing cheers when he upbraided Democrats for not realizing an 'inconvenient truth' -- that Iraq is the central front in the global war on terrorism." Taking "direct aim at former Vice President Al Gore, who starred in the film 'An Inconvenient Truth' that won an Academy Award last week for best documentary," Cheney said, "In these circumstances it's worth reminding ourselves that, like it or not, the enemy we face in the war on terror has made Iraq the primary front in that war. To use a popular phrase, this is an inconvenient truth." Speaking at "the Conservative Political Action Conference on its opening night," Cheney touted "the president's tax cuts and health care proposal," and "also chastised Democratic senators for moving to trim funding for the war and deliver a vote of no-confidence against Mr. Bush, as when the House passed a nonbinding resolution criticizing Mr. Bush's troop 'surge' proposal. 'The fact is that every statement we make has multiple audiences,' he said. 'The enemy listens, and so do the Iraqi people. A watching world needs to know that the United States is determined to prevail because we're a nation that keeps its word, and because we understand the consequences of failure,' he said to applause."

Angry Conservatives Suggest Withholding Support From '08 GOP Hopefuls. The Boston Globe (3/2, Milligan, 413K) reports, "Leading conservatives Thursday attacked the Republican Party as big-government, free-spending coddlers of illegal immigrants, and said the country's conservatives should withhold support from the GOP's current slate of presidential nominees to force them to the right. 'I feel very angry and betrayed' by the GOP, some of whose elected officials have backed a 'guest worker' immigration plan, abortion rights and tax increases, said Richard Viguerie, chairman of Conservative-HQ.com. 'We should withhold support from all major Republican [presidential] candidates today. Not one of them deserves our support today,'" he said "at the Conservative Political Action Conference annual meeting Thursday." He also said "conservatives should withhold 'all support' from GOP national committees, which Viguerie said have not produced federal candidates who adhere to conservative principles." The Globe notes, "Conservatives said they are frustrated and angry, blaming the GOP's massive losses in the 2006 elections on Republicans who deviated from a hard-line conservative agenda. The mood also puts added pressure on a slew of GOP presidential candidates set to speak to the CPAC meeting Friday."

DOJ_NMG_0139203

Despite Low Poll Ratings, Bush Remains Fundraising Heavyweight For GOP. The Los Angeles Times (3/2, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "President Bush insists that he will stay out of the race over who will succeed him, at least until a Republican nominee is chosen. But that isn't keeping him from becoming the chief fundraiser for Republicans, his low poll ratings notwithstanding. Bush helped raise $10.4 million for the Republican Governors Association earlier this week, and he will be the star attraction at a fundraising dinner Friday in Louisville for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, a Kentucky Republican, and the National Republican Senatorial Committee. It is expected to bring in more than $2 million." GOP "activists and advisers say the president is likely to speak at several fundraising events a month in each of the coming months, showing that Bush still has considerable power to help his party even though his approval ratings have averaged well below 50 percent throughout his second term."

NYTimes/CBS Poll Shows Bush Approval Rating Dropping Among Republicans. The New York Times (3/2, Connelly, 1.16M) reports that a New York Times/CBS News Poll shows President Bush's "approval rating dropped 13 percentage points since last fall among Republicans, 65 percent of whom now say they approve of the way he is handling his job as president, compared with 78 percent last October." Twenty-nine percent "of all Americans" say "they approve of the way he is doing his job, compared with 34 percent at the end of October. Sixty-one percent disapproved, compared with 58 percent in October." Meanwhile, 23% "of those polled approved of the way Mr. Bush is dealing with the situation in Iraq," while 25% "approved of his handling of foreign policy. Even the president's campaign against terrorism, long his signature issue, is seen positively by only 40 percent of those polled, while 53 percent disapprove." And 75%, "including 52 percent of Republicans, say there is not much the United States military can do to reduce the sectarian fighting in Iraq. Over all, 23 percent of the public say the country is going in the right direction and 68 percent see it as 'on the wrong track.'" The nationwide telephone survey of 1,281 adults was conducted Feb. 23-27 and has a margin of error of +/- 3%. Among Republicans, the margin of error is +/- 5%.

Krauthammer Defends Funding Manned Space Exploration. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (3/1, A13, 690K), columnist Charles Krauthammer writes that there are two sets of critics to President Bush's program envisioning a moon base by 2020 and a future journey to Mars: "the Luddite left and the science purists." He says, "They would not build a moon base at all. The Luddites have long opposed manned exploration as a waste of resources when, as the mantra goes, we have so many problems here on Earth. I find this objection incomprehensible. When will we stop having problems here on Earth?" The "idea this time is not to go to plant a flag, take a golf shot and leave, but to stay and form a real self-sustaining, extraterrestrial human colony." Science purists say that unmanned missions are more cost-effective. "Pound for pound, dollar for dollar, manned exploration does bring back less science than robots. But it still brings back science. Humans can discover things through intuition and pattern recognition that machines thinking in algorithms cannot. Imagine the scientific possibilities if today we had humans patrolling Mars rather than the brilliantly programmed but still limited golf carts now roaming the surface."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Lower, But Markets Appear To Steady. The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 5, 1:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Stocks resumed their slide after a one-day break. The Dow lost 34 points today, the NASDAQ about 12. But it could have been worse." CBS (Mason) added, "It was another whip-saw day here on Wall Street. … At the opening bell, the Dow went into a panicked plunge. In just four minutes, it plummeted more than 200 points." But "stocks steadied helped by a strong manufacturing report, and then rallied back."

The New York Times (3/2, Bajaj, Peters, 1.16M) reports "the Dow recovered and traded in positive territory for brief periods before ending the day down 34.29 points, or 0.3 percent. The volatility was a reminder that concerns persist." The S.& P. 500 "closed down 0.3 percent, or 3.65 points, at 1,403.17." NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 7, :25, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on "another wild ride on Wall Street today." The Wall Street Journal (3/2, C1, McKay, 2.04M), USA Today (3/2, 3B, Shell, 2.27M) and Washington Post (3/2, D1, Cho, Tse, 690K), among other newspapers, also report the stock numbers this morning.

Manufacturing Report Shows Signs Of Recovery. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Whitehouse, Aeppel, 2.04M) reports, "The US manufacturing sector showed signs of recovering from a recent slump, striking a positive note that boosted stocks and eased concerns the nation's economy could be headed for recession." The Institute for Supply Management "reported yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity rose to 52.3 in February from 49.3 the previous month. The index for new orders, an indicator of future activity, rose to 54.9 from 50.3. Any reading above 50 suggests the sector is expanding." The ISM survey "caught some economists and investors by surprise, because other recent indicators had shown manufacturing faltering."

DOJ_NMG_0139204

Paulson Says Economy's Outlook Remains Strong. The Financial Times (3/2, Callan) reports, "The outlook for the US economy is healthy, though concerns remain about domestic protectionism and the slow pace of Chinese currency appreciation, US Treasury secretary Hank Paulson said on Thursday." The remarks, in a speech to the Economic Club of Washington, "followed positive figures on US personal incomes and manufacturing, which helped lift the Dow Jones index from an earlier 209-point drop. 'I am watching developments carefully, and I believe that the US economy is healthy,' he said." But "the turbulence in US markets indicated investors remain worried about the economy, with concern centred on doubts about what will happen next in two sectors that are important contributors to growth: housing and manufacturing."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (3/2, D1, Henderson, 690K) reports that "after several days of financial market turmoil and conflicting economic reports, analysts are having second thoughts. Yesterday, several said they saw rising risks of higher inflation and much weaker economic growth." But "more-optimistic observers pointed yesterday to a Commerce Department report that consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of the nation's economic activity, rose briskly in January, while incomes climbed even more rapidly."

Greenspan Says Recession Not "Probable." The Wall Street Journal (3/2, Man, McCallum, 2.04M) reports, "Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan toned down his warning that the US might slip into a recession later this year, saying he doesn't think such a slowdown is 'probable,' according to investment bank CLSA Asia-Pacific Markets, which hosted Mr. Greenspan's speech. 'It is possible we can get a US recession toward the end of this year, but I don't think it's probable,' Mr. Greenspan was quoted by CLSA as telling the audience here."

The New York Times (3/2, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "They are marketed as 'intimate conversations' with…Greenspan, and groups pay about $150,000 to hear his economic outlook." But yesterday, "for the second time this week, these private chats went public, jolting financial markets around the world and upstaging Ben S. Bernanke, Mr. Greenspan's successor as chairman of the Federal Reserve." The Times adds, "First on Monday and then again on Thursday, Mr. Greenspan upset stock markets merely by uttering the word 'recession' and saying that one might but probably would not occur by the end of this year."

Bernanke's "Steady Hand" Praised. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Lawmakers in both parties welcome Fed chief's reassuring midweek testimony, which followed market-rattling commentary from predecessor Greenspan. Rep. Jim Cooper praises Bernanke for a 'steady hand' at the central bank." The Journal adds, "Treasury's Paulson, on the job less than a year, spoke by phone with Bush but offered little publicly to calm investor jitters."

Krugman Predicts "Great Meltdown" Is Underway. In a column dated "Feb. 27, 2008," Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (3/2, 1.16M), "The great market meltdown of 2007 began exactly a year ago, with a 9 percent fall in the Shanghai market, followed by a 416-point slide in the Dow. But as in the previous global financial crisis, which began with the devaluation of Thailand's currency in the summer of 1997, it took many months before people realized how far the damage would spread." Krugman says "all sorts of implausible explanations were offered for the drop in US stock prices. It was, some said, the fault of Alan Greenspan, the former chairman of the Federal Reserve, as if his statement of the obvious -- that the housing slump could possibly cause a recession -- had been news to anyone. One Republican congressman blamed Representative John Murtha, claiming that his efforts to stop the 'surge' in Iraq had somehow unnerved the markets." Krugman continues, "By early 2007, the collapse of the US housing boom had brought with it widespread defaults on subprime mortgages — loans to home buyers who fail to meet the strictest lending standards. Lenders insisted that this was an isolated problem, which wouldn't spread to the rest of the market or to the real economy. But it did."

Poll Finds Majority Favors Guarantee Of Health Insurance. The New York Times (3/2, Toner, elder, 1.16M) reports that a nationwide New York Times/CBS News poll of 1,281 adults conducted Feb. 23-27, with a margin of plus or minus 3 percent, found "a majority of Americans say the federal government should guarantee health insurance to every American, especially children, and are willing to pay higher taxes to do it." The Times continues, "While the war in Iraq remains the overarching issue in the early stages of the 2008 campaign, access to affordable health care is at the top of the public's domestic agenda, ranked far more important than immigration, cutting taxes or promoting traditional values." The Times also notes that those polled "showed a striking willingness…to make tradeoffs to guarantee health insurance for all, including paying as much as $500 more in taxes a year and forgoing future tax cuts." However, "Americans remain divided, largely along party lines, over whether the government should require everyone to participate in a national health care plan, and over whether the government would do a better job than the private insurance industry in providing coverage."

DOJ_NMG_0139205

McCain Pledges To Accept Public Funds For General Election. The New York Times (3/2, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports Sen. John McCain "joined Senator Barack Obama on Thursday in promising to accept a novel fund-raising truce if each man wins his party's presidential nomination." The promises by McCain and Obama "are an effort to resuscitate part of the ailing public financing system for presidential campaigns." Such a "pact would eliminate any financial edge one candidate might have and limit each campaign to $85 million for the general election. The two candidates would have to return any private donations that they had raised for that period." Obama "laid out his proposal last month to the Federal Election Commission, seeking an opinion on its legality. The commissioners formally approved it on Thursday."

The Politico (3/2, Vogel) reports Sen. McCain "raised the stakes Thursday in an emerging campaign finance showdown among the major presidential candidates." The moves "by McCain, the senior senator from Arizona, and Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, seemed designed to solidify their positions as the field's leading advocates for reducing the influence of money in politics. But their pledges will also put some pressure on the other leading candidates from both parties to follow." Democrats Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards "both indicated they might take that newly open option. But neither went as far as Obama or McCain." Among the GOP contenders, "former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani plans to start collecting general election money, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is considering it. Neither would match the pledges made by McCain or Obama."

The AP (3/2, Kuhnhenn) reports McCain's campaign said he "will opt out of the post-Watergate presidential public financing system unless the Democratic nominee agrees to campaign under the same financial restrictions." The McCain camp's "decision came after the Federal Election Commission eased some political fundraising rules in hopes of salvaging the tattered presidential financing system in the 2008 campaign. By a 5-0 vote, the commission said presidential candidates may solicit private contributions for the general election now and still be eligible for public financing if they become their party's nominee."

McCain Apologizes For Saying Soldiers' Lives "Wasted." The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 6, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "McCain did not expect to be trailing anyone at this point in his second run at the Republican nomination. What happened?" CBS (Schieffer) added, "Well, he surely didn't, and now Giuliani has a big lead in the polls, at least. I think it is because John McCain is a Senator. He has a record. Anything he does, he gets a lot of publicity, like last night on Letterman, he said a lot of lives were being wasted in Iraq. The blogs and the Democrats attacked him. Today he had to apologize and say what he meant to say was a lot of lives were being sacrificed. On the other hand, Giuliani is so far sort of running under the radar. He's campaigning a lot but he's not holding many news conferences. He's not being on national television very much. So he is not being cut on for being pro-gay rights and pro-abortion, things a lot of Republicans don't like. Eventually he's going to have to answer those questions, but right now, he's managed to keep the focus on being a smart and decisive leader on 9/11. That cannot last once he has to start asking these and answering these questions. But for now it is working, and John McCain, Katie, is the one being hurt by it."

NBC Nightly News (3/1, story 5, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Nobody questions John McCain's military credentials, but it's something he said when he announced his presidential campaign last night that has some people today questioning his choice of words in what is already a tough campaign this early on." NBC (Gregory) added, "On the campaign trail today, the man known for straight talk was instead taking back something else he told David Letterman about Iraq." Sen. John McCain: "We wasted a lot of our most precious treasure which is American lives over there." Gregory: "Today this statement from McCain – 'Last evening, I referred to American casualties in Iraq as wasted. I should have used the word sacrificed as I have in the past.' The Letterman appearance was seen as an attempt to breathe new life into a campaign that's been stumbling." Byron York, National Review: "I think this is an effort to show the energetic, hard-charging McCain is back at it." Gregory: "At a gathering of conservatives in Washington, activists were distributing a 23-page attack on McCain, saying, he's no Ronald Reagan and listing his positions they oppose." David Bossie, conservative activist: "He has bucked the conservative issues year after year in the United States Senate and why now should he be rewarded with being the standard bearer of the Republican Party?"

ABC World News (3/1, story 6, :50, Gibson, 8.78M) did not report on the controversy over McCain's remark, but reported he "has confirmed what everyone expected. He's running for president. All the candidates are looking for ways to make their announcement stand out. Senator McCain made his declaration on the David Letterman show last night." Sen. John McCain: "I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States."

Another AP story (3/2, Sidoti) says "the episode underscored the intense scrutiny in store for McCain -- the freewheeling candidate of 2000 -- while he seeks the presidency as one of the GOP's strongest contenders and as the country wages an unpopular war to which McCain is perhaps forever linked." The AP adds that "10 months before the first primary votes, McCain's work to woo the GOP base -- and become the party's standard-bearer -- is just beginning, and he must overcome a spate of hurdles to get the Republican nomination." He "must convince Republican primary voters that they can trust him to be a loyal party champion who will adhere to GOP's core principles -- and not waver."

DOJ_NMG_0139206

The New York Times (3/2, Nagourney, 1.16M) notes Sen. Barack Obama "made a similar remark in a visit to Iowa after announcing his candidacy. 'We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged, and to which we now have spent $400 billion and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted,' he said." McCain "was criticized on Thursday by the Democratic National Committee for making the remark, just as Mr. Obama had been criticized by conservative groups." The Washington Times (3/2, Bellantoni, 88K) also reports the story.

Santorum Says He Would Back Any GOP Candidate Except McCain. The Politico (3/2, Budoff) reports, "Former Sen. Rick Santorum has drawn at least one conclusion about the Republican presidential primary field: Anybody but John McCain." Santorum, "who signed a contract Thursday as a Fox News contributor, said that he has spoken with every GOP candidate except the senator from Arizona but that it's still too early for him to endorse. 'The only one I wouldn't support is McCain,' Santorum said during an interview in his office at the Ethics and Public Policy Center in Washington, where he is a senior fellow. 'I don't agree with him on hardly any issues,' Santorum said. 'I don't think he has the temperament and leadership ability to move the country in the right direction.'"

FEC Gives Obama Leeway To Accept Public Financing. The Chicago Tribune (3/2, McCormick, 617K) reports the Federal Election Commission "said Thursday that presidential candidates may accept private contributions for potential general election campaigns and still remain eligible for public financing if they ultimately win their party's nomination." The ruling "came after a request for clarification from Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who has suggested he would like the option of running a publicly financed general election campaign — with its associated spending limits — if he could convince a future Republican opponent to do the same." However, political observers "say the ruling is likely a moot point since a financial truce is highly unlikely in an era where political advertising, organization and travel are extremely expensive and both parties will be ferociously fighting for a White House with no incumbent." The decision, "in a 5-0 vote, comes as front-runners from both parties have forgone public funds and spending limits for the primaries."

The Financial Times (3/2, Luce) reports the FEC "unanimously upheld a request by Barack Obama, one of the leading Democratic presidential candidates, to continue to raise private funds without closing off his right to public financing if he were nominated as his party's candidate." Obama said he "would do all that he could to preserve the US's virtually broken system of public election financing. His stance contrasts sharply with that of Mrs Clinton, who announced in January that she would rely solely on private sources of money for both the party primaries and the general election."

The Politico (3/2, Vogel) reports the FEC's decision "is likely to have little practical long-term impact. And it could leave Obama, the junior senator from Illinois and among the front-runners for the Democratic nomination for president, in a tricky spot." Election lawyers and political analysts "say the fiscal and political landscape of the 2008 campaign make it unlikely that either major party nominee will use that flexibility." Together, the nominees "are expected to spend upwards of $1 billion on their campaigns. By that calculation, nominees who go the new route could be required to return roughly $165 million each soon after their respective conventions – typically the start of an expensive advertising blitz that continues through the November general election – in order to qualify for $85 million in matching public funds."

WPost Says All Candidates Should Pledge To Take Public Financing. The Washington Post (3/2, A12, 690K) says in an editorial, "Thanks to an innovative request from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, the Federal Election Commission voted yesterday to try to salvage the endangered public financing system for presidential elections. Now it is up to presidential candidates who claim to support that system to put real commitment behind their rhetoric." Candidates who "are sincere supporters of public financing ought to be willing to pledge to stay within the system if they win their party's nomination and the other side's nominee promises to do the same."

Clintons, Obama To Appear At Selma Commemoration On Sunday. The Washington Post (3/2, A1, Kornblut, 690K) reports on its front page that ex-President Bill Clinton will join New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "at a commemoration of the 1965 civil rights march in Selma, Ala., on Sunday, bringing his star power and popularity among African Americans to a weekend of events that had been shaping up as a showcase for the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama," who "announced several weeks ago that he would deliver the keynote speech at a service honoring the march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge." Obama "has gained significantly among black voters in recent months, according to a recent Washington Post-ABC News survey, jeopardizing Clinton's early lead in the Democratic primary field. Reluctant to give any ground to Obama," Sen. Clinton "decided early last week that she, too, would go to Selma this weekend. She arranged a simultaneous appearance at a church just steps away from the one where Obama will speak Sunday morning, and she agreed to accept a civil rights award on behalf of her husband." The Post notes, "The imminent collision of the two candidates…offers a vivid snapshot of how important the campaigns believe black voters will be in the primaries. And the swift move by the Clintons to try to claim the spotlight at the event demonstrates that the former first lady does not intend to cede the black vote to Obama."

DOJ_NMG_0139207

The AP (3/2, Fouhy) reports that Bill Clinton on Sunday "will be inducted…in the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame," creating "another high-profile opportunity for the Clintons to grab the spotlight from the charismatic Obama. The joint appearance marks the first time the Clintons have appeared together publicly since she announced her candidacy in January. … Obama spokesman Bill Burton said the more people who attend the anniversary events, the better."

Obama Ancestors Said To Have Owned Slaves. The Baltimore Sun (3/2, Nitkin, Merritt, 257K) reports, "Many people know that Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's father was from Kenya and his mother from Kansas." But "an intriguing sliver of his family history has received almost no attention until now: it appears that forebears of his white mother owned slaves, according to genealogical research and Census records." The records, "which had never been addressed publicly by the Illinois senator or his relatives -- were first noted in an ancestry report compiled by William Addams Reitwiesner, who works at the Library of Congress and practices genealogy in his spare time. The report, on Reitwiesner's Web site, carries a disclaimer that it is a 'first draft' -- one likely to be examined more closely if Obama is nominated." According to the research, "one of Obama's great-great-great-great grandfathers, George Washington Overall, owned two slaves who were recorded in the 1850 Census in Nelson County, Ky. The same records show that one of Obama's great-great-great-great-great-grandmothers, Mary Duvall, also owned two slaves." The Sun "retraced" much of the research, and "an Obama spokesman did not dispute" it, saying "the senator's ancestors 'are representative of America.'"

Romney Hits McCain On Immigration, Giuliani On Guns, Abortion, Gay Rights. The AP (3/2, Johnson) reports, "Republican Mitt Romney assailed his two leading presidential rivals Wednesday, criticizing John McCain's stance on immigration and dismissing Rudy Giuliani's support for gun control, abortion and gay rights as a losing combination in the GOP primary." The AP adds, "Running a distant third in national polls, Romney used a campaign stop in New Hampshire to challenge McCain's support for stronger border security paired with an eventual path to citizenship for some of the 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States." Also, "in an interview with the Christian Broadcasting Network," Romney "criticized Giuliani for his moderate stands on abortion, gays and gun control -- even though Romney expressed similar views in previous campaigns."

Giuliani Apparently On Way To Victory In South Carolina Straw Poll. The AP (3/2) reports, "In a sign of what die-hard Republicans may think of the field of presidential contenders, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani was leading 10 other candidates Thursday in a straw poll in conservative" Spartanburg County, SC. The AP notes, "With 71 of 75 precincts reporting, Giuliani garnered 123 votes. California Rep. Duncan Hunter was running in second place with 110 votes, and Arizona Sen. John McCain was third with 86 votes, according to county GOP officials. Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback had 68 votes, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney had 59 votes and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee rounded out the front-runners with 18 votes. The voting isn't binding and comes as the county party goes about the business of organizing precincts and ultimately sending people to its county convention and the state GOP convention in May." Spartanburg County GOP Chairman Rick Beltram "said before the straw poll he expected fewer than 2,000 people to vote. After the voting, he blamed rainy weather for the low turnout."

Democratic Candidates Accused Of School Choice Hypocrisy. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (3/2, A11, 2.04M), Clint Bolick, president and general counsel of the Alliance for School Choice and senior fellow at the Goldwater Institute, lambastes Democrats in Washington who oppose school choice while sending their own children to private schools. "Indeed, a nearly perfect correlation exists among Democratic presidential candidates who have exercised school choice for their own children and those who would deny such choices to the parents of other children." Bolick cites former President Bill Clinton's daughter Chelsea's attendance of "the elite private Sidwell Friends School," juxtaposing this against Clinton's veto of a school choice bill for D.C. "And today presidential candidate Mrs. Clinton continues to stridently oppose school choice." Bolick continues to outline the positions on the issue—and the status of the children—of other Democratic presidential candidates, singling out Illinois Sen. Barack Obama for calling for both parties to be open to "anything that works."

DOJ_NMG_0139208

Early Start To Campaign Could Give Gingrich, Gore An Opening. The CBS Evening News (3/1, story 6, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "You talk about this campaign starting earlier than ever. How do you think that the change the dynamics of the race?" CBS (Schieffer) added, "Well, I think what could happen, Katie, is if the frontrunners in both parties keep cutting on each other and cutting each other down, I think by this summer, you may begin to see an opening for other candidates to come into the race. People like Newt Gingrich on the Republican side, maybe even Al Gore on the Democratic side. But the thing to remember, Katie we are at the very beginning of this race."

Washington State Senate Urged To Call For Bush Impeachment. The New York Times (3/2, Stolz, 1.16M) reports, "Mayor Rocky Anderson of Salt Lake City appeared before a committee of the State Senate in Olympia in support of a resolution asking Congress to begin impeachment proceedings against President Bush. Mr. Anderson, a Democrat, said the case for impeachment was not partisan. He said the president should face impeachment for 'heinous human rights violations, breaches of trust, abuses of power injurious to the nation, war crimes" and "misleading Congress and the American people."

Doubts Raised About Accuracy Of US Intelligence On Iran, North Korea. In a news analysis, the New York Times (3/2, A8, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports, "For more than three years, American intelligence officials have insisted that they learned from their mistakes in the months leading to the Iraq war, when murky information about Saddam Hussein's weapons programs was presented as fact and inconclusive judgments were hardened into statements of near certainty." As a result, the "more calibrated intelligence assessments that have come to light in recent weeks, particularly on Iran and North Korea, appear to show a new willingness by American spy agencies to concede the limits of their knowledge." The "new caution" reflects adherence to what some officials now call "the Powell Rule," that is "intended to avoid a repetition" of former Secretary of State Colin Powell's "humiliation" at the U.N. Security Council. The Times notes that former DNI John Negroponte formalized "new analytical procedures in a directive issued in January" as "one of his last acts." The intelligence community's "renewed emphasis on debate and dissent" has also been "reflected in decisions about which officials earned promotions in the aftermath of the Iraq intelligence failures."

Also in an analysis, the AP (3/2, Jahn) says, "New doubts are arising about the accuracy of US intelligence on the nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran, only a few years after faulty warnings about weapons of mass destruction helped President Bush justify the invasion of Iraq." The AP also notes that Bush administration officials, including Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, are "toning down assertions that such a program had been developed."

White House Defers Questions To Intelligence Community. The Washington Post's (3/2, A11) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that reporters yesterday "pressed White House spokeswoman Dana Perino on news reports that the administration is backing away from its absolute claims that North Korea has a uranium-enrichment program." Perino responded, "I think what I need to do is refer you to the intelligence community," which Kamen notes is "a crowd long known for on-the-record briefings on its sources and process."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the New York Times (3/2, 1.16M) writes, "We would like to believe that the Bush administration has finally figured out how dangerous and counterproductive it is to hype intelligence," but "we doubt it." The Post says it suspects that "this week's confessions of doubt about North Korea had less to do with a sudden burst of candor than the fact that Pyongyang has agreed to readmit nuclear inspectors" and "the White House's eagerness for a diplomatic win in these bleak times."

The Washington Post (3/2, A12, 690K) says "the weakening of the intelligence about an ongoing uranium program does not mean that the United States can drop the issue in the next phase of negotiations. On the contrary, a crucial test of the diplomatic process will be whether the North will reveal what it did with the centrifuges and other materials it is known to have acquired. Pyongyang's response will show whether it, like the Bush administration, is more inclined to conduct serious negotiations than it was four years ago."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (3/2, 2.04M) writes, "White House officials say President Bush has earned the benefit of the doubt on North Korea and that he'll insist on dismantling all of its nuclear facilities. We hope he's not relying on the US intelligence community to tell him when that's happened."

The Los Angeles Times (3/2, 850K) editorializes, "For the second time, serious questions have been raised about the credibility of US assessments of the potential nuclear threat posed by an enemy nation. Are these charges justified? Given the US need to enlist other nations to adopt sanctions to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions and deal with other proliferation challenges, that's a question that demands an answer."

Pyongyang Reasserts Pledge To Denuclearize. The Washington Post/AP (3/2, A10) reports North Korea's "No. 2 leader," Kim Yong Nam, "reiterated Thursday his country's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons," as the nation "sought a resumption of aid in its first high-level talks with South Korea." Kim said that "the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula is the dying wish" of the country's founding president, Kim Il Sung, who died in 1994. North Korea "will make efforts to realize it," he told South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jae Joung in Pyongyang. The Washington Times (3/2, 88K) also publishes this AP report.

DOJ_NMG_0139209

Under the headline "US, North Korea Soften Their Stances," the Wall Street Journal (3/2, A3, Ramstad, King, 2.04M) reports North Korea and the US "are showing signs of softening toward one another" as negotiators from both sides plan to meet Monday to discuss steps toward normalizing relations. The US is also reportedly "close to resolving a high-profile crackdown" on a Macau bank used by the North Korean government. Meanwhile, the Financial Times (3/2, Mitchell) reports frozen North Korean funds in Macao's Banco Delta Asia "could be released by the end of this month," according to an executive for a company whose accounts have been affected. Colin McAskill, who heads Hong Kong-based Koryo Asia, said the head of a Macao government-appointed committee now in charge of Banco Delta Asia told him recently that some of the funds "could be released soon."

Meanwhile, McClatchy (3/2, Landay, Hall) reports there are "new questions about the Administration's assertions" that Banco Delta Asia "knowingly laundered proceedings from North Korean narcotics trafficking, cigarette smuggling and counterfeit American currency." An audit of the bank's finances by accounting firm Ernst & Young "found no evidence that the bank had facilitated North Korean money-laundering, either by circulating counterfeit US bank notes or by knowingly sheltering illicit earnings of the North Korean government."

Diplomats Report Progress On Iran Sanctions. The AP (3/2, Lederer) reports diplomats "made progress Thursday on possible new sanctions against Iran" as officials from the US, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany held a two hour conference call. In a statement, the State Department said, "They had a good productive discussion during which they made progress in agreeing on the elements of a resolution. A few more issues remain for discussion, and the political directors agreed to convene another conference call on Saturday morning." The Department said it expects that ambassadors "could begin drafting the text of a resolution next week."

China Urges Iran To Return To Talks. The AP (3/2) reports China Thursday urged Iran "to halt uranium enrichment and step up efforts to reach a peaceful, negotiated solution to the international dispute over its nuclear program amid a visit by Iran's deputy foreign minister." Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang told reporters, "We hope that Iran can give a positive response to the appeal of the international community and faithfully abide by resolution 1737."

Iran, Saudi Arabia To Hold Summit On Regional Crises. The New York Times (3/2, Fattah, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will visit Saudi Arabia Saturday for "a summit meeting with King Abdullah intended to tackle the Middle East's growing sectarian and political crises," Iranian officials announced Thursday. The visit, Ahmadinejad's first state visit to Saudi Arabia, "was initiated by Iran," according to a former Saudi official with knowledge of the discussions. It also "marks the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts by the two regional powers, as well as other Arab countries, to settle the political standoff in Lebanon, cool sectarian violence in Iraq and possibly even avert a looming confrontation with the United States." The trip is seen by some "as a defensive move by an increasingly isolated Iran while to others it marks the start of another public relations offensive for the bellicose president."

The AP (3/2, Nasr) calls the visit "an indication that weeks of talks between their envoys on simmering conflicts in Iraq and Lebanon have made some headway."

Democrats Move To Require Approval For Iran Strike. Responding to fears that President Bush may be preparing to launch a military strike against Iran, McClatchy (3/2, Talev) reports Senate Democrats "are drafting legislation that would require the White House to seek congressional approval before any such action." Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., who is leading the effort, said Thursday "that he's still working on the details, but he intends to introduce his measure next week as an amendment to the $93.4 billion war spending bill."

Jordanian King To Address US Congress. The Washington Times (3/2, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "King Abdullah II of Jordan will address a joint session of Congress next Wednesday, becoming the first world leader to address such a meeting under the new Democratic-led Congress. Merissa Khurma, spokeswoman for the Jordanian government in Washington, tells us the king's speech will partly address the crisis in neighboring Iraq and ways to restore security and stability there. Congress, no doubt, will be all ears."

State Department Report Accuses Venezuela Of Drug Trafficking. McClatchy (3/2, Bachelet) reports, "In its harshest assessment yet of drug trafficking in Venezuela," the State Department Thursday "said the country is turning into a haven for smugglers because of corruption and the government's refusal to cooperate with other nations." The department's 2007 International Narcotics Control Strategies Report "also expressed uneasiness over Bolivia's efforts to expand" coca cultivation and "offered rare praise for Cuba for deporting a Colombian trafficker to Bogota." The report "also praised three countries --

DOJ_NMG_0139210

Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico -- that Bush will visit this month during a swing through Latin America, saying the three were trying to halt drug smuggling, if not succeeding."

USA Today (3/2, 6A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports as evidence of Venezuela's drug trafficking, Assistant Secretary of State Anne Patterson said the "number of flights from Venezuela suspected of ferrying Colombian cocaine to the Dominican Republic and Haiti -- key transfer points for US-bound shipments of the drug -- increased 167% last year."

Mexican Ambassador Praises Upcoming Bush Visit. In its "Embassy Row" column, the Washington Times (3/2, Morrison, 88K) reports Mexico's new ambassador, "when he presented his diplomatic credentials at the White House this week, praised President Bush for his upcoming visit to Mexico City." The two-day visit beginning March 12 will "strengthen the already firm foundations on which our bilateral relationship rests," Ambassador Arturo Sarukhan said.

US Wants Missile Radar In Caucasus. The AP (3/2, Lekic) reports the director of the US Missile Defense Agency "said Thursday that Washington wants to base an anti-missile radar in the Caucasus, a move that could provoke a further rift with Russia." Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering" declined to specify which country the long-range radar could be installed in," but noted that "it would be very useful for the anti-missile system." Speaking on a stop at NATO headquarters in Brussels, he said the US "would like to place a radar in...the Caucasus." Meanwhile in Moscow, Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Grushko said the missile elements already planned by Washington for Poland and the Czech Republic would become a "factor that we will have to take into account while determining our steps in the military-political sphere and military development."

Ukrainian Opposition Leader Calls For Early Elections. In an interview with the Washington Times (3/2, Sands, 88K), Ukrainian opposition leader Yulia Tymoshenko said his country's "revived Orange Coalition will press for early elections in a bid to halt Russia's growing influence and control over the country's vital energy assets." Tymoshenko, a former prime minister and key figure in the Orange Revolution, "said Ukraine's sovereignty and hopes for better relations with the West are in jeopardy if the government of pro-Moscow Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych serves out its full term to 2011."

Negroponte Begins Tour Of Asia. AFP (3/2) reports Deputy Secretary of State Negroponte Thursday "started an Asian tour in which he is expected to discuss a breakthrough nuclear deal with North Korea." Negroponte arrived in Tokyo where he "is likely to meet Foreign Minister Taro Aso and other officials on Friday," a ministry official said. After a three-day stay, Negroponte travel to China and South Korea.

US Says China Expanding Nuclear Sub Fleet. The Washington Times (3/2, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports on its front page that China's military is "engaged in a major buildup of submarines that includes five new strategic nuclear-missile boats and several advanced nuclear-powered attack submarines," according to the Office of Naval Intelligence. The new nuclear-powered missile submarines will be outfitted with new 5,000-mile range JL-2 missiles that "will provide China with a modern and robust sea-based nuclear deterrent force," the ONI stated. The buildup is "raising new concerns among senior Pentagon planners already worried by Beijing's broader strategic nuclear-forces buildup."

Beijing Likens Cheney Criticism To Nosy Neighbor. The Washington Times (3/2, Lanfranco, 88K) reports Chinese Foreign ministry spokesman Qin Gang responded yesterday to Vice President Dick Cheney's remarks about China during his recent Asia trip "with an earthy metaphor about home invasion and a barbed eight-point statement outlining China's diplomatic philosophy." Qin's comments "strayed far from the tepid boilerplate answers normally issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs." For example, Qin was quoted as saying, "If you had a neighbor always standing at your doorstep, peering into your household and constantly shouting at you, 'Why don't you open your door and let me see what's in your house, what's in your family,' how would you feel about that?"

US May Seek Limit On Chinese Paper Imports. On its front page, the New York Times (3/2, A1, Weisman, 1.16M) reports the "problems of paper mills" in the Appalachians "and elsewhere around the country have become a test case for a possible new confrontation between the United States and China, which many industry officials and members of Congress hope could lead to new tariffs on imports not only of Chinese-made paper but also of steel, furniture, textiles and plastics." In coming weeks, the Commerce Department is expected to impose duties on high-gloss paper, known as "coated paper," from China. The Bush administration's decision "to face the issue of subsidies comes at a time of mounting pressure by Congress for a tougher stance on trade" and when "many lawmakers say it is time to stop treating China with kid gloves."

US, Brazil Negotiating Ethanol Partnership. USA Today (3/2, 6A, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "U.S. and Brazilian officials are negotiating details of an ethanol partnership in advance of President Bush's scheduled visit to Brazil next week." If "completed, the planned deal would help increase both nations' production of ethanol, creating significant economic as well as political implications." Expanding "world ethanol markets would help the USA and other nations reduce their dependence on foreign oil. Also, reduced demand for oil might reduce the clout of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez." USA Today adds, "Today, officials from the United States, Brazil, China, India, South Africa and the European Commission will announce the creation of the International Biofuels Forum. The group, affiliated with the United Nations, will work to create worldwide ethanol standards." During his visit to Brazil next week, President Bush "is scheduled to discuss alternative energy sources with President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva." Brazilian Foreign Minister Celso Amorim "said Brazil...plans to ask the United States to cut tariffs on ethanol imports." But "members of Congress from corn-growing states have already said they oppose cutting ethanol tariffs."

DOJ_NMG_0139211

African Peacekeeping Force Arrives In Somalia. USA Today (3/2, 6A, 2.27M) reports 30 Ugandan troops "flew into Somalia, the first contingent in an African peacekeeping force to shore up a United Nations-backed transitional government threatened by Islamic militants."

US Stirs Debate Over Home Of Africa Development Bank. The Wall Street Journal (3/2, A1, Phillips, 2.04M) reports on its front page that "to the Bush administration, it seems obvious: The African Development Bank's headquarters should be in black Africa." Four years ago, the bank "fled civil war in its longtime home in Ivory Coast for a temporary refuge in Tunisia," but now the US "says it's time for the bank to leave Tunisia, give up hopes of returning to Ivory Coast, and find a new permanent home somewhere else south of the Sahara." While "many black African and European member nations agree in principle that the bank should have its headquarters in a sub-Saharan country," some fear leaving Ivory Coast permanently "would signal that a country once hailed as a model of African hope is now just another horror story."

Discouragement Of Multiple Sex Partners May Slow Spread Of AIDS In Africa. In a front page article, the Washington Post (3/2, A1, Timberg, 690K) reports that a "growing number of studies single out" the practice of multiple sex partners "as the most powerful force propelling" the spread of AIDS in Africa. This "new understanding…helps explain why the disease has devastated southern Africa while sparing other places" and "also suggests how the region's AIDS programs, which have struggled to prevent new infections even as treatment for the disease has become more widely available, might save far more lives: by discouraging sexual networks."

WSJ Criticizes UN Official On Women's Rights. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/2, 2.04M) writes, "On the occasion of the annual meeting of the U.N.'s Commission on the Status of Women, the American delegation decided to organize a panel on the subject of 'State-Sanctioned Mass Rape in Burma and Sudan.' After years of reporting by human-rights organizations about atrocities committed by government forces against women in both countries, that sounds like a reasonable topic to discuss." However, U.N. "bureaucrat" Sylvie Cohen of the Division for the Advancement of Women "refused to list the panel discussion on the U.N.'s Web site" because it "would be perceived as offensive to named member states." The Journal calls it "amazing" that a U.N. organization "that purports to look out for the interests of women seems more concerned about defending the sensibilities of the governments who harbor and support their rapists."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Chief of Walter Reed Hospital Fired Over Troop Treatment."
"Holding New Hampshire's Primary In Place."
"Iraq's Displaced Trickle Home."
"Wall Street Charges Recall Heyday Of Insider Trading."
"Artist's War Depiction Has Many Faces, Rough Edges."
"School Mentor Hoops Upset L.A. Mayor."

USA Today:
"Where Did The Money Go?"
"More Colleges Banning Smoking."
"U.S. Marshals Official Accused Of Misspending Security Funds."
"Chip Foose Overhaulin' Mainstream Designs."

New York Times:
"General Is Fired Over Conditions At Walter Reed."
"Most Support U.S. Guarantee Of Health Care."
"Pressed By U.S., Pakistan Seizes A Taliban Chief."
"HUD Blocks Proposed Sale Of Starrett City."
"U.S. Reviewing Safety Of Children's Cough Drugs."
"A Cry To Limit Chinese Imports Rings At Paper Mill."
"California Enjoys Electoral Muscle."

Washington Post:
"Army Fires Commander Of Walter Reed."
"A Wider Front In Doping Battle."
"Shortages Threaten Guard's Capability."
"In Botswana, Speeding HIV's Deadly Spread."
"At Site of '65 March, An '08 Collision."
"Author Shaped Lens For Viewing U.S. History."
"13 Charged In Big Insider Trading Scam."

Washington Times:
"China Expands Sub Fleet."

DOJ_NMG_0139212

"GOP Regroups To Foil War Plans Of Democrats."
"House back Bill To Ease Unionizing."
"N. Korea Again Pledges To End Nuke Program."
"Tymoshenko Seeks Early Elections."

Detroit Free Press:
"Calloway Is Choice To Lead Schools."
"The Hot Dog."
"GM Sales Growth A Pleasant Surprise."
"State's Plan To raze Abandoned Homes Is Raising Hopes In Cities."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"'Barbie Bandit' Arrest Made."
"Tornado ravages Alabama School."
"State's Public health System 'In Crisis' Says House Panel."

Houston Chronicle:
"Spike In Flue Cases Takes 4 Lives."
"Will Texas Have Enough Power?"
"One The Floor Of The Gulf, A Sub On Wheels Will Seek Evidence Of Continent's Earliest Humans."
"Sex Abuse Reported At Second Youth Jail."
"Storm Have Alabama Students No Time To Turn."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Dangerous Tornados-Alabama; Dangerous Tornados-Analysis; Walter Reed Hospital; Nicholson-Congressional Hearings; Taliban Leader Captured; McCain's Presidential Announcement; Bush Visits-New Orleans; Post Katrina Justice; Fender Benders; Arthur Schlesinger Jr. Obit; Substance Abuse-High Schools; Peru 20 Second Late; Ball Player's Story.
CBS: AL Tornadoes; Al Tornadoes-Analysis; Upper Midwest Snows; Walter Reed Firing; Stock Markets; McCain Announcement; Urban Developer; Homeland Security Waste; Schlesinger Obit; Fiddle Maker.
NBC: Dangerous Tornados-Alabama; Dangerous Tornados-Analysis; Dangerous Weather; Walter Reed Hospital; McCain's Presidential Announcement; Bush Visits-New Orleans; Combat Doctors; Terrorism Charges Australian; USS John F. Kennedy-Decommissioning; Arthur Schlesinger Jr. Obit; Teenage Driving.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: GA, AL, MO-Tornadoes; US Plains And Upper Midwest-Blizzards; Walter Reed-General Fired; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Sunni Group Known As Islamic State Of Iraq-Kidnappings; San Francisco-Earthquake; AP-Paris Hilton News Blackout; USS JFK.
CBS: GA, AL, MO-Tornadoes; US Plains And Upper Midwest-Blizzards; Bush-Gulf Coast; Katrina Levies-Lawsuit; Anna Nicole Smith's Burial; Walter Reed-General Fired; Obama-Hospital Inspection Bill; State Department Report-International Drug Trade; GA-Teenage Girl Bank Robbers.
NPR: GA, AL, MO-Tornadoes; US Plains And Upper Midwest-Blizzards; Chinese Government Officials Expelled In Shanghai Pension Fund Scandal; Senegal Presidential Election; Wall Street; Walter Reed-General Fired; GA-Tax Break For Delta Airlines.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Visits Silver St. Elementary School, New Albany, Ind., open press; speaks on No Child Left Behind reauthorization, Silver St. Elementary School, New Albany, Ind., pool coverage; meets with students from The McConnell Center, Seelbach Hilton Louisville, Louisville, Ky., closed press; speaks at the McConnell for Senate and National Republican Senatorial Committee reception, Louisville, Ky., pool for cameras; open for correspondents.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Legislative Branch. Hearing on FY08 appropriations for the Architect of the Capitol. Acting Architect of the Capitol Stephen Ayers. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

US House: 9:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Interior, Environment and Related Agencies Subcommittee. hearing on FY08 budget for the Agency for Toxic Substance and Disease Registry, Chemical Safety Board, National Institute on Environmental Health Sciences. Location: Room B-308, Rayburn.

Other: SOUTH KOREAN FOREIGN MINISTER SONG MIN-SOON _ Highlights: 12:30 p.m. Speaks to the Center for Strategic and International Studies on the U.S.-South Korean alliance. Pavilion Room, Reagan Trade Building. Event contact: Andrew Schwartz, 202-775-3242. RSVP to 202-464-1987. Seating on first-come, first-serve basis. 2:30 p.m. Meets with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, State Dept.

AGRICULTURE _ The U.S. Department of Agriculture hosts its 83rd annual Agricultural Outlook Forum, ``Agriculture at the Crossroads: Energy, Farm and Rural Policy." Location: Marriott-Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington, Va.

CONSERVATIVES _ The Conservative Political Action Caucus holds its annual conference. Highlights: 7:30 a.m. Ronald Reagan Banquet, with speaker Rep. Mike Pence 8:30 a.m. Rep. Duncan Hunter. 9 a.m. Sen. James Inhofe, ranking member of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, gives presentation on global warming. 9 a.m. Black Republicans Awards ceremony with HUD Secretary Jackson. 10 a.m. Gov. Mike Huckabee. 12 p.m. Rudy Giuliani. 1 p.m. Rep. Tom Tancredo. 1:30 p.m. Sen.

DOJ_NMG_0139213

Sam Brownback. 2:45 p.m. Gov. Mitt Romney. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

HIV TESTING _ 8:30 a.m. The AIDS Institute holds a briefing on HIV testing in the U.S., with Rep. Maxine Waters, Bernard Branson of the CDC, others. Location: Room B-339, Capitol.

PENTAGON-IRAQ BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. Army Brig. Gen. Joseph Anderson, chief of staff for the Multinational Corps-Iraq, briefs live from Iraq. Location: DoD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

HOUSING-BUDGET _ 9 a.m. - 11 a.m. The National Housing Conference presents the FY'2008 Budget Forum Networking Breakfast sponsored by Fannie Mae. Topics and Speakers include: The Bigger Picture: Whats the Budget Outlook for FY 2008?, with Martha Coven; Senior Legislative Associate, Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. Priorities and Highlights of the FY 2008 HUD Budget Section 8 and Public Housing, with John Bohm, Department Head, Legislative Programs & Media, National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials (NAHRO); The Housing Finance System (GSEs, Federal Home Loan Banks and FHA), with Cheryl Patton Malloy, Senior Vice President of Multifamily and Governance, Mortgage Bankers Association (MBA); and Tax Issues, Robert M. Rozen, Partner, Washington Council, Ernst & Young LLP. Location: Room 325, Russell Senate Office Building.

MEDIA-CAMPAIGNS _ 9:30 a.m. George Washington University holds a program on the evolving role of media in political campaigns, with Chris Cillizza, politics writer, washingtonpost.com; Carol Darr, director, GWs Institute for Politics, Democracy, & The Internet; Chuck DeFeo, general manager, Townhall.com; Mo Elleithee, senior spokesperson, Hillary Clinton for President Exploratory Committee. Location: Room 1888, Russell.

SCOTUS-FREE SPEECH _ 10 a.m. ACLU holds a telephone briefing with Joseph Frederick, who will discuss his challenge to a 2002 high school suspension for displaying a sign saying ``Bong Hits 4 Jesis'' at an off-campus event. The case is to be heard March 19 by the Supreme Court. Contacts: Emily Whitfield, 212-549-2566. Notes: Callin Number: 888-423-3281.

STARRETT CITY _ 11 a.m. HUD Secretary Jackson holds a news conference with New York City officials about Starrett City. Location: 10th floor conference room, HUD, 451 7th St. SW.

BIOETHICS _ 12 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a program, ``Beyond Bioethics: A Proposal for Modernizing the Regbulation of Human Biotechnologies'' with Frances Fukuyama and Franco Furger, both of SAIS. Location: Room B-339, Rayburn.

CLEAN DIESEL _ 12 p.m. EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson holds a telephone news conference to make a clean diesel announcement. Contacts: Jennifer Wood, 202-564-4355. Notes: Callin number: 800-811-6040; passcode: 1400966.

COLOMBIA _ 12 p.m. The Institute for International Economics holds a luncheon meeting with Colombian Trade Minister Luis Guillermo Plata, focusing on free trade agreement between the U.S. and Colombia. Location: 1750 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAN _ 12:30 p.m. The Center for American Progress holds a panel discussion on containing and engaging Iran, with Geoffrey Kemp of the Nixon Center, Jacqueline Shire of the Institute for Science and International Security, and Karim Sadjadpour of the International Crisis Group. Location: 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

DNA TESTING-ANTHROPOLOGY _ 2 p.m. The National Press Club hosts a discussion on ``Sequencing Human History: The Genetics and Commerce of Personal Ancestry.'' Participants: Kathy Hudson, director, Genetics and Public Policy Center; Spencer Wells, director, Genographic Project, National Geographic; Aravinda Chakravarti, Institute of Genetic Medicine, Johns Hopkins University; Gina M. Paige, president, African Ancetry, Inc.; and Sandra Soo-Jin Lee, senior research scholar, Stanford Center for Biomedical Ethics. Location: National Press Club.

NATIONAL SERVICE-KATRINA _ 2 p.m. National Service Caucus briefing on national and community service programs, focusing on budget proposals and the role that national service has played in Hurricane Katrina recovery and rebuilding. Location: Room 2105, Rayburn.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Friday, March 02, 2007 11:31 AM
To: Ablin, Erik; Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M.; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Fischer, Gerard (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 3/2/07 Civil Division News

New Orleans seeks $77 billion for Katrina damage

VA Sued Again for Losing Veterans' Personal, Medical Info

US govt seeks dismissal of $111k claim by Income

Polar woes probed as US sued

US wants Hicks in jail for 20 years

Analysis: Government seeks narrow review on detainees

Reuters

March 2, 2007

New Orleans seeks $77 billion for Katrina damage

Thu Mar 1, 2007 7:17PM ESTNEW ORLEANS, March 1 (Reuters) - New Orleans filed a claim on Thursday seeking $77 billion from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers for damages caused by flooding after Corps-built levees collapsed during Hurricane Katrina.

The claim had to be filed by a Thursday night deadline to preserve the city's right to sue the agency if necessary to recover Katrina-related damages.

"It's certainly an attempt to protect the city's interest," city hall spokesman James Ross said of the huge claim..

Long lines of people snaked around the Corps' New Orleans headquarters on Thursday as residents of the devastated city submitted their personal damage claims ahead of the deadline.

At least 30,000 claims are expected to be filed, the Corps has said.

They may be incorporated into lawsuits that have accused the Corps of building shoddy levees that failed to protect the city when Katrina struck on Aug. 29, 2005.

Water poured through the burst levees and flooded 80 percent of New Orleans. More than 1,300 people died in the storm and much of the city still lies damaged and abandoned.

A Corps spokeswoman said she had no information on the city's claim and could not discuss any pending legal action.

END

Andrews Publications

March 1, 2007

VA Sued Again for Losing Veterans' Personal, Medical Info

By LINDA COADY, ESQ., Andrews Publications Staff Writer

A member of the Alabama National Guard has filed a proposed class action alleging the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs' failure to protect personal and medical data on its systems has exposed numerous veterans to identity theft.

The plaintiff says the VA's inability to safeguard personal data, including Social Security numbers, could affect as many as 535,000 people.

This is the second time in the last year that the VA and Secretary of Veterans Affairs James Nicholson have been sued for not protecting veterans' information by allowing an employee to lose the data.

Last summer several veterans groups sued the VA and Nicholson after a Maryland employee took home a hard drive containing information on millions of veterans and the device was stolen. The hard drive was later recovered, the VA said.

The recent suit comes on the heels of the VA's Feb. 2 announcement about a second loss of veterans' information. This time, an unidentified employee at a VA medical center in Birmingham, Ala., reported a missing hard drive that contained information from the worker's computer.

The employee has been placed on leave pending a criminal investigation of the missing and perhaps stolen hard drive, according to the VA's Web site.

In this case plaintiff Greg Fanin says the VA has known for years about the deficiencies in its information security but failed to adequately respond to the problem.

Fanin claims that both the General Accounting Office in 2003 and the U.S. House of Representatives in 2006 gave the VA a failing grade in information security, so the defendant cannot claim ignorance of the situation.

Fanin says that when he called the VA to find out if his information had been compromised, the agency told him it did not have a complete list of affected individuals, could not determine whether Fanin's information had been released and advised him to contact a credit bureau to determine if he had been the victim of identity theft.

Fanin says the VA has not yet located the missing hard drive, nor has it notified those whose information may have been compromised.

The agency's actions are a willful and intentional failure to establish appropriate safeguards for personal and medical information, he says.

The complaint, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Alabama, alleges violations of the federal Privacy Act and the Administrative Procedures Act.

Fanin seeks money damages of $1,000 for each person adversely affected by the VA's alleged Privacy Act violations.

He has also asked the court to issue an injunction enjoining the VA from continuing to operate without means to safeguard the privacy of personal data.

Some of those safeguards should include a prohibition against any VA officer, employee or agent removing any device capable of storing personal information, the plaintiff says.

An independent panel of experts should also be appointed to verify that adequate security has been established at the VA, he says.

END

Straits Times (Singapore)

March 2, 2007

US govt seeks dismissal of $111k claim by Income

K.C. Vijayan

THE United States government wants the Singapore High Court to strike out a claim for $111,000 made against it by local insurance cooperative NTUC Income over a helicopter accident death five years ago.

The accident, which happened at the Paya Lebar Airbase, involved two US Navy helicopters which clipped each other, sending debris flying, killing an inspector from ST Aerospace Engineering.

The family of Mr Mohamed Ruslan Radin, then 41, had received that amount in workmen's compensation.

After Income - ST Aerospace Engineering's insurer - made the payout, it sued the US government last May to recover its money.

But lawyers from Anjali Iyer & Associates, representing the US government, wrote in documents filed that Income had 'no reasonable cause of action', and listed a number of grounds to bolster its case.

One was that the US government had separately paid an agreed sum to the man's surviving kin in April 2004. This payout was made without admission of liability, and to extinguish any claims the family might make in future.

A second argument put forward was that Income's claim for indemnity - that it awarded the money under the Workmen's Compensation Act - was flawed.

Mr Ruslan, the lawyers argued, was no 'workman' as defined by the Act - he was then earning almost $5,000 a month.

Lawyers for the US government also pointed out that Income had waited too long to file its claim. Income's suit, filed last May, had come more than three years after its payout was made to the family, and about four years after the accident.

A time bar in the law does not allow such a claim, the lawyers said.

They also 'respectfully' raised a major argument for their stand - that the US government was immune from the jurisdiction of the Singapore courts.

Its navy's two Sea Stallion choppers - in Singapore as part of visiting forces with the Defence Ministry's consent - were engaged in military manoeuvres and using Paya Lebar Airbase on July 16, 2002.

In the course of a logistics resupply mission from an amphibious assault ship, one helicopter was moving along the tarmac, coming in to berth, when it hit the other one, which was stationary but had its engine running and rotor blades still spinning.

The crash sent debris hurtling over towards Mr Ruslan, who was about 75m away, inspecting a Republic of Singapore Air Force C-130 transport plane.

He died in hospital from his injuries about three hours later.

The case, which was brought up in the High Court on Monday, has been adjourned for three weeks to enable lawyers from KhattarWong, who are appearing for Income, to file their reply to the US government's application to dismiss the suit. The US government is also seeking costs for its case.

END

Herald Sun (Australia)

March 2, 2007

Polar woes probed as US sued

OSLO -- More than 60 nations have launched the broadest scientific investigation yet of the Arctic and Antarctic to chart polar regions on the front lines of global warming.

Top scientists met in Paris, researchers gathered on a polar research vessel at Cape Town, South Africa, and 3000 children built snowmen in Oslo as part of ceremonies starting the International Polar Year.

The work comes as the Inuit people of northern Canada take the US to court for being the greatest greenhouse gas producers in the world.

``Our way of life is at stake,'' said Sheila Watt-Cloutier, who has been nominated with former US vice-president Al Gore for a Nobel Peace Prize for their work on climate change.

The Inuit have been trying to tell the world for more than a decade about the shifting wind and thinning ice that have dramatically hurt the hunting patterns their people have followed for thousands of years.

Ms Watt-Cloutier is preparing to make the Inuit case before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, an arm of the 34-member Organisation of American States.

Meanwhile the UN-backed International Polar Year, will involve 50,000 people doing 228 projects, such as studying marine life in Antarctica, mapping how wind carries pollutants to the Arctic, or examining the health of people, polar bears or penguins.

Program office director David Carlson said the icy ends of the earth had been overlooked too long.

``This part of the planet . . . needs to get a higher level of attention,'' he said.

Many scientists say melting ice sheets on Greenland or Antarctica in coming centuries would raise sea levels, threatening cities from Tokyo to New York and low lying Pacific atolls.

``These regions are highly vulnerable to rising temperatures,'' said Michel Jarraud, head of the UN's World Meteorological Organisation.

He said more monitoring stations were needed in polar regions.

END

Australian

March 3, 2007

US wants Hicks in jail for 20 years

Verity Edwards, David Nason

US authorities are expected to seek a jail term of between 15 and 20 years for Australian Guantanamo Bay inmate David Hicks after formally charging him with providing support to a terrorist organisation.

Hicks yesterday became the first Australian detainee to be charged under the new military commissions process and is likely to face court within a month.

He was handed a copy of the charge sheet in his cell at the US military prison at Guantanamo Bay, where he has been detained for more than five years after being arrested in Afghanistan in 2001.

But a charge of attempted murder was dropped after the US military's convening authority -- judge Susan Crawford -- declared there was no probable cause for the allegation.

US prosecutor Morris Davis said that if the case proceeded to trial the US would seek a sentence in excess of the 15 to 20 years discussed in plea-bargain negotiations that stalled in late January. The prosecution would not seek the maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

The announcement of charges against Hicks sparked a renewed flurry of calls for the Australian Government to seek his return.

Hicks's father, Terry, challenged the Prime Minister on regional radio, asking why his son could be charged retrospectively.

But Mr Howard said the offence had existed since 1994 and was ``not retrospective'', adding that he had appealed to President George W.Bush to expedite the trial.

Opposition justice spokesman Kelvin Thomson called on the Government to review its position now that the only charge laid against David Hicks was one involving the application of retrospective law. ``Why is it not OK to charge David Hicks with retrospective offences under Australian law, yet apparently it is OK to charge David Hicks retrospectively (at) Guantanamo Bay?'' Mr Thomson asked. ``David Hicks is entitled to a fair trial, nothing more and nothing less.''

Hicks's US military lawyer, Michael Mori, angrily repudiated the decision to proceed with the charge and sought a meeting with Attorney-General Philip Ruddock, claiming the Pentagon's statement was an admission the initial charges laid against Hicks were made up and had no basis in law or fact.

``It's disgusting that he has spent five years in Guantanamo for made-up charges,'' Major Mori said.

``Now they are doing it again. They are repeating history by creating a new crime after the fact and trying to apply it to David retroactively.''

Mr Ruddock did not meet Major Mori. He said the refining of the charges originally laid against Hicks was evidence the US military commission process was working.

``The dropping of the attempted murder charge seems to me to demonstrate ... that this isn't a rubber stamp. The convening authority is properly exercising her discretion in, she's a judge, in a proper and conscientious way,'' he told the ABC.

Hicks's lawyers refused yesterday to be drawn on any plea bargain.

Hicks's Adelaide-based lawyer, David McLeod, said if the charges were not retrospective, Hicks should have already been tried before a US federal\l "l" court\l "l".

``If what the US Government is saying is correct, he should have been tried five years ago in a federal court and here we are, five years later,'' Mr McLeod said yesterday.

END

ScotusBlog

Thursday, March 01, 2007

Analysis: Government seeks narrow review on detainees

Posted by Lyle Denniston

The Bush Administration on Thursday urged the Supreme Court not to speed up its review of the case of detainee Salim Ahmed Hamdan and, in making its argument, appeared to be suggesting that the Court's review of any detainee cases this Term be limited to the issues resolved by the D.C. Circuit Court. If the Court were to agree to this approach, there would be no prompt review of any detainees' attempt to regain the power to challenge coming war crimes trials before military "commissions." All that could be before the Court would be detainees' plea for the right to pursue challenges to their detention as "enemy combatants."

The filing by the Solicitor General can be found here. While its specific plea is that the Court deny a motion to expedite the combined appeal of Hamdan and another detainee, Omar Khadr, the government's opposition includes comments that leave little doubt it wants any military commission challenges to go first through the D.C. Circuit, and only after trials have been held and guilty verdicts reached.

(UPDATE: Early Thursday afternoon, lawyers for the two detainees filed an answer to the government's filing. It can be found here. The reply argued that it is not "efficient or sensible" to put off consideration of this appeal, and delay in considering the legal status of detainees facing war crimes charges will lead to "years of additional litigation." Returning the case to the D.C. Circuit for review of their right to pursue their challenge would not accomplish anything, they contended. Further discussion of the detainees' answers to the government's arguments can be found in the concluding paragraphs below.)

At this stage in the Supreme Court, the legality of detentions at the military prison camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the legality of the war crimes trial commissions, are not before the Court. All that is at issue now in the combined Hamdan/Khadr petition (06-1169) is whether these two detainees can regain a right to pursue habeas challenges to the commission system; they ultimately want the courts to bar any trial before such commissions. Thus, they want to make their case before any such trial starts.

The government, on the other hand, belives that Congress has validly taken away any right of any detainee facing a commission trial to file a habeas challenge, leaving them the single option of challenging a final commission conviction before the D.C. Circuit.

The choice between those two positions is what is bascially at stake in the Hamdan/Khadr petition. But, for the Court to consider those positions, it would have to agree to hear that petition -- this Term or next. A denial of expedition would probably mean that the Hamdan/Khadr appeal would not be heard this Term, if at all. The Court, of course, could simply deny it when it does come up for consideration. The Solicitor General's filing contains very clear indications that, when the petition does come up for grant or denial, the government will urge a denial. If expedition is granted, the SG response to the petition would likely be due March 21; if it is denied, that date switches to March 29.

Most of these considerations were in the background as the Hamdan/Khadr move for expedition was filed on Tuesday, along with the petition. And they are also in the background of the government's opposition on Thursday to expedited consideration of the petition..

The Court is scheduled to take up the plea to expedite the Hamdan/Khadr petition at its Conference on Friday. It will also consider the Solicitor General's filing at that time.

The Hamdan/Khadr petition is unusual, and the Solicitor General focuses on that as part of the government's resistance. The Solicitor Geneeral refers to that appeal as of "makeshift nature," making it "a poor candidate for review, much less expedited review."

Hamdan has been denied a right to challenge the war crimes commission by a U.S. District Court, and Hamdan wants the Justices to hear that case without waiting for the D.C. Circuit to review the District Court decision. Khadr has been denied a right to challenge his "enemy combatant" status by the D.C. Circuit. They both joined in a single petition, because both are attempting to head off war crimes trials; they are two of the only three Guantanamo detainees so far charged with such crimes.

The government argues that the Supreme Court's Rules do not permit such a combined appeal testing two different courts' rulings in the same petition. The motion, the response contends, identifies "no case in which this Court has permitted the filing of such a petition."

It goes on to point out that Khadr was involved in a group of detainee cases that the D.C. Circuit Court decided on Feb. 20, finding that Congress has denied all habeas rights to Guantanamo prisoners who seek to challenge their captivity. Other detainees in that group are to file their own petitions for review in the Supreme Court next Monday, and the government has agreed that those should be considered on an expedited basis.

Khadr, the Solicitor General suggests, could have filed his own, separate petition from the Circuit Court ruling, and the government would have agreed to expedition on that, too.

Any issues that are common to the Hamdan/Khadr petition and the coming appeals by detainees can be fully considered if the Court agrees to hear the other detainee cases, the government said. But, it went on, any attempt to raise other issues in the Hamdan/Khadr petition would not be appropriate because, to date, no court at any level has ruled on those separate challenges to the loss of habeas rights.

In the other detainee cases, the only constitutional issue that the D.C. Circuit decided on the cutoff of habeas rights was whether that was an unconstitutional suspension of the writ. Hamdan and Khadr also seek to argue that the cutoff also violates the doctrine of separation of powers, equal protection guarantees, and the constitutional ban on a "Bill of Attainder." The District Court did not decide those in Hamdan's case, and the D.C. Circuit was not asked to decide them in the other detainee csses, the Solicitor General notes. Decisions on those separate issues, the response argues, "would benefit from the normal decisional process" before reaching the Supreme Court.

The government does suggest that the Court could consider how the cutoff of habeas rights affects those facing war crimes charges, as part of its potential review of the other detainees' cases this Term. But it goes on to suggest that those issues were not raised in the D.C. Circut, or decided by it -- a situation that normally would put them beynd Supreme Court review.

If the other detainees' cases go forward in the Court this Term, the response said, "the government should not be subjected to the added burden of responding on a highly expedited basis to an additional set of arguments that, by [Hamdan/Khadr's] descriiption, are 'in many ways distinct' " from the issues in the other detainee cases. The review of those other cases, it added, would not benefit from "injecting new issues into the casethat have not yetbeen decided by any court."

In its final argument, the government argues that Hamdan and Khadr woudl not be harmed if they had to go through war crimes trials, because the new Military Commissions Act would allow them to seek to remedy any "legal defect in those proceedings" in an appeal to the D.C. Circuit from final judgments of conviction. Pre-trial appellate review of legal challenges to a prosecution that has not yet begun, it said, "is strongly disfavored and rarely permitted."

"Requiring [Hamdan and Khadr] to await the outcome of their prosecution to challenge the constitutionality of the MCA places them in the same position as the vast majority of criminal defendants facing trail before courts that presumptively have jurisdiction," the government concludes.

The two detainees' lawyers, in their reply, sought to counter the arguments of the government with these points:
 Speeding up review of their appeal would only require the government to file its response eight days earlier than it would be required to do so anyway, under Court Rules.
 Because Hamdan and Khadr face early war crimes trials, their case is a stronger candidate for swift review than that of other detainees not facing charges.
 Their appeal has enough of a chance of being reviewed by the Court that the Court at least should have the chance to consider doing so promptly.
 If the motion to expedite is denied, the government may seek added time for its response, putting off Court consideration for perhaps an added six weeks.
 Granting their case now, and hearing it along with the other detainees' appeals, will bring the full array of issues on detainees' habeas rights before the Court. No one involved in the other detainees' cases will be able to raise the separate questions this appeal poses.
 The D.C. Circuit ruling in the other detainees' cases already settles the habeas issue for all detainees so far as that Court is concerned, so there would be no purpose in sending the Hamdan case back there for review.
 These two detainees' claimed right not to be subject to "an unlawful trial" by military commission "will be lost irretrievably if review is delayed."
 The combined petition of Hamdan and Khadr seeking review of differing lower court rulings is within the Court's Rules for a joint petition.
 It would not be a burden on the government to respond promptly to the issues raised in this appeal, especially since the government has been briefing the same issues in the lower courts and is thus already familiar with what is at stake.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, March 5, 2007 8:14 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Monday, March 05, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070305.pdf; agnb070305.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, MARCH 5, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

DOJ Probes Arab Bank's Ties To Terrorism Funding 3
Hicks' Military Lawyer Blasted Over Statements Made In Australia 3

Homeland Response:

Holt Seeks Update On FBI's Anthrax Investigation 3
WPost: Florida Encouraging Building Where Hurricanes Likely To Strike Again 3
WPost Says Homeland Security Bill Should Not Be Blocked Over Labor Issue 3

War News:

Bush, Cheney To Deliver Speeches On Iraq, War On Terror 4
US, Iraqi Troops Meet Little Resistance In Push Into Sadr City ... 4
War Spending Bill Seen As Fraying Democratic Unity 6
Sadr, Mahdi Army Quiescent As US Surge Starts..... 7
US Said To Do Little To Aid Iraqi Refugees..... 8
Japan Mulls Extending Iraq Mission..... 8
Khalilzad Says US Has Not Ruled Out Bilateral Talks At Iraq Summit..... 8
US Troops Said To Have Fired On Afghan Civilians 9
Taliban Bombing Underscores Purpose Of Cheney Visit..... 9
Lawmakers Urge Pakistan To Curb Al Qaeda 9

DOJ:

Domenici Says He Contacted US Attorney..... 10

Criminal Law:

Kremlin Critic Shot In Maryland Thought To Be Robbery Victim 11
FBI, California AG Investigating Allegedly Corrupt Police Dept.. 11
FBI Agent Maintains Elderly Mob Figure Remains Influential 11
Defendant In DC Death Penalty Case Seeks Mistrial."..... 12
Federal Law Prevents Prosecutors From Charging Olsen With Murder..... 12
Gibbons Retains Top Criminal Lawyer..... 12
Whereabouts Of Nearly One In Five Released Texas Sex Felons Unknown..... 12
FBI Now Able Crack Mortgage Fraud Cases More Quickly 13
Sarbanes-Oxley Used To Prosecute Lawyer Tied To FBI Child Porn Probe..... 13
D'Amato To Lobby For Poker Players Alliance..... 13
Florida Sex Offender Center Shows Record Of Failure..... 13
Former Teen Welfare Mother Poised To Become DC Police Chief..... 13

Civil Law:

Measure Curbing Federal Procurement Access For Former Officials Clears Committee..... 14

Civil Rights:

DOJ Official To Lead Racial Healing Discussions In Omaha..... 14
Plaintiffs Await Ruling On Georgia Tech Policies 14
Disabled Attorney Helps Others With Disabilities 15
NAACP President Resigns 15
Role Of Education In Black Achievement Examined..... 16
NYTimes Urges Legislative Review Of New York's Civil Confinement Agreement 16

Antitrust:

Environmental Concerns Feature Into TXU Buyout Deal 16
IP Verdicts Exceeded $1.3 Billion In 2006 16
Federal Judge Rejects Recusal Motion In Music Price-Fixing Case..... 16
Alcatel-Lucent To Appeal Dismissal Of Microsoft Patent Dispute17
Patent Office To Review Applications Online..... 17

Indian Affairs:

Cherokee Nation Slave Descendents Face Uncertainty After Ouster 17

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ahead Of Bush Visit, FBI Investigates Salvadoran Legislators' Murder In Guatemala 18
Mueller Starts Reading List For FBI 18
Fourteen-Year-Old's Murder Spurs Crackdown On Los Angeles Gangs 18
Attorneys, Jurors Reflect On Failed Prosecution Of DC's Largest Drug Seizure..... 18
Louisiana Cocaine Dealer Facing Life In Prison 19
Reporting Continues On Multistate Investigation Of Online Drug Sales 19
"Grow Houses" Seen As National Trend In Marijuana Trade 19
California Man Sentenced To Nearly 6 Years In Prison In "Pot-Candy" Case..... 20
Mexican Drug Cartels Shift To Overland Trafficking Routes 20

Central America Called Crucial Way Station In Cocaine Trade . 20

Immigration:

Bush Said To Have Final Chance To Overhaul Immigration Laws 20

Tax:

Absent Congressional Action, AMT Could Affect 23 Million 20

Congress-Administration:

Congress Takes Up Problems At Walter Reed Today 21
Gates "Greeted As A Liberator" At Pentagon 22
Cheney Praises Bolton's Service At UN 22
Paulson Sounds Optimistic Note On US Economy 22
Homeless Veterans, Hard To Count, May Not Get Aid They Need 22
Sanchez Said To Face Tests On Her Substance As Public Official 23
Thune's Help For South Dakota Firm Seen As Symptomatic Of GOP Problems 23
Navy Said To Be Getting Rid Of Useful Warships 23
Some See Message About Bush In New Movie About Ancient Greece 23
NYTimes Urges Congress To Address Problems In Credit Industry 24

Other News:

Increasingly, Uninsured Belong To Middle Class 24
Estimates Of Oil Reserves Rise As Technology Revives Old Fields 24
Romney Gets Straw Poll Victory From Skeptical Conservatives 24
Bush's Woes May Boost Giuliani Quest For GOP Nomination .. 25
Clinton, Obama Commemorate 42nd Anniversary Of Selma March 26
Clinton Warns Of Dangers From Foreign Debt 28
Bloomberg Said To Be Considering Run As Third Party Candidate 28
Kucinich Waits For Campaign To Catch On With Public 28
Richardson Wins Praise From Republican Watts 28
Dean, Martinez To Meet On Primary Schedule 28
DeLay Seeks To Rally Conservatives 29
Rothenberg Says Collins Faces Tough, But Winnable Race 29
Beverly Hills Official Set To Become Highest-Ranking Iranian American 29
Former Senator Eagleton Dies At 77 29
WPost Praises Virginia Law On Court-Appointed Lawyers' Fees29
Bush To Face Questions On Economic Policies In Latin America 29
US To Offer Pyongyang "Face-Saving" Nuclear Plan 30
Lawmakers Complain Of Weak US Intelligence 30
Iran, Saudi Summit Produces "Little Substance." 31
Palestinian Leaders Seek To Finalize Unity Government 31
Bush "Inner Circle" Split Over Doha Talks 31
Beijing Announces 18% Increase In Military Spending 31
Brown Expected To Effect "Big Change" In British Foreign Policy 32
"Human Rights" Clause Blocking EU-India Trade Accord 32
Killings Said To Have Exposed Rampant Lawlessness In Central America 32
Ivory Coast's President, Rebels Sign Accord 33
Sweden Cited As Example For Pension Reform 33
Left Accused Of Double Standard On Civil Rights 33
Diehl Urges Turkey To "Shrug" Off US Genocide Resolution 33
Congress Urged To Protect Rights Of War Medics 33
EU Market Commissioner Urges Reforms 33
NYTimes Celebrates ICC Moves Against Genocide 34
NYTimes Praises Drug Firm's Action Against Malaria In Africa . 34
WSJournal Criticizes EU Action Against Microsoft 34

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 34

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 35

DOJ_NMG_0139226

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Probes Arab Bank's Ties To Terrorism Funding. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Meyer, 850K) reports, "A three-year investigation into the activities of" Arab Bank, "one of the Middle East's largest and most influential" banks, is "producing extensive evidence of how tens of millions of dollars have flowed from wealthy Saudi Arabians to Palestinian groups that allegedly used some of the money to pay off suicide bombers and their survivors." DOJ "is conducting a criminal investigation into the New York branch of Arab Bank, which is based in Jordan, and its financial links to organizations and individuals accused of terrorism, according to three former U.S. counter-terrorism officials." The Times notes that in 2005, Arab Bank "agreed to pay the federal government $24 million in fines for violating U.S. laws aimed at preventing terrorist financing. … The bank is also being sued in federal court in Brooklyn by Americans and Israelis injured in suicide bombings or other fighting in Israel and the occupied territories."

Hicks' Military Lawyer Blasted Over Statements Made In Australia. The New York Times (3/5, Bonner, 1.16M) reports Col. Morris D. Davis, the chief prosecutor at Guantánamo Bay, "has lashed out at the military lawyer for one of the detainees." Davis said Maj. Michael Mori of the United States Marine Corps, "should not be making public appearances in Australia in uniform on behalf of his client, David Hicks, and that he faced possible prosecution for some of his remarks." Davis is quoted as saying, "I don't know what Major Mori's plans are right now but if he wants to come back home and represent his client, that would be helpful. … Certainly in the U.S. it would not be tolerated having a U.S. marine in uniform actively inserting himself into the political process. It is very disappointing to see that happening in Australia, and if that was any of my prosecutors, they would be held accountable." Major Mori, "who was in Australia this past week, for the seventh time in three years, reacted with anger. 'Are they trying to intimidate me?' he said in a telephone interview on Sunday."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Holt Seeks Update On FBI's Anthrax Investigation. The AP (3/5) reports Rep. Rush Holt "wants hearings into what he says is a lack of headway in the FBI's investigation into the deadly anthrax attacks of 2001. 'It seems to me this investigation is not making progress. I can't say for sure. They won't brief me,' Holt told The Times of Trenton for Saturday newspapers. 'Not briefing Congress on the status of the probe into the biggest biological attack in United States history is inexcusable,' he said. … Over the years, Holt has been a vocal critic of the bureau's handling of the case, especially because anthrax contamination was found in mail facilities in and near Holt's district. Holt on Friday called on four committee chairmen and one subcommittee chairman in the House to hold oversight hearings into the investigation. … Several earlier attempts to receive information failed. In September and October 2006, Holt formally requesting that the FBI brief Congress on the investigation. He was denied."

WPost: Florida Encouraging Building Where Hurricanes Likely To Strike Again. The Washington Post (3/5, A14, 690K) editorializes, "America has a bad habit of building in areas that don't make sense environmentally or actuarially" that "has been aided and abetted by public officials who bend to the will of developers and their customers, despite storms, floods, earthquakes and other natural calamities that destroy lives and break banks. The latest example of this can be found in Florida. By rolling back insurance rates, spreading the risk and fiddling with its catastrophe fund, the Sunshine State has invited more development in dangerous places." The Post states that "in keeping a campaign promise to cut rates, Gov. Charlie Crist (R) and the legislature not only are gambling with the state's fiscal future but also are giving people an incentive to keep putting themselves in harm's way."

WPost Says Homeland Security Bill Should Not Be Blocked Over Labor Issue. The Washington Post (3/5, A14, 690K) editorializes President Bush "shouldn't veto" the Senate's "generally sensible homeland security bill" over a provision to provide union rights for TSA screeners, and Republicans "shouldn't vote to sustain if he does. Other employees of the Department of Homeland Security enjoy the benefits of collective bargaining without endangering Americans' safety. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who sponsored the bill, points out that TSA employees have unnecessarily limited access to redress, which contributes to the TSA's high turnover, high absenteeism and low morale. Meanwhile, there's a lot more to the bill than this one provision." The Post goes on to commend the bill's sponsors for excluding "a requirement that all sea cargo containers be scanned for harmful materials before entering the United States. … A pilot program testing the mere feasibility of scanning all containers is far from complete."

DOJ_NMG_0139227

WAR NEWS:

Bush, Cheney To Deliver Speeches On Iraq, War On Terror. The Washington Times (3/5, Ward, 88K) reports, "Both President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney will give speeches in the next few days on the war on terrorism, to the applause of Republicans who say the White House needs to be more aggressive in selling the successes in Iraq." Bush "will speak on Iraq and the war against terrorism tomorrow in a speech to the American Legion. Mr. Cheney will speak today to the Veterans of Foreign Wars legislative convention. A senior Bush administration official, however, said that 'more than anything else, the actions on the ground in Iraq, part in Baghdad, are going to dictate how it's interpreted, so, the president, we view his role in this is to give the broader context.' Politically, the White House is happy that the center of the Iraq war debate has shifted to Capitol Hill, giving the Democrats the chance to fail on their campaign promises to end the war."

US, Iraqi Troops Meet Little Resistance In Push Into Sadr City. ABC World News (3/4, story 4, 1:35, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq today US troops moved into Sadr City, the vast and volatile Shiite neighborhood, a stronghold of the radical religious leader Muqtada al Sadr. This is the latest step in the new security operation which is designed to bring Baghdad under control." ABC (McCarthy) noted Sadr City is "the stronghold of the anti-American cleric Muqtada al Sadr. And what was perhaps most surprising was that they actually met little or no resistance. Some had thought that Sadr's men would fight the Americans, but it now appears the militias have been told to lie low during the American surge."

Similarly, USA Today (3/5, Davis, 2.27M) calls the raid a "critical step in the new Baghdad security plan," and says Mahdi Army "militants have displayed little resistance to the security campaign. Sunday was no exception: US forces swept through the eastern corner of Sadr City with barely a sign of opposition."

The Washington Post (3/5, A11, Raghavan, 690K) reports "the operation represented the most serious effort yet by the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to neutralize the Mahdi Army." Maliki "has for months faced intense US pressure to send troops into Sadr City and assert the government's authority." But "he has long avoided doing so because Sadr, who controls six ministries and 30 seats in parliament, is his political benefactor." Sunday's push "occurred only after Sadr had agreed to support Maliki's new Baghdad security plan, Iraqi officials said, and after negotiations with civil leaders and Sadr's representatives on the role of US troops in Sadr City." Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a US military spokesman, said, "It is a multi-day operation, continuing operation. … We do not go and do this just to leave."

The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Susman, 850K) reports Sadr City's "fearsome reputation and political clout had rendered it largely off-limits to US and Iraqi government troops for nearly three years." The Times refers to a "limited raid, in the Jamila section of the sprawling slum," which "raised the question of how long things will stay quiet, given the opposition to foreign troops of anti-US Shiite cleric…Al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia took control of Sadr City's streets after the US-led invasion of Iraq in 2003." The Times adds, "More than 600 US soldiers and 550 Iraqi troops, backed by a column of armored vehicles, took part in Sunday's operation, described as a first step toward establishing a permanent US-Iraqi security station within Sadr City."

US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "We don't know whether he's had a change of heart, but certainly there is a change in tactics. He is lying low. Many of his supporters have left, particularly the commanders, Sadr City. The mayor of Sadr City welcomed the coalition forces today and promised to cooperate with it as they went along with the Iraqi forces there. This is a good thing that he is not resisting the coalition at this time. But what is needed over the long term is for the Sadr movement, for Muqtada al-Sadr, to embrace the political process and to give up on militias and on violence."

The CBS Evening News (3/4, story 4, :10, Attkisson, 7.66M) didn't note the offensive into Sadr City, but reported that "the US military said today two Marines and a sailor have been killed, raising the US death toll to 3,170."

"Surge" Said To Be Reducing Insurgent Violence. On ABC World News (3/4, story 4, 1:35, 8.78M), Terry McCarthy said, "I have just come back into Baghdad after a month away, and what has struck me is how much calmer the city feels now than before I left. It is far from perfect -- today Baghdad had two car bombs and several roadside bombs, and tonight we can hear mortars falling in the south of the city. But during the day, the streets are definitely more crowded, and many locals told us they feel much safer moving around their own neighborhoods. The police tell us the number of dead bodies turning up on the streets is dropping sharply. All this, however, pales in comparison to Kurdistan in the north, where we spent most of last week. The economy is booming up there, and the security situation is almost perfect."

Mohammed and Omar Fadhil, who write a blog, IraqTheModel.com, from Baghdad, say in today's Wall Street

DOJ_NMG_0139228

Journal (3/5, A17, 2.04M), "The new strategy to secure Baghdad has been dubbed by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as 'Operation Imposing the Law.' After weeks of waiting and anxiety it is finally underway, and early signs are encouraging. The government information campaign and the news about thousands of additional troops coming had a positive impact even before the operation started. … The brightest image of the past two weeks was the scene of displaced families returning home; more than a thousand families are back to their homes under the protection of the Army and police. This figure invites hope that Baghdad will restore its social, ethnic and religious mosaic. Marketplaces are seeing more activity and stores that were long shuttered are reopening -- including even some liquor stores that came under vicious attacks in the past." This "is a sign that extremists no longer can intimidate people and hold the city hostage. All of this gives the sense that law is being imposed."

The AP (3/5, Lenz) reports on the "new strategy to move some units off big, fortress-like bases and into outposts in Iraq's most violent places. The plan hinges on hopes that increased contact with ordinary Iraqis will help soldiers separate innocent civilians from militants hiding among them, and try to rebuild a battered U.S. image after four years of fighting. The shift also stands as an indirect indictment of the Pentagon's old counterinsurgency plans after years of losing touch with the Iraqi streets - and access to the crucial rumor mills and informants." An open-air clinic produced "dozens of tips. ... Along with the advantages, however, come risks. A coordinated attack last month on the outpost in Tarmiyah, about 30 miles north of Baghdad, killed two soldiers and wounded dozens more."

Iraqi, British Troops Storm Government Offices In Basra. The New York Times (3/5, Semple, 1.16M) reports, "Iraqi special forces and British troops stormed the offices of an Iraqi government intelligence agency in the southern city of Basra on Sunday, and British officials said they discovered about 30 prisoners, some showing signs of torture." The raid "appeared to catch Iraq's central government by surprise and raised new questions about the rule of law in the Shiite-dominated south, where less than two weeks ago Britain announced plans for a significant reduction in its forces because of improved stability." The Times adds, "News of the Basra raid, with its resonant themes of torture and sectarian-driven conflict, coincided" with the Sadr City operation. Maliki "condemned the raid in Basra. He publicly said nothing about the evidence of torture."

10,000 Government Employees Fired Or Reassigned. USA Today (3/5, Jervis, 2.27M) reports, "Iraq's Interior Ministry has fired or reassigned more than 10,000 employees, including high-ranking police, who were found to have tortured prisoners, accepted bribes or had ties to militias, a ministry spokesman has disclosed." A "soon-to-be-released internal inquiry also details 41 incidents of human rights abuse at the ministry. In one case, four members of the national police hanged prisoners from a ceiling and beat them with sticks in a ministry-run prison known as Site 4, according to the report by the ministry's inspector general."

"Plan B" If "Surge" Fails Could Entail Containing Civil War, Redeployment Outside Baghdad. The Washington Post (3/5, A1, DeYoung, Ricks, 690K) reports on its front page, "During a White House meeting last week, a group of governors asked President Bush and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about their backup plan for Iraq. What would the administration do if its new strategy didn't work? The conclusion they took away, the governors later said, was that there is no Plan B." While "senior officials have rebuffed questions about other options in the event of failure... the subject is on a lot of minds inside and outside the government. 'I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be,' Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates acknowledged last month to Congress, where many favor gradual or immediate withdrawal." Gates "did not elaborate. Several administration officials, while insisting that a wide range of options was discussed before Bush's Jan. 10 announcement, firmly closed the door on the subject of fallback plans. … National security experts outside the government have stepped into the void, offering detailed options through public papers, speeches and policy proposals over the past several weeks." Stephen D. Biddle, "a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and an adviser to the Defense Department," said, "The ultimate Plan B is pull everybody out. … Nobody wants to do that. Most are looking at the middle ground between surge and pullout." The Post adds, "Most options involve partial or complete US redeployment from Baghdad and other violent urban centers, followed by containment of the civil war within Iraq's borders. … A related option would involve redeploying US forces to the relative safety of the Kurdish region in northern Iraq, to more peaceful areas in the south and to Anbar in the west, where they could focus on fighting al-Qaeda."

Meanwhile, on the Los Angeles Times (3/5, 850K), Harvard professor Samantha Power writes, "Some defenders of…Bush's approach...have now settled on genocide warnings after each of their original justifications for being in Iraq -- weapons of mass destruction, terrorism prevention, energy diversification, regional stabilization and democracy promotion — has crumbled one by one. Other proponents of remaining in Iraq...are genuinely frightened that, as ferocious as the civil war there has become, a U.S. withdrawal could unleash an all-out slaughter." Power argues instead, "We must announce our intention to depart and use the intervening months to prioritize civilian protection by pursuing a bold set of measures combining political pressure, humanitarian relocation and judicial deterrence." If US political pressure on Maliki fails, "the US should go further and announce its willingness to assist in the voluntary transport and relocation of Iraqi civilians in peril. ... Finally, if we are serious about preventing further sectarian horrors, the US must send a clear signal to the militias and political leaders who order or carry out atrocities that they will be brought to justice for their crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0139229

Tancredo Says Bush Has Signaled US Pullout May Begin In November. Rep. Tom Tancredo said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "I remember Gen. Casey specifically in front of a Senate committee saying that he had talked with every single commander on the ground. Not one of them supported such an increase or believed that it was necessary, and in fact, would be counterproductive because it would only make the Iraqis more dependent on the United States. ... I think that the increase in the number of troops that we've sent to Iraq is simply the beginning of the end game. We are leaving Iraq. We are leaving there relatively soon. ... I don't know why a lot of people haven't focused on this, but" President Bush "said, I'm establishing a benchmark. And that benchmark is November. And by November, he said, every single province -- 18 provinces -- in Iraq will be under control of the Iraqi government. Well, to me, that is a pretty strong statement to anybody who's listening that that's the end of the line."

War Spending Bill Seen As Fraying Democratic Unity. Roll Call (3/5, Davis, Pierce) reports, "The still-evolving bill to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan has rapidly become a political headache for Democratic and GOP leaders, as the debate over what to include in the measure has exacerbated intraparty tensions in both chambers." The House Appropriations Committee "could mark up the $100-plus billion emergency supplemental spending bill as early as Thursday, but knowledgeable Democratic aides cautioned last week that the schedule has not been confirmed and could spill into the week of March 12. … While Democratic leaders have emphasized their party's unity on the mid-February resolution condemning the proposed troop increase, the supplemental measure is already straining that accord." The divisions "have presented a serious test for Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) leadership, as well as for Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.), who must shepherd the legislation. … Meanwhile, Senate Republicans said the Democrats' apparent inability to forge a consensus on how to address the Iraq War in the supplemental and in other ways made their opposition to funding restrictions or cuts much easier."

Murtha Says US Doesn't Have The Troops To Sustain Iraq War Effort. Rep. John Murtha said on NBC's Meet The Press (3/4, Russert), "The other day, Gen. Pace, the chief of the Joint Chiefs, said, 'Look, you're going to hurt the troops deployment overseas if you do what Murtha wants to do.' ... What he didn't talk about was our strategic reserve, what he didn't talk about was we're sending troops back without a year at home, what he didn't talk about was the fact they're going in without the equipment they need to fight in combat. That's unconscionable, and the Congress is going to stop that. The White House is finally beginning to recognize they don't have the troops, as I predicted they wouldn't have, to sustain this deployment. They certainly don't have the troops to increase and to have a surge without breaking every rule that they set. ... We're caught in a civil war. ... There's no way that we can continue our troops in harm's way in a civil war. I supported an extra 200,000 troops in Vietnam when I came back from Vietnam. It didn't work. This is not working."

Senators' Opinions On Iraq Resolution Break Along Party Lines. Senate Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin said on CBS' Face The Nation (3/4, Schieffer), "There's going to be a resolution, which we believe will get the support of almost every Democrat, and hopefully a few Republicans, because this should not be a partisan issue, which will modify the authorization so that our mission in Iraq is more limited. It will not be combat in the middle of Baghdad. It will be a transition to a more limited mission of supporting the Baghdad army, training and logistics of that army. And we will, of course, have a limited presence for a targeted counterterrorism mission, as well as trying to see if we can provide some support for the borders of Iraq."

Sen. Charles Schumer said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "We are coming to a very broad consensus...that we ought to change the mission. The mission in Iraq has devolved into policing a civil war, having our troops walk up and down Haifa Street, as the Sunnis and Shiites who have hated each other for centuries shoot at one another. We want to change it, to have a much more narrow focus, and that is on counter-terrorism as well as force protection. ... We're hoping to get close to unanimity, like we did on the surge resolution, that requires the President to change that mission, so that we focus on what Americans always wanted to focus on: counter-terrorism."

Sen. Christopher Dodd said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "Obviously this is a civil war going on, and expecting US forces to be a referee in civil war in large urban areas -- Baghdad has six million people -- with some 18 to 21,000 groups on the ground doesn't make a lot of sense to many people. ... I think it's going to be incumbent upon the Iraqis themselves to pull this together."

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "This is about the Congress trying to micromanage the situation. When the going gets tough, they're trying to figure out how to get out. And they can't get their act together on how to defund the troops, so they're having all these different approaches. You had the Biden resolution, the Levin resolution, the Pelosi-Reid resolution, the Murtha slow-bleed resolution. ... They can't get it together."

DOJ_NMG_0139230

Sen. Lindsey Graham said on NBC's Meet The Press (3/4, Russert), "People are frustrated. They're beginning to doubt whether the Iraqis can get their act together among themselves. Are we're in the middle of a group of people, no matter how long we stay and how much money we spend and how many Americans are killed, are they capable of pulling this off? I think people doubt that. ... The biggest mistake we made early on was underselling how hard it would be. I think people have lost sight due to frustration, that it's part of the overall war on terror. The President's going forward based on an assumption that a failed state in Iraq is a mighty blow in the overall war on terror. ... Thank God there's not 535 commander-in-chiefs, there's only one."

Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "There are elements of Shiite and Sunni people fighting each other, to be sure, but some of that was spawned by Al Qaeda deliberately trying to get the Shiites to strike back at Sunnis. ... What I heard when I was in Baghdad just about 12 days ago, both from the Iraqi leaders and also from our military commanders on the ground, early signs of success that this new strategy could work and was beginning to work."

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, again disagreeing with the Democratic majority, said on CBS' Face The Nation (3/4, Schieffer), "I don't think the resolution makes sense insofar as, look, if people want to stop this war, the way that the Constitution gives Congress authority to do it is to stop the funding. They won't do that, because there's not the support for it and they don't want to seem to be not supporting our troops. ... I wish instead of going into this kind of trench warfare, parliamentary partisan battling in Congress off and on for the next few months, that instead we do two things. One is concentrate on something all of us agree on, which is fixing the unacceptable, immoral gaps in our treatment system for the veterans who have fought in Iraq and Afghanistan. Second, we've got in Iraq now a new plan, additional troops, a new general. ... Let's have a truce in the political war here in Washington over the war in Iraq so we can give our general and our troops the opportunity to show some success in the real war in Iraq."

Public Opinion Shift Seen As Aiding Democrats, Hurting McCain. The Washington Times (3/5, Bellantoni, Miller, 88K) reports, "As the war in Iraq and the broader battle against terror were being fought abroad, the political calculus at home changed, with public opinion shifting to favor the Democrats on an issue that long had been a Republican winner." Republicans "won the 2002 and 2004 elections in part because voters were convinced that Democrats were weak on defense and lacked the political will to protect the U.S. from terrorists. That changed as the war in Iraq grew more unpopular -- a major factor in the sweeping Democratic gains last fall, allowing the party to regain congressional power." The Times adds, "Anti-war sentiment has been bolstered lately, with polls showing the majority of Americans disapproving of President Bush's plan to send a 'surge' of 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Most surveyed instead want to see troops withdrawn from Iraq with varying degrees of dispatch." The war has also "turned the Republican presidential race on its head, dragging down the popularity of one-time front-runner and war hawk Sen. John McCain of Arizona and bolstering anti-war candidates. 'I would much rather lose a campaign than lose a war,' Mr. McCain has said in defending his stance of wanting to send more troops to Iraq. The senator told The Washington Times he sees his party's rank and file recoiling from Democrats' anti-war rhetoric. 'Where I've been traveling -- which is talking to Republicans -- the Republican base is coming back and supporting the president because the Democrats have overreached,' said Mr. McCain, a decorated Vietnam veteran."

Sadr, Mahdi Army Quiescent As US Surge Starts. Newsweek (3/12, Nordland, 3.12M) reports Shiite leader Moqtada al-Sadr "has all but disappeared from the Iraqi scene the past three weeks, and Sadr's Mahdi Army has been notably quiet, too. Officially, the Iraqi government is attributing that to the new Baghdad security plan, part of a surge of forces that will eventually include 21,500 new American troops." But one Iraqi official "says what's really happening is the taming of Moqtada." Despite an "upsurge in suicide bombings by Sunni extremists, mostly aimed at Shia civilians, the number of reprisal killings is down dramatically since the security plan was launched on Feb. 14." The senior Iraqi official "credits pressure on Sadr from his former patrons in Iran, as well as from Ayatollah Sistani and the Marjaiyah, the Shia clerical leadership in Najaf. He says Iran is withholding military advice and aid to Sadrists as well as other rogue elements, and leaning on them to stop the killings." Some analysts "worry that Sadr and Shia extremists are just biding their time. But as additional U.S. troops arrive during the next two months, that may prove an uncomfortable wait."

IED Remains Biggest Threat To US Troops. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Kingsbury, 2.03M) reports the letters IED, "for improvised explosive device, have become forever associated with the war in Iraq. These weapons are the greatest day-to-day threat to U.S. forces. The military reported that at least 60 U.S. troops have been killed in IED attacks so far this year (the military doesn't report the cause of death in all instances). IEDs were responsible for more than half of American hostile-fire deaths in the past 12 months." The military has "struggled to develop practices and gear to counter the IED threat, with an array of devices designed to trigger the bombs prematurely or render them harmless."

DOJ_NMG_0139231

Kennedy Says It Will Take Congress Time To Affect Iraq Policy. Time (3/12, Calabresi, 4.03M) interviewed Sen. Edward Kennedy. Asked why, since Democrats "have the country with them against the war in Iraq," they "aren't acting to end it?" Kennedy said, "This war is the major blunder in American foreign policy. We ought to free ourselves from our troop involvement. But if you look back on Vietnam, it wasn't until 1973 that we passed the resolution that actually halted troops and money. There's no question that this is a slow-moving institution, and it's no new statement to say that we are behind what's happening out in the countryside."

US Said To Do Little To Aid Iraqi Refugees. Time (3/12, Calabresi, 4.03M) reports the war in Iraq "has driven nearly 4 million people from their homes. As many as 2 million have fled the country, in what Refugees International calls the fastest-growing crisis in the world." The burden "of coping with this exodus has fallen most heavily on Iraq's neighbors, such as Syria, Jordan and Iran, who have absorbed the vast majority of exiles. But the war's reverberations are being felt beyond the Middle East, in places as seemingly distant and incongruous as Sweden, which has taken in more than 11,000 Iraqis since 2005." The US, however, "has been reluctant to open its doors, admitting just 18 Iraqi refugees in 2005 and 202 in 2006." Although the Bush Administration "has offered to cover about a third of the $60 million that the U.N. says is needed for the refugees, the US's European and Arab allies think Washington should cover far more of the costs resulting from what they view as America's war."

Syria Playing Large Role In Aiding Refugees. Time (3/12, Butters, 4.03M) reports the Iraqi-refugee issue "is also changing Syria in deeper ways, altering the country's image in the Middle East -- and bolstering its leverage with the U.S. While the Bush Administration has accused it of supporting terrorism in Iraq, Israel and Lebanon, Syria has established itself as the lifeboat of the Arab world. Having taken in 180,000 temporary Lebanese refugees fleeing the war with Israel last summer, Syria is the only Arab country that has been equally welcoming to all of Iraq's religious sects, according to Syrian human-rights groups. Only Jordan -- which has received 750,000 Iraqis but has stopped accepting more -- comes close to matching Syria's largesse."

Sweden Accepting More Iraqi Refugees. Time (3/12, Walt, 4.03M) reports Sweden, a "country of 9 million has long prided itself on being one of the world's most hospitable to foreigners fleeing war and hardship." But "nothing could have prepared Swedes for the numbers of Iraqis who are pouring in today." Having "granted asylum to 2,330 Iraqis in 2005, Sweden received nearly four times that many last year." With Iraq's "civil war still raging, Swedish officials say they are bracing for a possible 35,000 this year."

Japan Mulls Extending Iraq Mission. The AP (3/5) reports, "Japan's top government spokesman said Monday that Tokyo is undecided about whether to extend the nation's air force mission in Iraq when it expires in July, but that a decision is expected by the end of this month. Tokyo has been airlifting U.N. and coalition personnel and supplies into Baghdad and other Iraqi cities from nearby Kuwait since last year as part of efforts to support the reconstruction of Iraq. The mission is set to end July 31, and debate is already gearing up about whether Tokyo will continue its contributions to a war increasingly unpopular at home. ... some in Japan criticize the operations for violating the pacifist constitution, which prohibits the use of force in solving international disputes."

Khalilzad Says US Has Not Ruled Out Bilateral Talks At Iraq Summit. Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, told CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "This is a multilateral meeting at the invitation of Iraq. Of course, the purpose is to get the neighbors to contribute to stabilizing Iraq, to work with the Iraqi government with regard to its agenda for success in Iraq. And we have not decided, at this point, with regard to anything bilateral, but we will be prepared to play our role as constructively as possible."

Similarly, the Washington Times (3/5, 88K) reports, "US and Iranian officials, in separate remarks yesterday, both left open the possibility of bilateral talks on the sidelines of a regional meeting this week in Baghdad." The Times notes Ambassador Khalilzad's remarks to CNN and reports that Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini, "meanwhile, said his country has not decided whether it will attend the Baghdad conference but did not rule out a decision to meet directly" with Khalilzad."

Meanwhile, Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "It's important that the Iraqis are calling this group of their neighbors together, to urge them to help Iraq become a stable society. And clearly...we have an interest in conveying to the Iranians our displeasure with their sponsorship of weapons and elements of violence within Iraq. And I think it is important for us to convey that message to them."

Sen. Christopher Dodd said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "This should have happened a long time ago. We've had more than a year of the Administration refusing to sit down and talk with anybody, except our friends in the region, no wanting to talk to the Syrians or the Iranians. So I welcome that. I hope it's not too late."

DOJ_NMG_0139232

House Intelligence Committee member Pete Hoekstra said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "If you take a look at the bigger picture -- their activities with the nuclear weapons program, their relationships with Hamas, Hezbollah, their activities in Iraq -- Iran is clearly somebody that we need to be very, very concerned about. ... We need to focus on them and I think some of the changes and some of the steps that are being taken by the Administration are very positive."

US Troops Said To Have Fired On Afghan Civilians. The CBS Evening News (3/4, story 3, :20, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "There are charges that US forces fired on Afghan civilians in the chaotic aftermath of a suicide bomb attack on a US military convoy in Afghanistan today. Afghan witnesses and gunshot victims say as many as ten Afghan victims were killed and 34 wounded. A US spokesman says it's unclear what happened."

ABC World News (3/4, story 3, 2:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "This is a delicate and dangerous moment in Afghanistan. A time when US troops are trying to both prepare for and pre-empt an expected spring offensive from the Taliban. And today at this crucial moment there was an incident that could further turn public opinion against Americans."

The New York Times (3/5, Gall, 1.16M) reports "American and Afghan officials said" US troops "opened fire on a highway filled with civilian cars and bystanders on Sunday." The US military "said the unit came under fire after a suicide bomber detonated his explosive-laden car near their convoy 'as part of a complex ambush involving enemy small-arms fire from several directions.' Members of the unit, on patrol near Jalalabad airfield, returned fire, and the civilians were killed and wounded in the cross-fire during the battle, according to a statement from the military press office at Bagram Air Base, 40 miles north of Kabul." The Washington Times/AP (3/5, Faiez), Washington Post (3/5, A11, Witte, 690K) and Los Angeles Times (3/5, Azimi, King, 850K) also reports the story.

Karzai Urged To Sign Amnesty Law. Richard May, a former captain with the Army's 82nd Airborne Division who served in Afghanistan and Iraq, and is now a fellow at the World Security Institute's Center for Defense Information, writes in the New York Times (3/5, 1.16M), "Late last month some 25,000 people held a rally in the Afghan capital, Kabul. Were they calling for more aid?" They "were urging President Hamid Karzai to sign a law providing legal amnesty for actions committed during the civil war that raged in Afghanistan during and after the Soviet occupation. While the law has passed both houses of Afghanistan's Parliament, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and several humanitarian groups have argued against it on the grounds that it eliminates any possibility for justice for the people killed, tortured and raped during that awful period." May says "Karzai should sign the law." The "fragile government in Kabul cannot focus on dividing its country over past acts. It must look to the future with a vision that accepts all elements of its society." Karzai "should err on the side of unity."

Taliban Bombing Underscores Purpose Of Cheney Visit. Time (3/2, Baker, 4.03M) reports the "suicide bomber outside the main U.S. military base in Afghanistan on Feb. 27 killed about two dozen people -- and underscored the mission of Dick Cheney, who had arrived less than 24 hours earlier to meet with Afghan President Hamid Karzai." The Vice President "had just come from Pakistan, where he urged President Pervez Musharraf to crack down on the activities of the Taliban -- which claimed responsibility for the attack, saying it was timed to Cheney's visit--and al-Qaeda." Musharraf is "in a bind. Even if he doubled the number of troops on the border, says a Western diplomat in Pakistan, it would probably just exacerbate regional violence by fueling antigovernment sentiment."

Newsweek (3/12, Hirsh, Yousafzai, 3.12M) reports the "Feb. 27 attack on Baghram air base during Cheney's surprise visit was the most vivid reminder to date that, half a decade after they were supposedly vanquished, the Taliban is back in force, along with its onetime Qaeda guests. And the jihadists are now confident enough to launch a frontal suicide assault on the main U.S. stronghold in South Asia." The "Bush team's main concern now is that the Taliban's 'spring offensive' could topple Karzai or turn him into a more isolated figure, hunkered down in Kabul." An "even scarier prospect is that a newly Talibanized Afghanistan, along with sympathetic areas of neighboring Pakistan, could become a launchpad for the next plot against America." Taliban officials "tell NEWSWEEK that they have carved out a huge border zone of their own. And they say Qaeda 'foreigners' -- mainly Arabs bent on killing Westerners -- are being welcomed back into parts of Afghanistan and Pakistan's North Waziristan region, where Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf signed a controversial peace deal with tribal elders last September."

Lawmakers Urge Pakistan To Curb Al Qaeda. The AP (3/5, Yen) reports Pakistan "must do more to stem al-Qaeda in its ungoverned territories amid growing signs operatives plan a spring offensive against allied forces in Afghanistan," lawmakers on the intelligence committees said Sunday.

Senate Intelligence Committee member Dianne Feinstein told Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "The Pakistanis either have to let us go in, or go in themselves when they have intelligence. And I think the kind of half-measures that the Pakistanis have taken in that particular area don't stand us in good stead. There's no question that there's going to be a spring offensive in Afghanistan…and we have to have some pinpoint attacks that produce some dividends."

DOJ_NMG_0139233

Meanwhile, House Intelligence Committee member Pete Hoekstra said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "There's no doubt that we've degraded the capabilities of Al Qaeda, but they are regrouping. … We may want Pakistan to do more things. But President Musharraf is facing elections in September. There are parliamentary elections next January. We need stability in the regime. We need this regime to survive. And there's a reason that they've called this the ungoverned areas. No one has really been able to go into these areas and take control, but the Pakistanis have been doing a number of things to help us go after Al Qaeda."

New Al Qaeda's Strength Called Into Question. The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Grier, 59K) reports, "Hidden in the harsh terrain of Pakistan's tribal lands near the Afghan border, Al Qaeda's senior leaders have quietly been rebuilding their terrorist network – including lines of command to cells in other nations." But "this resurgence does not mean the group has regained its old strength, say US intelligence officials and outside experts. Al Qaeda's top levels are now filled with inexperienced commanders, and its new camps can train only a fraction of the recruits the pre-2001 infrastructure in Afghanistan could handle." Al Qaeda's "goals also remain murky. It is not clear whether the organization has a specific plan to strike within the United States or whether it considers Europe, or Iraq, more important in its war to impose its vision of Islam on the Middle East."

DOJ:

Domenici Says He Contacted US Attorney. The AP (3/5, Talhelm) reports, "New Mexico Sen. Pete Domenici acknowledged Sunday that he called a federal prosecutor to ask about a criminal investigation several months after calling for his replacement, but insisted he never pressured nor threatened his state's US attorney." The prosecutor, David Iglesias, "was fired by the Justice Department in December. Iglesias says he believes he was dismissed for resisting pressure from two members of Congress before last year's election to rush indictments in a Democratic kickback investigation." The AP adds, "Ethics experts said Domenici's conduct may have violated Senate rules, which generally bar communications between members of Congress and federal prosecutors about ongoing criminal investigations.":

The Washington Post (3/5, A1, Eggen, 690K) notes "Iglesias and five other fired prosecutors are scheduled to testify tomorrow before Congress." Iglesias "declined to comment in detail yesterday on Domenici's statement, saying he was refraining from further public remarks before the hearings."

The New York Times (3/5, Johnston, 1.16M) reports "a Justice Department spokesman said on Sunday that records at the agency showed that the senator complained about Mr. Iglesias in calls to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in September 2005 and again in January and April 2006. The senator made a brief call to Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, in October 2006 when the deliberations over Mr. Iglesias's dismissal began. In each of these calls, said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, Mr. Domenici expressed general concerns about Mr. Iglesias and questioned whether he was 'up to the job.' Mr. Roehrkasse added, 'At no time did they discuss the public corruption case.'" The Times adds, "A Justice Department official said Mr. Domenici's criticism of Mr. Iglesias was a factor in the decision to remove the prosecutor, adding that the decision was also based on an internal evaluation at Justice Department headquarters regarding his handling of the job."

Newsweek (3/12, Isikoff, 3.12M) reports the "firings of eight U.S. attorneys has put the heat on top Justice Department officials -- and some GOP members of Congress." The "controversy escalated last week when David Iglesias, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, went public with a dramatic charge: that he had gotten phone calls from two unidentified GOP lawmakers in D.C. last October, pressing him to bring indictments in a high-profile corruption case involving a prominent local Democrat before the November election." Iglesias "plans to name the lawmakers who called him as Rep. Heather Wilson (who was in a tight re-election battle at the time) and Sen. Pete Domenici (who originally sponsored him for the job)." A senior Justice official "confirmed to NEWSWEEK that Domenici 'did express general concerns' about Iglesias to senior DOJ officials -- but insisted he did not specifically complain about the corruption case." The "decision to fire the U.S. attorneys en masse was made late last year by two top aides to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales -- chief of staff Kyle Sampson and deputy A.G. Paul McNulty -- according to a senior department official."

Feinstein Discusses Upcoming Hearings. Senate Judiciary Committee member Dianne Feinstein said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "What's strange about this, never before in history has it happened that in a short given period of time, at least seven were called and told they should resign by a specific date in January. I think that's been pretty well-established. Now, the problem is that the Patriot Act had in it an amendment which gave the ability to the Administration to appoint an interim US attorney permanently, not subject to a limited period of time, pending confirmation. We in the Senate believe it's very important that US attorneys be confirmed by the Senate. That's really what's going on now. Some political things may well emerge. There are going to be a series of hearings...and we'll see what facts emerge. But I think there's a lot of evidence that this was done in a way to bring in some bright young Republican operatives into these positions. We'll see."

DOJ_NMG_0139234

More Commentary. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/5) editorializes, "The Bush administration slipped a provision into the USA Patriot Act that Congress renewed last year allowing the attorney general to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods without congressional approval. Previously, such appointments could last for only 120 days. Lawmakers may have figured that the extra leeway might help in rare emergencies." The Sentinel continues, "Well, surprise, surprise. The Justice Department has so far used this provision eight times - and not for emergencies. In a move unprecedented for its scope, the agency has fired eight U.S. attorneys. And indications are that the dismissed prosecutors were too independent, even though President Bush had appointed them. The administration appears to be replacing them with those more pliable. … Congress must stop the purge and reimpose the time limit. Commendably, a House judiciary subcommittee is issuing subpoenas to four of the dismissed prosecutors to appear before it on Tuesday, and the Senate Judiciary Committee is poised to follow suit. Sworn testimony should shed some light on what may be an administration effort to get prosecutors to toe the party line." The Sentinel adds, "The dispute is all the more reason to set the record straight in hearings. … Also, Congress must retract the permission it gave the Justice Department to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely - permission the administration has abused."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Kremlin Critic Shot In Maryland Thought To Be Robbery Victim. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A7, Perez, Cullison) reports the FBI joined local police investigating the Adelphi, Md shooting of Paul M. Joyal, "an intelligence expert who suggested the Kremlin was involved in the poisoning death of" Alexander Litvinenko. According to the Journal, "A federal law-enforcement official said local police asked for help from the Federal Bureau of Investigation in part because of Mr. Joyal's activities in the Russian emigré community in the U.S. and his views on" the poisoning of Litvinenko." On 'Dateline NBC' Feb. 25, Joyal "said the Litvinenko murder was a message 'to anyone who wants to speak out against the Kremlin: 'If you do, no matter who you are, where you are, we will find you and we will silence you -- in the most horrible way possible.'"

The Financial Times (3/5, Sevastopulo, Belton) reports Oleg Kalugin, a "former senior KGB officer who met a Russia intelligence expert just hours before his shooting…expressed doubt that the incident was related to" the Litvinenko case. The Times adds, "Police have not commented on the shooting. But a law-enforcement official said Mr Joyal, who remains in critical condition, appeared to have been the victim of a robbery. The official said he was shot after resisting two men who had robbed him. The case has raised interest partly because Daniel McGrory, a reporter with The Times who appeared on the same NBC programme as Mr Joyal, died five days before the broadcast. There has been no official an-nouncement about the cause of death but he is believed to have died from a stroke."

The Washington Post (3/5, B1, Rich) reports Joyal "was robbed of his wallet and briefcase, law enforcement sources said yesterday. That property was taken…supports the theory that he was shot during a robbery rather than in retaliation for public criticism of the Kremlin."

The Washington Post (3/4, C1, Rondeaux, Aratani) reported "an FBI official confirmed yesterday that the agency is looking into the shooting. Joseph Persichini Jr., the FBI's assistant director in charge of the Washington field office, said his office is assisting Prince George's and the Baltimore office of the FBI in the investigation. 'We're pursuing this as hard as possible. We're not at all sure of the motive,' Persichini said."

FBI, California AG Investigating Allegedly Corrupt Police Dept. The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Garrison) reports California Atty. Gen. Jerry Brown "has announced plans to conduct a 'top to bottom' review of the Maywood Police Department, following allegations of sexual misconduct, racism and brutality among officers in the small suburb southeast of Los Angeles. The probe, made public Friday, comes amid residents' growing anger toward the 37-member department. Officers have been accused of beating residents and stalking and sexually abusing women. … Critics have charged that the department's afternoon sobriety checks were designed to snare unlicensed illegal immigrants and generate money. About 96% of the city's population is Latino and more than half are foreign born." The Los Angeles County district attorney's office and the FBI "also are investigating the department, Maywood City Councilman Sam Peña said."

FBI Agent Maintains Elderly Mob Figure Remains Influential. The AP (3/5, McShane) reports, "At an age when most of his contemporaries were long out to pasture or in prison, Matty 'The Horse' Ianniello was still riding high. … It was 1997, and big money was rolling in from rackets in Little Italy, the garbage industry, a mobbed-up union local. The silver-haired Ianniello kept $130,000 in cash around his suburban home, adding a touch of green to his golden years. It took almost a decade, but 'The Horse' now faces the last roundup: He pleaded guilty in a pair of racketeering cases last year. Death behind bars is a possibility for the mobster, who eschewed a graceful exit and ignored organized crime history — the boss always becomes the No. 1 target of law enforcement. Even if he's 86 years old. Even if he knows better. … When Ianniello pleaded guilty last year to corrupting a Queens bus drivers union, he arrived in court propped up by a cane. His voice was difficult to understand during his plea; Ianniello's lawyer blamed his client's garbled diction on a stroke. Others were more skeptical, suggesting Ianniello was as healthy as — well, a horse. 'Don't let his age fool you,' said assistant FBI special agent Matt Heron after one of Matty's arrests. 'He's still an influential player.'"

DOJ_NMG_0139235

Defendant In DC Death Penalty Case Seeks Mistrial." The Washington Times (3/4, McElhatton) reports, "The defendant in a rare death-penalty case in the District is asking for a mistrial. Larry Gooch, accused of being the enforcer for the violent M Street Crew drug gang in Northeast, last week asked the federal court judge in the case to declare a mistrial. He claims he is not receiving adequate legal representation. Mr. Gooch said he wants a mistrial because one of his attorneys recently elicited 'damaging' testimony from Metropolitan Police Department Detective Carlton Herndon, according to defense filings. … Testimony began last month and is expected to resume today. U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer has not ruled on Mr. Gooch's request for a mistrial, according to court filings."

Federal Law Prevents Prosecutors From Charging Olsen With Murder. The AP (3/5) reports, "A federal act is preventing prosecutors from moving forward in the murder case against Timmy Brent Olsen. He was charged with murder last January in the 1995 disappearance and death of 15-year-old Kiplyn Davis. Olsen is in a federal prison in Phoenix, Arizona, serving a 12-year sentence for perjury for lying to a federal grand jury investigating the girl's disappearance. He is appealing that conviction. Prosecutors can't force him to return to face the state murder charges without potentially having to dismiss the charges on a technicality. And Olsen won't sign a waiver of the federal act that is keeping him from facing the Utah charges. Prosecutors say they are willing to wait for him to exhaust his federal appeals, at which time he would have no choice but to face the murder charge."

Gibbons Retains Top Criminal Lawyer. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A6, Wilke, 2.04M) reports, "Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons, facing a federal investigation of whether he accepted improper gifts or payments from a federal contractor, retained Abbe Lowell, one of the nation's best-known criminal defense lawyers." Gibbons "represented Nevada in Congress for five terms before his election as governor last year. He served on the House intelligence and armed services committees, and used his position to help a Reno software maker, eTreppid Technologies LLC, seek federal contracts." Gibbons and eTreppid's owner, Warren Trepp, "said they did nothing improper."

Whereabouts Of Nearly One In Five Released Texas Sex Felons Unknown. The San Antonio Express-News (3/5, Hughes) reports from Austin, TX, "When Anselmo Pruneda Jr. left prison last May, the forwarding address he left to a Houston boarding house almost sounded like an invitation to the cops for tea. … 'O Do Drop In,' he wrote. … No such place exists." The Express-News continues, "Pruneda, who had spent a dozen years in prison related to the sexual assault of a 9-year-old boy and failing to register as a sex offender, didn't register as required with the Houston police, either. … Lawmakers created sex offender registries so people could check how close potential predators lived to their neighborhoods, playgrounds or schools. But these registries are not fool-proof." The Express-News adds, "The Houston Chronicle and San Antonio Express-News examined the whereabouts of more than 800 sex offenders released from prison to Harris or Bexar counties during the 18 months ending last December. … All had been rejected for early release and had served their entire sentences. Almost 20 percent of them either failed to register as sex offenders or their addresses in the state registry were incomplete, 'unknown,' 'absconded' 'out of state' or 'homeless.' … And that's not counting how many false or out-of-date addresses are only detected when too few local police officers try to knock on too many sex-offender doors." The Express-News notes, "More than 46,000 adults in Texas are registered as sex offenders for crimes ranging from indecent exposure to aggravated sexual assault of a child. … As state leaders in Austin clamor to get tough on violent sex offenders who target children, calling for longer sentences with no possibility of parole or possibly the death penalty, police who work with sex offenders say politicians are overlooking a disturbing trend. … Increasingly, sex offenders deemed too dangerous for early parole return home unsupervised once they have completed their entire sentences. And under the current system, they are less scrutinized, not more. … When paroled, sex offenders aren't released until officials verify and approve where they will live. When registering with local authorities, they must prove their address with a state ID card or drivers license. … But sex offenders who complete their sentences can refuse to tell prison authorities where they will live. Or they can claim they will leave Texas or name a location in the vaguest of terms. They still are required to register with local law enforcement upon release, but police say they often go undetected if they don't."

DOJ_NMG_0139236

FBI Now Able Crack Mortgage Fraud Cases More Quickly. The Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News (3/5, Morris) reports, "Mortgage fraud is being called the country's fastest-growing white-collar crime. It costs lenders more than $1 billion a year and has turned increasing numbers of federal agents into experts on real estate paperwork. These days, they quickly crack cases that once took years to work, experts say. Two Kansas City politicians recently learned just how quickly. The very day last fall when Katheryn Shields, who was then county executive in Jackson County, Mo., and her husband signed paperwork selling their home, an FBI agent notified them they were the targets of a criminal investigation involving the sale."

Sarbanes-Oxley Used To Prosecute Lawyer Tied To FBI Child Porn Probe. The AP (3/5, Christoffersen) reports, "The arrest of a prominent attorney on charges of destroying evidence in a child pornography investigation is raising alarm bells that a law targeting corporate accounting schemes could be used to prosecute lawyers over work done on their clients' behalf. … Philip Russell was charged Feb. 16 with destroying a computer that contained child pornography at Christ Church in Greenwich." Russell, "the former attorney for the church, is accused of obstructing an FBI investigation that led to the January conviction of the church's music director, Robert Tate, for possessing child pornography. Russell was charged under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which Congress passed in 2002 after a wave of corporate accounting scandals to make it easier to prosecute such cases. He faces up to 40 years in prison if convicted. … The law, which was aimed at cases involving corporate document shredding, made it easier to prosecute obstruction of justice by requiring only that an investigation was foreseeable rather than already pending. Prosecutors also no longer have to show the defendant acted with corrupt intent to keep evidence from investigators, experts say.

D'Amato To Lobby For Poker Players Alliance. In its technology section, the New York Times (3/5, Rivlin, Richtel, 1.16M) says former Sen. Alphonse D'Amato, who "never folds," went from playing poker on Capital Hill to playing a more high-stakes poker game on Long Island that involves Howard Stern, among others. So, the paper says "it is a safe bet that his love of poker never proved so lucrative as it did last week, when he signed a lobbying deal with the Poker Players Alliance, a nascent group that hopes that Mr. D'Amato will help them become players in Washington politics, too. … The group is hoping that Mr. D'Amato, long known for his connections to Washington insiders and his ability to deliver perks to his constituents and interest groups, can help them overturn a new federal ban on Internet gambling — or at least exempt poker from its provisions." The paper notes, "The first big assault on poker players came in October when President Bush signed a bill aimed at online gambling by making it a crime to use credit cards or online payment systems for poker and other online casino games and sports betting conducted over the Internet."

Florida Sex Offender Center Shows Record Of Failure. The New York Times (3/5, Goodnough, Davey) reports from Arcadia, FL, "Inside a privately run treatment center here for pedophiles and rapists who have completed their prison sentences, where they are supposed to reflect on their crimes and learn to control their sexual urges, bikini posters were pinned to walls. … Two men took their shirts off, rubbed each other's backs and held hands, while others disappeared together into dormitory rooms. Some of the sex offenders appeared to be drunk from homemade 'buck' liquor secretly brewed and sold here. … And some of the center's employees, who openly ignored the breaking of rules ('As long as they are happy, we let them go,' one explained), reported that a high turnover rate among staff members was mostly because of female employees leaving their jobs after having had sex with the offenders." The Times adds, "These and other observations were included in a memorandum composed in 2004 by six employees on loan here from Pennsylvania. They had been dispatched by the Liberty Behavioral Health Corporation, which ran the facility, the Florida Civil Commitment Center, and a facility in Pennsylvania. … Nineteen states have laws that allow them to confine or restrict sex criminals beyond prison in a trend that is expanding around the country, with legislators in New York last week announcing agreement on a new civil commitment law there. … The courts have upheld the constitutionality of such laws in part because they are meant to furnish treatment where possible. Most of the states run their own centers to hold and treat such predators, generally with meager results, but at a time when private solutions are popular for prisons, toll roads and other state functions, a few have teamed with private industry. … Yet as the story of the center here in Arcadia reveals, even a $19 million partnership between the state and a company that describes itself as "a national leader in the field of specialized sex offender treatment and management" failed to meet a central purpose: treating sex offenders so they would be well enough to return to society."

Former Teen Welfare Mother Poised To Become DC Police Chief. The Washington Post (3/5, A1, Klein) reports, "Cathy L. Lanier's career could have dead-ended in her fourth year with the D.C. police department. … A new sergeant, she was sent east of the Anacostia River to the 6th Police District, one of the city's most crime-ridden areas. From the start, things were bad." The Post continues, "Lanier's supervisor, a lieutenant, propositioned her sexually and humiliated her in public by making lewd remarks about her, she said. Once, during a meeting with Lanier and a group of male officers, the lieutenant grabbed her ponytail and made a comment about pulling a woman's hair during sex. … It was 1995, and, Lanier said, she had no clue about the law on sexual harassment. Some officers urged her to file a complaint. But another supervisor warned that the department's good-old-boy culture would ensure that if she took action, she would never be promoted. … She retained a lawyer and, along with another woman making similar allegations, went to court. The city settled their lawsuit, and each woman got $75,000. The lieutenant was shifted to a different police district." The Post adds, "Lanier thought her career was over. But there were no repercussions, she said, because she had a solid track record. 'Your reputation in the department is either as a hard, loyal worker or someone who will do anything to get out of work. I was a worker,' she said." The Post notes, "Now, at 39, she is awaiting D.C. Council confirmation as the city's first permanent female police chief and one of the youngest leaders to head the department. … She has achieved success after struggles in her personal and professional life, including a teenage pregnancy that led her to drop out of high school and an early marriage that failed. Her resiliency will be tested as she inherits a police department in a high-crime city that residents say is out of touch with the community. She is already facing extra scrutiny as a white, female chief of a force that is mostly black and male. … Running the 3,800-member department requires a commanding presence, stamina and the ability to plan while dealing with the inevitable crises. As her predecessor, Charles H. Ramsey, put it: 'There are things coming at you all the time and nobody to pass it off to. The buck stops there.'"

DOJ_NMG_0139237

CIVIL LAW:

Measure Curbing Federal Procurement Access For Former Officials Clears Committee. Under the headline, "Slowing Down The Revolving Door," the Washington Post's (3/5, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "A House committee has approved legislation that would lengthen employment restrictions for federal procurement officials who take certain jobs when they leave government, from one year to two years. It also would prohibit newly hired procurement officials from awarding contracts to their former employers for two years." The Post adds that while House Oversight and Government Reform Committee chairman Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), suggests tighter restrictions "will bring more accountability to government," OMB's procurement policy chief, Paul A. Denett, "argues that the proposed restrictions 'would do great damage' to the government's ability to hire and keep qualified contracting personnel. 'They will have the unintended effect of harming the career prospects of the overwhelming number of honest, experienced government employees and encourage them to leave government service early,' Denett said in a recent letter to Waxman. An estimated 20 percent of the government's 28,000 contracting professionals are eligible to retire, Denett noted."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Official To Lead Racial Healing Discussions In Omaha. The Omaha World-Herald (3/5, Greff) reports, "The arson fire that blew a wall off Bob's Food Mart last month exposed not only the store's contents but also racial tension in the surrounding community of east Omaha. … And as with Hurricane Katrina, underlying problems surfaced, north Omaha leader LaVon Stennis Williams said at a community meeting Sunday at St. Therese of the Child Jesus Catholic Church." The World-Herald continues, "The Feb. 18 robbery and arson at Bob's Food Mart, which police said may have been a racially motivated hate crime, sparked community outcry - and now, an avenue for change. … Two white men robbed the store and ordered Kassahun Goshime, an Ethiopian immigrant, into the basement. His hands and mouth were bound with duct tape and the store was set on fire. Goshime escaped. … His family owns the store. Racist graffiti has been found spray-painted on his home as well as on the store, at 16th and Fort Streets." The World-Herald adds, "Bill Whitcomb, a race relations mediator with the Kansas City office of the U.S. Department of Justice, will be in Omaha next week to lead three discussions on race relations and develop a plan to address the issue, Stennis Williams said. … One of those meetings, a forum scheduled for March 15 at 6:30 p.m., is open to the public. Whitcomb also will lead a meeting with community leaders and another with elected officials. … Stennis Williams said others have told her of racial tensions in the area. … More than two dozen people attended Sunday's community meeting. Contributing to Sunday's discussion were Tommie Wilson, president of the Omaha chapter of the NAACP; Tristan Bonn, Omaha's former public safety auditor; and representatives of the Anti-Defamation League."

Plaintiffs Await Ruling On Georgia Tech Policies. The Washington Times (3/5, Price) reports, "Two women whose 2006 lawsuit against the Georgia Institute of Technology led to the repeal of the school's speech code await a federal judge's opinion on two other unresolved issues in their civil rights case." The Times continues, "Plaintiffs Ruth Malhotra and Orit T. Sklar -- both conservative student leaders at Georgia Tech -- say a ruling is pending by U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester of the Northern District of Georgia on their requests to overturn a school policy that bans funding of religious and political groups with student activity fees and to shut down an administration-run program that challenges biblical doctrine concerning homosexuality. … 'The clock is ticking away' on the rest of Judge Forrester's decision, which 'could come at any time,' said David French, director of the Alliance Defense Fund Center for Academic Freedom, which is representing Miss Malhotra, a graduate student in international affairs from Georgia, and Miss Sklar, a senior in Tech's undergraduate civil-engineering program. … Mr. French describes ADF as a 'Christian public-interest legal organization' that promotes religious liberty on college campuses." The Times adds, "The plaintiffs and ADF brought the lawsuit a year ago, claiming that Tech's policies designed to protect students from intolerance actually discriminated against conservative religious students who speak out against issues such as homosexuality, abortion and feminism. … Miss Malhotra accused Georgia Tech of 'unlawfully promoting its own [left-wing] agenda while stifling the free expression' of students who hold positions the institution does not share. Both women have been active in College Republicans. … A spokesman for Georgia Tech declined last week to discuss the students' suit, saying the case is in the hands of the Georgia state Attorney General's Office."

DOJ_NMG_0139238

Disabled Attorney Helps Others With Disabilities. The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Riccardi) reports from Denver, "Carrie Ann Lucas is confined to a wheelchair. She breathes with the aid of a ventilator. She cannot hear and can see only at close range. … She begins most days about 4 a.m. with newspapers and e-mails. About 5:30, she wakes her three disabled daughters. She and an aide dress the two who use wheelchairs. The girls cannot feed themselves so Lucas and the aide plug feeding tubes into their bellies. She pours cereal for the one daughter who can eat on her own. She puts the girls on their school buses, the last leaving by 7:10. … Lucas cherishes these mornings, tough as they are, because she knows how hard it is to keep a family together." The Times continues, "She is one of a handful of attorneys in the country whose specialty is representing disabled parents like herself. Her mission: Making sure they get the same chance as everyone else to be moms and dads. … According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 15% of all parents with children in the household have some disability. These parents are far more likely to have the government try to take their children away. Even Lucas lives in fear that social services may seize her children. She knows the sorrow of losing a child — a 7-year-old girl whom she wanted to adopt was taken from her after a difficult court fight." The Times adds, "Lucas works her cases out of a seventh-floor office at the Colorado Cross-Disability Coalition in central Denver. … More disabled people seek help from the coalition than Lucas, who carries about a dozen cases at a time, can handle. … Among those she has worked with was a deaf woman in suburban Denver, whose two toddlers were taken away and put up for adoption after social workers deemed her an unfit mother because she could not hear her children's cries for attention. Lucas could identify with her — she sleeps with a sound-activated pager that vibrates when one of her daughters calls for her."

NAACP President Resigns. The Washington Times/AP (3/5, Texeira) reports, "NAACP President Bruce S. Gordon said Sunday he is leaving the civil rights organization after just 19 months at the helm, citing clashes with board members over management style and the organization's mission as the reasons. 'I believe that any organization that's going to be effective will only be effective if the board and the CEO are aligned and I don't think we are aligned,' Gordon told The Associated Press. 'This compromises the ability of the board to be as effective as it can be.'" Julian Bond, "chairman of the board of the Baltimore-based National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said Sunday that Gordon tried to quit just six weeks after taking the job in August 2005, but Bond convinced him to stay."

The New York Times (3/5, Hernandez, 1.16M) reports, "In interviews, black leaders close to the organization said the reasons behind his departure stemmed from a dispute over its future role in a nation where the battlefront for civil rights has shifted. 'We want it to be a social justice organization; he wanted it to be more of a social service organization,'" said Bond. Gordon "said he did not believe that the organization should abandon its civil rights mission but rather that it should expand its role to include providing social services."

The Washington Post (3/5, A3, Fears, 690K) reports, "During his tenure, Gordon closed the rift between the 98-year-old NAACP and the White House. In July, President Bush addressed the organization's annual convention in Washington. With the speech, Bush avoided becoming the first president since Warren G. Harding not to address the most recognized black American rights group throughout his term." The Post also reports, "Gordon's push to move the NAACP's headquarters to Washington was embraced by numerous board members, including Bond, but was unpopular with executive committee members because it would increase costs, according to a member who is familiar with the talks." The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Hamburger, Silverstein, 850K) also reports the story.

DOJ_NMG_0139239

Role Of Education In Black Achievement Examined. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (3/5, 1.16M), "It's an article of faith that the key to success in real estate is location, location, location. For young black boys looking ahead to a difficult walk in life, the mantra should be education, education, education. … If anything, the role that education plays in the life prospects of black Americans is even more dramatic than in the population as a whole. It's the closest thing to a magic potion for black people that I can think of. For boys and men, it is very often the antidote to prison or an early grave." A new report from the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston "tells us that young adults in general have been struggling in the labor market. Many have been left behind by the modest economic recovery of the past few years, especially those with limited education credentials. The report, which focuses on black males, emphasizes the importance of education in overcoming this tough employment environment:"

NYTimes Urges Legislative Review Of New York's Civil Confinement Agreement. In its headline, the New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) suggests Spitzer is a "gunslinger" for his recent attack on the health care establishment, saying such tactics have won him "impressive victories," like budget, ethics and workers' compensation reforms. The paper warns Spitzer and legislative leaders that the "troubling" civil confinement agreement could become like the Rockefeller drug laws because it would mean "locking people up for crimes they might commit in the future. The Legislature should hold new hearings to assess the wisdom of this specific proposal." The paper also says Spitzer has not fundamentally changed the way Albany works, since most of the reform agreements were reached behind closed doors. The paper concludes, "Polls show that Mr. Spitzer is enormously popular, and that the public backs his efforts to shake up state government. When the going gets rough, as it surely will, having the strong support of the public may be the most powerful weapon in his arsenal."

ANTITRUST:

Environmental Concerns Feature Into TXU Buyout Deal. Time (3/12, Thomas, 4.03M) reports that on Feb. 25, "the Texas utility TXU Corp. agreed to a proposed $45 billion buyout -- the biggest deal ever to take a public company private -- with major environmental initiatives attached." It "turns out the barbarians at the gate -- Henry Kravis of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and David Bonderman of Texas Pacific Group (TPG) -- have a little tree hugger in them. Even before the deal with TXU was sealed, the buyout shops called up environmentalists and, in a 17-hr. meeting at San Francisco's Mandarin Oriental Hotel, agreed to roll back carbon emissions from all TXU power plants to 1990 levels by 2020. Four days later, the company's board accepted the buyout offer, agreeing to drop controversial plans for eight of 11 new coal-fired power plants and to support a federal cap on carbon emissions."

IP Verdicts Exceeded $1.3 Billion In 2006. The National Law Journal (3/5, Qualters) reports, "Finisar Corp. employs dozens of Ph.D.-level scientists to create technology for its high-speed data communication components and testing business, but one of the company's most lucrative inventions may be a patent outside of its core business that generated a court victory worth $117.3 million last year." The Journal continues, "In June 2006, the Sunnyvale, Calif.-based Finisar won a $78.9 million jury verdict in a patent infringement case against broadcast satellite company The DirecTV Group Inc. of El Segundo, Calif. Although appeals are in the works, fines are racking up, including a judge's $25 million enhancement for willful infringement and $13.4 million for prejudgment interest, post-judgment interest and a compulsory license. Finisar Corp. v. DirecTV Group Inc., No. 05-00264 (E.D. Texas)." The Journal adds, "Amid a worldwide market expansion for technology products, the Finisar case is one of a burgeoning number of blockbuster verdicts in intellectual property cases. These verdicts exceeded $1.3 billion in 2006, according to VerdictSearch, an affiliate of the National Law Journal, and our own research. … There's a direct correlation between intellectual property jury verdicts and the importance of the technology protected by the patent, said Eric Maschoff, a shareholder at Workman Nydegger of Salt Lake City, who served as Finisar's lead patent prosecution counsel on the case. 'Companies are looking more and more towards their intellectual property portfolio as an asset, and they're exploiting that asset,' Maschoff said. … Lawyers report that the sheer market size of high-technology products based on the patents in those portfolios can lead to massive infringement verdicts. Companies' rising inclination to bring such cases to trial, and the emergence of high-tech courtrooms that enable the use of animation and other visual aids, also boost the possibility of gargantuan verdicts."

Federal Judge Rejects Recusal Motion In Music Price-Fixing Case. The New York Law Journal (3/5, Bar) reports, "A federal judge has rejected a request that she recuse herself from a high-profile litigation involving the music industry on the ground that her attorney husband and his firm have represented some of the defendants in other matters." The Journal continues, "Lead attorneys for plaintiffs in the case expressed concern that because Southern District of New York Judge Loretta A. Preska's husband, Thomas J.

DOJ_NMG_0139240

Kavaler, and his firm, Cahill Gordon & Reindel, represented several of the music company defendants in other litigation, she might be inclined to tilt toward the defendants. … But Preska rejected the argument in In re Digital Music Antitrust Litigation, 06 MDL 1780, finding that the plaintiffs' motion for recusal was not only time-barred, but was wrong on its merits. … 'Courts have uniformly rejected the argument that an appearance of impropriety exists in the following situation: (i) a judge's spouse is a partner in a law firm that represents a litigant in other matters before the judge; and (ii) the spouse did not perform any work at the law firm for the litigant or worked for the litigant on unrelated matters,' she said." The Journal adds, "Numerous lawsuits have been filed by online music downloaders who claim that the music divisions of Sony, Bertelsmann, Universal, Time Warner and EMI Music North America 'conspired artificially to fix or maintain prices' of digital music recordings offered for sale over the Internet in violation of federal and state antitrust laws. … Two of those cases were originally assigned to Preska. She presided over Seley v. Universal Music Group, 06 Civ. 1887, after the case was filed on March 9, 2006, and in Devine v. Universal Music Group, 06 Civ. 4211. … On June 12, 2006, Preska issued a memo in the Devine case informing the parties that her husband and his firm 'from time to time' represent Sony, Warner and Universal. … On July 3, 2006, Christopher Lovell, a partner at Lovell Stewart Halebian who represents a plaintiff in the case, sent a letter to the judge asserting a possible conflict. But Lovell did not formally request that the judge recuse herself."

Alcatel-Lucent To Appeal Dismissal Of Microsoft Patent Dispute. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, B4, Cheng, Fleetwood) reports, "A federal judge ruled that Microsoft Corp. did not violate an Alcatel-Lucent patent for speech recognition." The Journal continues, "This is the second of several patent disputes between the two companies. Last week, a jury awarded1 Alcatel-Lucent $1.5 billion from Microsoft in regards to violating two patents involving MP3 technology." The Journal adds, "U.S. District Court Judge Rudi Brewster in San Diego dismissed all claims late Thursday regarding the speech-recognition dispute so that the jury trial set to start later this month will not happen. But Alcatel-Lucent intends to continue pursuing its options in the case. … 'We plan to appeal this decision and are comfortable with our chances of success as the case makes its way through the legal system,' said Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman Joan Campion."

Patent Office To Review Applications Online. The Washington Post (3/5, A1, Sipress, 690K) reports, "The government is about to start opening up the process of reviewing patents to the modern font of wisdom: the Internet." The Patent and Trademark Office "is starting a pilot project that will not only post patent applications on the Web and invite comments but also use a community rating system designed to push the most respected comments to the top of the file, for serious consideration by the agency's examiners. A first for the federal government, the system resembles the one used by Wikipedia, the popular user-created online encyclopedia."

INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Cherokee Nation Slave Descendents Face Uncertainty After Ouster. The AP (3/4, Murphy) reports, "The Cherokee Nation vote this weekend to revoke the citizenship of the descendants of people the Cherokee once owned as slaves was a blow to people who have relied on tribal benefits." The AP continues, "Charlene White, a descendant of freed Cherokee slaves who were adopted into the tribe in 1866 under a treaty with the U.S. government, wondered Sunday where she would now go for the glaucoma treatment she has received at a tribal hospital in Stilwell. … 'I've got to go back to the doctor, but I don't know if I can go back to the clinic or if they're going to oust me right now,' said White, 56, a disabled Tahlequah resident who lives on a fixed income." The AP adds, "In Saturday's special election, more than 76 percent of voters decided to amend the Cherokee Nation's constitution to remove the estimated 2,800 freedmen descendants from the tribal rolls, according to results posted Sunday on the tribe's Web site. … Marilyn Vann, president of the Descendants of Freedmen of the Five Civilized Tribes, said the election results undoubtedly will be challenged. … 'We will pursue the legal remedies that are available to us to stop people from not only losing their voting rights, but to receiving medical care and other services to which they are entitled under law,' Vann said Sunday. … 'This is a fight for justice to stop these crimes against humanity.'" The AP adds, "Cherokee Nation spokesman Mike Miller said Sunday that election results will not be finalized until after a protest period that extends through March 12. Services currently being received by freedmen descendants will not immediately be suspended, he said. … 'There isn't going to be some sort of sudden stop of a service that's ongoing,' Miller said. 'There will be some sort of transition period so that people understand what's going on.'" The AP notes, "In a statement late Saturday, Cherokee Nation Principal Chief Chad Smith said he was pleased with the turnout and election result. … 'Their voice is clear as to who should be citizens of the Cherokee Nation,' Smith said. 'No one else has the right to make that determination. It was a right of self-government, affirmed in 23 treaties with Great Britain and the United States and paid dearly with 4,000 lives on the Trail of Tears.'

DOJ_NMG_0139241

… The petition drive for the ballot measure followed a March 2006 ruling by the Cherokee Nation Supreme Court that said an 1866 treaty assured freedmen descendants of tribal citizenship. … A similar situation occurred in 2000 when the Seminole Nation voted to cast freedmen descendants out of its tribe, said attorney Jon Velie of Norman, an expert on Indian law who has represented freedmen descendants in previous cases."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ahead Of Bush Visit, FBI Investigates Salvadoran Legislators' Murder In Guatemala. McClatchy Newspaper (3/4, San Martin) reported, "Three murdered Salvadoran legislators. Four cops, suspected in the killings, themselves shot to death in a maximum security prison. Broken government agencies. And more questions than answers. That's what FBI investigators will face when they arrive this week to help sort out the stunning murders, which have highlighted the wave of drug-fueled corruption and crime lashing a country President Bush will visit in seven days. … The FBI team arriving this week will provide technical and scientific support to try to find some answers. Interior Minister Vielmann said all lines of investigation remain open - from a possible case of mistaken identity 'to something much more profound,' including ties to organized crime."

The New York Times (3/5, McKinley) reports, "After three Salvadoran congressmen were waylaid and killed on a road in Guatemala last month, it did not take the authorities long to find the culprits: they were Guatemalan police officers, and their unmarked police car had a tracking device that proved they were at the scene. They quickly confessed, saying they thought their victims were drug dealers, and were sent to a maximum-security prison. It is a measure of the weakness of the crime-plagued Guatemalan state that what happened just four days later remains something of a mystery — aside from the indisputable fact that the four who confessed ended up dead. The police and the interior minister say that rioting gang members inside the prison shot and stabbed them. But other inmates and their visitors that day say a group of heavily armed men in military garb and ski masks made their way through seven locked doors and executed them, with no interference from guards, removing any possibility that they could identify co-conspirators. The two sets of brazen killings set off a vicious diplomatic conflict between Guatemala and El Salvador — heightened by news reports suggesting that the congressmen were indeed drug dealers — and ignited a political scandal here." The Times notes, "Since 1993, the United States has twice helped set up special antinarcotics forces here, only to watch their commanders become embroiled in the drug trade themselves. President Bush is scheduled to visit next week, and American diplomats say the lack of public security here is near the top of his agenda."

Mueller Starts Reading List For FBI. The U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column FBI Director "and avid reader Robert Mueller has started a new bureau reading list to help his G-men broaden their horizons. The list has more than 60 books about the FBI's history, terrorism, intelligence, and professional development." Some "gems: Public Enemies, by Bryan Burrough, about the birth of the FBI; The Looming Tower, Lawrence Wright's book about al Qaeda's road to 9/11; China, Inc. by Ted Fishman; and Louis Gerstner's Who Says Elephants Can't Dance? about IBM's historic turnaround. We also hear that Mueller's a big fan of former GE bigwig Jack Welch. So naturally, Welch's Winning also gets top billing."

Fourteen-Year-Old's Murder Spurs Crackdown On Los Angeles Gangs. The Sacramento Bee (3/5, Rojas) reported, "It took political officials nearly a month to respond to the slaying of Cheryl Green. Since then, the 14-year-old African American girl has become the face of brown-on-black violence in this city. The FBI has joined the Los Angeles Police Department in cracking down on gangs. The Police Department, breaking with tradition, has publicly named the city's worst 11 gangs. … The racially motivated shooting of the eighth-grader, which occurred Dec. 15 in broad daylight as she chatted with friends, was one of 269 gang-related murders citywide in 2006." The Bee goes on to report that on Jan. 18, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa "held a news conference near where the teenager was killed to announce a plan to 'dismantle' the Latino gang blamed for the girl's slaying. He was joined by Police Chief William Bratton and FBI Director Robert Mueller."

Attorneys, Jurors Reflect On Failed Prosecution Of DC's Largest Drug Seizure. The Washington Post (3/5, B08, Cauvin) reports, "The haul was unprecedented. A wiretap on the cellphone of a reputed drug kingpin led police to a stash house where they found almost 100 kilos of cocaine and nearly $1 million. A force of more than 100 federal and local agents swept up nearly a dozen suspects in raids across the region." The Post continues, "The evidence to put everyone away seemed strong. There were the drugs, the cash and the wiretaps, filled with curious talk of 'tickets' – 'little tickets,' 'VIP tickets' -- code, prosecutors said, for wholesale quantities of cocaine. … And there was the Global Positioning System device, secretly planted in the suspected kingpin's car, tracking his comings and goings between the stash house in Fort Washington and his supposed customers in and around Washington." The Post adds, "Then the case went before a jury in U.S. District Court. The outcome was hardly what authorities would have expected on that October morning a year and a half ago when they found themselves staring at the biggest seizure ever made in a D.C. drug investigation. … The jurors, after deliberating for weeks, deadlocked earlier this year on many charges against alleged kingpin Antoine Jones, including the most serious: conspiracy. And on more than a dozen other counts, the jury came back with verdicts of not guilty. The three men on trial with him, charged with conspiracy as well, fared even better. … Kevin L. Holland and Adrian Jackson were acquitted of all charges; Michael A. Huggins was acquitted of all but one lesser charge, and that eventually was dismissed by the government. All three men, jailed for more than a year pending trial, are now free. Jones remains in jail, awaiting retrial." The Post notes, "It was a stunning loss for prosecutors and police, who claimed they had busted a major drug-trafficking ring with direct links to suppliers in Mexico. But the case had weaknesses that became apparent once it went to trial. … First was the profile of the alleged conspiracy. Unlike cases against other such enterprises, this one did not allege that anyone was killed or even assaulted by Jones or his alleged co-conspirators. Although the absence of violence was a relief for investigators, it also could have had consequences with the jury, lawyers said. … Nothing in the law requires prosecutors to present evidence of violence to prove a conspiracy to distribute narcotics. And whether the lack of bodies was pivotal in this case is a question that veteran prosecutors debate. … But experience tells many prosecutors that a body, or two or three, can make juries more apt to tie defendants together in a conspiracy and return verdicts in which everyone shares blame."

DOJ_NMG_0139242

Louisiana Cocaine Dealer Facing Life In Prison. The Shreveport Times (3/3, Rucker) reports, "A Rowlett, Texas man has been convicted by a Shreveport jury on cocaine distribution and money laundering charges. Ronald King, 40, was convicted Friday, charged with one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, one count of money laundering and one count of forfeiture, according to a press release from Donald Washington, United States attorney for the western district of Louisiana. His sentencing is set for June 21 at 1:15 p.m. where he faces a sentence of life in prison, a $4 million fine or both. … King was caught after an investigation conducted by the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force which includes Shreveport and Bossier City police departments, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Shreveport and the Caddo Parish Sheriff's Office."

Reporting Continues On Multistate Investigation Of Online Drug Sales. The New York Daily News (3/2) reported it "may shock no one to learn that two world champion bodybuilders may have been using steroids or growth hormone, but two giants of that well-muscled world were among the athletes who received drugs in a shady Internet pharmacy operation," sources said. "Eight-time Mr. Universe Ronnie Coleman, a former BALCO client, and top Mr. Universe contestant Victor Martinez were among the many clients in an ongoing, multistate investigation that led to the raids on several pharmacies in Florida this week, a source said. … A source with knowledge of the probe said another one of the steroid customers is a supervisor with the Albany [New York] Police Department's narcotics squad." The Daily News noted that as many as 24 people are expected to "be rounded up in the days ahead."

